

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

1908, SESSION CASES.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION,

AND ALSO IN THE

COURT OF JUSTICIARY

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM JULY 25, 1907, TO JULY 18, 1908.

REPORTED BY

H. J. E. FRASER, JOHN HARVEY, J. S. LEADBETTER, AND J. HOSSELL HENDERSON, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

EDITED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, ESQUIRE, K.C.

Published for the Faculty of Advocates

BY

T. & T. CLARK, EDINBURGH,

AND

STEVENS & SONS, LONDON.

M.CMVIII.

1

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB & CO., CLYDE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279744

Y30 01 0807446

J U D G E S
OF THE
COURT OF SESSION
DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Lord DUNEDIN.

Lord M'LAREN.

The Lord KINNEAR.

Lord PEARSON.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. Sir J. H. A.
MACDONALD, K.C.B.

Lord STORMONTH-DARLING.

Lord Low.

Lord ARDWALL.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord DUNDAS.

Lord JOHNSTON.

Lord SALVESEN.

Lord MACKENZIE.

Lord GUTHRIE.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, The Lord DUNEDIN.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. Sir J. H. A.
MACDONALD, K.C.B.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

The other Judges of the Court of Session.

Lord Advocate, The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW.
Dean of Faculty, WILLIAM CAMPBELL, Esq.
Solicitor-General, ALEXANDER URE, Esq.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

P E E R S

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, LORD LOREBURN.
EARL OF HALSBURY, LORDS ASHBOURNE, MACNAGHTEN, JAMES OF HEREFORD, ROBERTSON, ATKINSON, and COLLINS.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN

1908 SESSION CASES.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Court, see p. xii.,— Lands Valuation Appeal Court, see p. xii.,—Court of Justiciary, see p. xii., —House of Lords, see p. xiv.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
A B, C D v. - - - - -	737
Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, v. Smith, -	669
Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, Gill v. -	328
Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, The Clan Steam Trawling Co., Limited, v. - - -	651
Adam, Penny's Trustees v. - - - - -	662
Adam, Sime, Sullivan, & Dickson's Trustee v. - - -	32
Advocate, H. M., v. Suits, Limited, - - -	1163
Advocate, Lord, v. Caledonian Railway Co., - - -	566
Aitken, Campbell, & Co., Limited, v. Boullen & Gatenby, -	490
Alexander, Marmor, Limited, v. - - - - -	78
Alan v. Thomson's Trustees, - - - - -	483
Allan's Executor v. Allan, - - - - -	807
Allgemeine Deutsche Credit Anstalt v. Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, - - - - -	33
American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, v. Sidway, -	500
Anderson's Trustees v. Donaldson & Co., Limited (in Liquidation), 38,	385
Andrew, &c. (Hay's Trustees) v. Baillie, - - - - -	1224
Baillie, Hay's Trustees v. - - - - -	1224
Baird (William) & Co., Limited, Burley v. - - - - -	545
Baird (William) & Co., Limited, Dempster v. - - - - -	722
Baird (William) & Co., Limited, Donnelly v. - - - - -	536
Baird (William) & Co., Limited, Lee v. - - - - -	905
Baird (William) & Co., Limited, v. M'Whinnie, - - -	440
Ballachulish Slate Quarries Co., Limited, M'Gregor v. - - -	1
Ballingry Parish Council, Liddall v. - - - - -	1082
Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, v. Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, -	82
Beaton v. Corporation of Glasgow, - - - - -	1010
Beaton, M'Leod, & Co., Limited, J. M. & J. H. Robertson v. -	921
Begg, &c. (Anderson's Trustees) v. Donaldson & Co., Limited (in Liquidation), - - - - -	38, 385
Bell v. Bell's Trustee, - - - - -	853
Bell v. Graham, - - - - -	1060
Bell v. Rigg, - - - - -	974
Beveridge's Trustee v. Beveridge, - - - - -	791
Beveridge's Trustees, Mackenzie's Trustees v. - - - - -	1185
Bilalund (Glasgow Corporation), Eadie v. - - - - -	207
Black v. North British Railway Co., - - - - -	444
Black, &c. (Colville's Trustees) v. Marindin, - - - - -	911

	Pa
Boal v. Scottish Catholic Printing Co., Limited, -	66
Boullen & Gatenby, Aitken, Campbell, & Co., Limited, v. -	49
Bow, &c. (Ranken's Trustees) v. Ranken, -	-
Bowring & Co., Clark v. -	116
Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, -	114
Brien, Turnbull v. -	31
British Legal Life Assurance Co., Salvation Army Assurance Society v. -	113
Brock v. Brock, -	96
Brown, Paxton v. -	40
Brown & Co., Limited, Lawrie v. -	70
Brownlee, Havery v. -	42
Brownlee's Executrix v. Brownlee, -	23
Bruce Peebles & Co., Limited, Liquidators of, v. Shiella, -	69
Burgoyne v. Walker, -	32
Burley v. William Baird & Co., Limited, -	54
C D v. A B, -	73
Caithness Flagstone Co., Limited (in Liquidation), Pattullo v. -	21
Calder, &c. (Copland's Executors) v. Milne, -	426
Caledonian Railway Co., Corporation of Glasgow v. -	244
Caledonian Railway Co., Lord Advocate v. -	566
Caledonian Railway Co., North British Railway Co. v. -	16
Cameron, &c. (Denholm's Trustees) v. Denholm's Trustees, -	255
Campbell v. Muir, -	387
Carmichael (Judicial Factor of Greenock Harbour Trust), Greenock Harbour Trustees v. -	944
Carmichael, &c. (Leckie's Trustees), Merrilees v. -	576
Carter v. Lang & Sons, -	1198
Cass v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, -	841
Cayzer, Irvine, & Co., Malone v. -	479
Christie, Greig v. -	370
Clan Steam Trawling Co., Limited, v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, -	651
Clark v. Bowring & Co., -	1168
Clark's Trustee v. M'Rostie, -	196
Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co., Limited, Mackenzie v. -	200
Clyde Shipping Co., Limited, Kennedys v. -	895
Clydesdale Bank, Kirkwood & Sons v. -	20
Coats, Liquidator of the Humboldt Redwood Co., Limited, v. -	751
Colam, Macfarlane v. -	56
Colville's Trustees v. Marindin, -	911
Conolly v. North British Railway Co., -	422
Cook, Crowe v. -	1178
Copland's Executors v. Milne, -	426
Cory & Son, Limited (Owners of the "James Joicey") v. Kopajtic (Master of the "Kostrena"), -	295
Crichton & Stevenson v. Love, -	818
Crichton's Trustees, Fenton Livingstone v. -	1208
Cripps, Wigan v. -	394
Crowe v. Cook, -	1178
Crown S.S. Co., Limited, v. Leitch, -	506
Cunningham (J. & J.), Limited, Zugg v. -	827
Cuthbert v. Cuthbert's Trustees, -	967
Dálmeny Oil Co., Limited, Rintoul v. -	1025
Dalserf, Minister of, v. Heritors, -	1123
Davidson v. Logan, -	350
Davison (Mackenzie's Trustee), v. Mackenzie, -	995

INDEX OF NAMES.

vii

	Page
Dawson v. Mackenzie, - - - - -	648
De Meo, Don Francesco v. - - - - -	7
Dempster v. William Baird & Co., Limited, - - - - -	722
Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm, - - - - -	43
Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees, - - - - -	255
Dods, Macandrew v. - - - - -	51
Donaldson & Co., Limited, Liquidator of, v. White & Park, - - - - -	309
Donaldson & Co., Limited (in Liquidation), Anderson's Trustees v. 38, 385
Don Francesco v. De Meo, - - - - -	7
Donnelly v. William Baird & Co., Limited, - - - - -	536
Dougall v. Magistrates of Dunfermline, - - - - -	151
Downie, Jack's Executor v. - - - - -	718
Drummond, Lord Ruthven v. - - - - -	1154
Dublin and Glasgow Steam Packet Co., Lamont & Co. v. - - - - -	1017
Dunbar, Kirk-Session of, - - - - -	852
Dunbar v. Gill, - - - - -	1054
Dunfermline, Magistrates of, Dougall v. - - - - -	151
Dunsmuir & Jackson, M'Innes v. - - - - -	1021
Duthie, Fyfe's Trustees v. - - - - -	520
Eadie v. Bilsland (Glasgow Corporation), - - - - -	207
Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, Cass v. - - - - -	841
Edinburgh and St Andrews, University Courts of, Nairn v. - - - - -	113
"Eildon," "Hebe" v. - - - - -	1092
Fenton (Lord Scone's Tutor), Earl of Mansfield v. - - - - -	459
Fenton Livingstone v. Crichton's Trustees, - - - - -	1208
Fenton Livingstone v. Fenton Livingstone, - - - - -	286
Ferguson, Selkirk v. - - - - -	26
Fernie, Turner's Trustees v. - - - - -	883
Fife Coal Co., Limited, v. Lindsay, - - - - -	431
Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, - - - - -	928
Finlayson (Bell's Trustee), Bell v. - - - - -	853
Fleming v. Gemmill, - - - - -	340
Francesco v. De Meo, - - - - -	7
French, Morton v. - - - - -	171
Fullerton & Co., Martin v. - - - - -	1030
Fyfe's Trustees v. Duthie, - - - - -	520
Galbraith, Hemming v. - - - - -	897
Gardiners v. Stewart's Trustees, - - - - -	985
Geddes v. A. & J. M'Lellan, - - - - -	941
Gemmill, Fleming v. - - - - -	340
George v. Glasgow Coal Co., Limited, - - - - -	846
Gibson, Watson v. - - - - -	1092
Gibson, &c. (Crichton's Trustees), Fenton Livingstone v. - - - - -	1208
Giersten v. Turnbull & Co., - - - - -	1101
Gill, Dunbar v. - - - - -	1054
Gill v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, - - - - -	328
Gillespie v. Riddell, - - - - -	628
Glasgow Coal Co., Limited, George v. - - - - -	846
Glasgow Corporation, Beaton v. - - - - -	1010
Glasgow Corporation v. Caledonian Railway Co, - - - - -	244
Glasgow Corporation v. Eadie, - - - - -	207
Glasgow Corporation, Hugh Nelson & Co. v. - - - - -	879
Glasgow Corporation, Stevenson v. - - - - -	1034
Glasgow and Row, Parish Councils of, Parish Council of Paisley v. - - - - -	731
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Grant v. - - - - -	187
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Hutchison, - - - - -	587

	Page
Glassary Parish Council, Govan Parish Council v. - -	64
Goodwillie, Strichen Parish Council v. - -	835
Gourlay, Murray v. - -	769
Govan Parish Council v. Glassary Parish Council, - -	64
Graham, Bell v. - -	1060
Graham (Liquidator of Donaldson & Co., Limited), v. White & Park, -	309
Grant v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., -	187
Gray, Leggat Brothers v. - -	67
Greenock Harbour Trustees v. Judicial Factor of Greenock Harbour Trust, - -	944
Greig v. Christie, - -	370
Grierson v. Ogilvy's Trustee, - -	959
Guild, M'Arthur's Executors v. - -	743
 H., M. v. - -	 1130
Haddington Corporation, Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. -	127
Harvie v. Smith, - -	474
Havery v. Brownlee, - -	424
Hawthorne, Leslie, & Co., Limited, Wallace v. -	713
Hay & Co. v. Torbet, - -	781
Hay's Trustees v. Baillie, - -	1224
"Hebe" v. "Eildon," - -	1092
Hemming v. Galbraith, - -	897
Hendry v. United Collieries, Limited, - -	1215
Hewitt, &c. (Stewart's Trustees), Gardiners v. -	985
Hodge (Mitchell's Trustee), Mitchell's Executor v. -	1046
Home Drummond v. M'Lachlan, - -	12
Horsley Line, Limited, v. Roechling Brothers, -	866
Howison, Ramsay v. - -	697
Humboldt Redwood Co., Limited (Liquidator of), v. Coats, -	751
Hunter (Jack's Executor), v. Downie, - -	718
Hutchison, Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. -	587
Hutchison v. Hutchison, - -	1001
 Inland Revenue, Ogilvie v. - -	 1003
Irvine, M'Douall v. - -	60
 Jack's Executor v. Downie, - -	 718
James, Rennie v. - -	681
"James Joicey," The, v. The "Kostrena," - -	295
Jay & Co., Rudman v. - -	552
Johnston, King v. - -	684
Johnston, Robertson v. - -	383
Johnstone v. Spencer & Co., - -	1015
 Kelton Parish v. Parton Parish, - -	 974
Kennedys v. Clyde Shipping Co., Limited, - -	895
King v. Johnston, - -	684
Kinloes, Parish Council of, v. Morgan, - -	192
Kirkwood & Sons v. Clydesdale Bank, - -	20
Kopajtic (Master of the "Kostrena"), Owners of the "James Joicey" v. -	295
"Kostrena," The, The "James Joicey" v. - -	295
 Laing (Sir James) & Sons, Limited, Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, v. -	 82
Lamont v. Lamont, - -	1033
Lamont & Co. v. Dublin and Glasgow Steam Packet Co., -	1017
Lang v. St Enoch Shipping Co., Limited, - -	103
Lang & Sons, Carter v. - -	1198

INDEX OF NAMES.

ix

	Page
Lauderdale, Earl of, v. Wedderburn, - - -	1237
Langhland, Southhook Fire-Clay Co., Limited, v. -	831
Lawrie v. Brown & Co., Limited, - - -	705
Leckie's Trustees, Merrilees v. - - -	576
Lee v. William Baird & Co., Limited, - - -	905
Leggat Brothers v. Gray, - - -	67
Leitch Crown S.S. Co., Limited, v. - - -	506
Leith Docks Commissioners, Somerville v. - - -	797
Liddall v. Ballingry Parish Council, - - -	1082
Lindsay, Fife Coal Co., Limited, v. - - -	431
Lindsay, Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, v. - - -	754
Lindsay v. Stewart M'Glashen & Son, Limited, - - -	762
Lochee Sawmills Co., Limited (Liquidator of), v. Stevenson, -	559
Logan (Clark's Trustee) v. M'Rostie, - - -	196
Logan, Davidson v. - - -	350
Love, Crichton & Stevenson v. - - -	818
M. v. H., - - -	1130
Macandrew v. Dods, - - -	51
M'Arthur's Executors v. Guild, - - -	743
M'Callum v. North British Railway Co., - - -	415
Macaulay, &c. (Thomson's Trustees), Allan v. - - -	483
M'Douall v. Irvine, - - -	60
M'Dougall, Stewart v. - - -	315
M'Ewan v. M'Ewan, - - -	1263
Macfarlane v. Colam, - - -	56
M'Glashen & Son, Limited, Lindsay v. - - -	762
M'Gregor v. Ballachulish Slate Quarries Co., Limited, - - -	1
M'Innes v. Dunsmuir & Jackson, - - -	1021
Mackay v. Rosie, - - -	174
M'Kenzie, Dawson v. - - -	648
Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co., Limited, - - -	200
Mackenzie's Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees, - - -	1185
Mackenzie's Trustee v. Mackenzie, - - -	995
M'Kechnie v. M'Kechnie's Trustees, - - -	93
M'Lachlan, Home Drummond v. - - -	12
Maclean v. Maclean's Executrix, - - -	838
M'Lean, &c. (Beveridge's Trustees), Mackenzie's Trustees v. -	1185
M'Lellan, A. & J., Geddes v. - - -	941
M'Lennan v. M'Lennan, - - -	164
M'Rostie, Clark's Trustee v. - - -	196
M'Whinnie, William Baird & Co., Limited, v. - - -	440
Mair, &c. (Turner's Trustees) v. Fernie, - - -	883
Malone v. Cayzer, Irvine, & Co., - - -	479
Mansfield, Earl of, v. Lord Scone's Tutor, - - -	459
Marindin, Colville's Trustees v. - - -	911
Marmor, Limited, v. Alexander, - - -	78
Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook, - - -	276
Martin v. Fullerton & Co., - - -	1030
Meo, Don Francesco v. - - -	7
Merrilees v. Leckie's Trustees, - - -	576
Milne, Copland's Executors v. - - -	426
Mitchell's Executor v. Mitchell's Trustee, - - -	1046
Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation, -	127
Morgan, Parish Council of Kinloss v. - - -	192
Morrison v. Robertson, - - -	332
Morton v. French, - - -	171
Moss' Empires, Limited, Finburgh v. - - -	928

	Page
Moulin School Board, Sinclair v. - - - -	772
Muir, Campbell v. - - - -	387
Muir & Co., Limited, v. United Collieries, Limited, - -	768
Mullen v. Stewart & Co., Limited, - - - -	991
Mulvein v. Murray, - - - -	528
Murray, Mulvein v. - - - -	528
Murray v. Gourlay, - - - -	769
Nairn v. University Courts of St Andrews and Edinburgh, -	113
Napier's Trustees v. Napier, - - - -	1160
National House Property Investment Co., Limited, v. Watson, -	888
Nelson (Hugh) & Co. v. Glasgow Corporation, - - - -	879
North British Railway Co., Black v. - - - -	444
North British Railway Co., Conolly v. - - - -	422
North British Railway Co., Lord Polwarth v. - - - -	1275
North British Railway Co., M'Callum v. - - - -	415
North British Railway Co., Toal v. - - - -	48
North British Railway Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., - -	16
O'Brien v. Star Line, Limited, - - - -	1258
Ogilvie v. Inland Revenue, - - - -	1003
Ogilvy's Trustee, Grierson v. - - - -	959
Overtoun, &c. (Mackenzie's Trustees) v. Beveridge's Trustees, -	1185
Paisley, Parish Council of, v. Parish Councils of Row and Glasgow, -	731
Parton Parish, Kelton Parish v. - - - -	974
Pattullo v. Caithness Flagstone Co, Limited (in Liquidation), -	25
Paul (Guardian of Thomson's Mortification), - - - -	1078
Paxton v. Brown, - - - -	406
Pennycook, Marshall & Co. v. - - - -	276
Penny's Trustees v. Adam, - - - -	662
Pickett, Whitehouse v. - - - -	218
Polwarth, Lord, v. North British Railway Co., - - - -	1275
Pottinger, Wilson v. - - - -	580
Ramsay v. Howison, - - - -	697
Ranken's Trustees v. Ranken, - - - -	3
Rennie v. James, - - - -	681
Rennie v. Reid, - - - -	1051
Reid, Rennie v. - - - -	1051
Riddell, Gillespie v. - - - -	628
Rigg v. Bell, - - - -	974
Rintoul v. Dalmeny Oil Co., Limited, - - - -	1025
Robertson, J. M. & J. H., v. Beatson, M'Leod, & Co., Limited, -	921
Robertson, Morrisson v. - - - -	332
Robertson v. Johnston, - - - -	383
Roechling Brothers, Horsley Line, Limited, v. - - - -	866
Rorie (Liquidator of Lochee Sawmills Co., Limited), v. Stevenson, -	559
Rosie, Mackay v. - - - -	174
Row and Glasgow, Parish Councils of, Parish Council of Paisley v. -	731
Rudman v. Jay & Co., - - - -	552
Ruthven, Lord, v. Drummond, - - - -	1154
St Andrews and Edinburgh, University Courts of, Nairn v. -	113
St Enoch Shipping Co., Limited, Lang v. - - - -	103
Salvation Army Assurance Society v. British Legal Life Assurance Co., -	1138
Scone's (Lord) Tutor, Earl of Mansfield v. - - - -	459
Scott v. Scott, - - - -	1124
Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, Allgemeine Deutsche Credit Anstalt v. - - - -	33

INDEX OF NAMES.

xi

	Page
Scottish Catholic Printing Co., Limited, Boal v. - - -	667
Scott Stirling & Co., Limited, The Tudor Accumulator Co., Limited, v. -	331
Salkirk v. Ferguson, - - -	26
Shiella, Liquidators of Bruce Peebles & Co., Limited, v. - -	692
Sidway, American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, v. -	500
Sime (Liquidator of the Humboldt Redwood Co., Limited), v. Coats, -	751
Sime, Sullivan, & Dickson's Trustee v. Adam, - - -	32
Sinclair v. Moulin School Board, - - -	772
Sleigh v. Sleigh's Judicial Factor, - - -	1112
Smith, Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, v. -	669
Smith, Harvie v. - - -	474
Somerville v. Leith Docks Commissioners, - - -	797
Southhook Fire-Clay Co., Limited, v. Laughland, - -	831
Spencer & Co., Johnston v. - - -	1015
Stagg & Robson, Limited, v. Stirling, - - -	675
Star Line, Limited, O'Brien v. - - -	1258
Stevenson, Liquidator of Lochee Sawmill Co., Limited, v. -	559
Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow, - - -	1034
Stewart v. M'Dougall, - - -	315
Stewart & Co., Limited, Mullen v. - - -	991
Stewart M'Glashen & Son, Limited, Lindsay v. - -	762
Stewart's Trustees, Gardiners v. - - -	985
Stirling, Stagg & Robson, Limited, v. - - -	675
Strichen Parish Council v. Goodwillie, - - -	835
Suits, Limited, H. M. Advocate v. - - -	1163
Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, v. Lindsay, - - -	754
Tait, &c. (Liquidators of Bruce Peebles & Co., Limited), v. Shiells, -	692
Thomson v. Thomson, - - -	179
Thomson's Mortification, Guardian of - - -	1078
Thomson's Trustees, Allan v. - - -	483
Toal v. North British Railway Co., - - -	48
Torbet, Hay & Co. v. - - -	781
Tudor Accumulator Co., Limited, v. Scott Stirling & Co., Limited, -	331
Turnbull v. Brien, - - -	313
Turnbull & Co., Giersten v. - - -	1101
Turner's Trustees v. Fernie, - - -	883
United Collieries, Limited, Hendry v. - - -	1215
United Collieries, Limited, Muir & Co., Limited, v. - -	768
Walker, Burgoyne v. - - -	321
Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Co., Limited, - - -	123
Wallace v. Hawthorne, Leslie, & Co., Limited, - -	713
Watson (Allan's Executor) v. Allan, - - -	807
Watson v. Gibson & Co., - - -	1092
Watson, National House Property Investment Co., Limited, v. -	888
Wedderburn, Earl of Lauderdale v. - - -	1237
White & Park, Liquidator of Donaldson & Co., Limited, v. -	309
Whitehouse v. Pickett, - - -	218
Wigan v. Cripps, - - -	394
Williamson (Ogilvy's Trustee), Grierson v. - -	959
Wilson v. Pottinger, - - -	580
Wishart, - - -	690
Yeaman (Sleigh's Judicial Factor), Sleigh v. - - -	1112
Zagg v. J. & J. Cunningham, Limited, - - -	827

REGISTRATION APPEAL COURT.

	Page
Niven v. Stewart, - - - - -	290
Stewart, Niven v. - - - - -	290

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL COURT.

Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, - - - - -	596
Arbroath, Assessor for, Webster & Sons v. - - - - -	613
Clyde Navigation Trustees, Assessor for Lanarkshire v. - - - - -	620
Edinburgh, Assessor for, Jenner & Co. v. - - - - -	601
Edinburgh, Assessor for, North British and Mercantile Insurance Co. v. - - - - -	601
Jenner & Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh, - - - - -	601
Lanarkshire, Assessor for, Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees v. - - - - -	596
Lanarkshire, Assessor for, v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, - - - - -	620
Melrose Gas Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Roxburghshire, - - - - -	600
North British and Mercantile Insurance Co. v. Assessor for Edin- burgh, - - - - -	601
Roxburghshire, Assessor for, Melrose Gas Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	600
Webster & Sons v. Assessor for Arbroath, - - - - -	613

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Advocate, H. M., v. Jacob, - - - - -	90
Advocate, H. M., Maguire v. - - - - -	49
Advocate, H. M., Turnbull v. - - - - -	47
Allan v. Neilson, - - - - -	76
Ayr Burgh Prosecutor, Martin v. - - - - -	52
Banff Procurator-Fiscal of Justice of Peace Court, Mitchell v. - - - - -	65
Boyd, Martin v. - - - - -	52
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Roper, - - - - -	69
Conon Fishery Board, Clerk to the, v. Tough, - - - - -	32
Dykes, Stenhouse v. - - - - -	61
Fairbairn v. Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co., Limited, - - - - -	1
Falconer v. Whyte, - - - - -	40

INDEX OF NAMES.

xiii

	Page
Farquharson, Ratcliffe v. - - - - -	71
Findlay v. Walker, - - - - -	2
Forbes v. Main, - - - - -	46
Fyfe, Telford v. - - - - -	83
Glasgow Procurator-Fiscal of Police Court, Allan v. - - - - -	76
Glasgow Procurator-Fiscal of Police Court, Gold v. - - - - -	5
Glasgow Procurator-Fiscal of Police Court, Hasson v. - - - - -	57
Gold v. Neilson, - - - - -	5
Gordon v. Shaw, - - - - -	17
Govan Burgh Prosecutor, Stenhouse v. - - - - -	61
Graham v. Hart, - - - - -	26
Greig v. Macleod, - - - - -	14
Haddington Procurator-Fiscal, Stewart v. - - - - -	8
Hart, Graham v. - - - - -	26
Hart, Sweenie v. - - - - -	81
Hasson v. Neilson, - - - - -	57
Jacob, H. M. Advocate v. - - - - -	90
Lanarkshire Procurator-Fiscal, Graham v. - - - - -	26
Linlithgow Procurator-Fiscal, Forbes v. - - - - -	46
Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co., Limited, Fairbairn v. - - - - -	1
Macleod, Greig v. - - - - -	14
Maguire v. H. M. Advocate, - - - - -	49
Main, Forbes v. - - - - -	46
Mair's Trustees v. Miller, - - - - -	74
Martin v. Boyd, - - - - -	52
Middleton v. Tough, - - - - -	32
Miller, Mair's Trustees v. - - - - -	74
Mitchell v. Morrison, - - - - -	65
Morrison, Mitchell v. - - - - -	65
Neilson, Allan v. - - - - -	76
Neilson, Gold v. - - - - -	5
Neilson, Hasson v. - - - - -	57
Paisley Burgh Prosecutor, Findlay v. - - - - -	2
Paisley Procurator-Fiscal, Sweenie v. - - - - -	81
Ratcliffe v. Farquharson, - - - - -	71
Roper, Caledonian Railway Co. v. - - - - -	69
Shaw, Gordon v. - - - - -	17
Stenhouse v. Dykes, - - - - -	61
Stewart v. Todrick, - - - - -	8
Sweenie v. Hart, - - - - -	81
Telford v. Fyfe, - - - - -	83
Todrick, Stewart v. - - - - -	8
Tough, Middleton v. - - - - -	32
Turnbull v. H. M. Advocate, - - - - -	47
Walker, Findlay v. - - - - -	2
Whyte, Falconer v. - - - - -	40

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

	Page
Audsley, Dick (Dick's Trustee) v. - - - -	27
Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, v.	1
Cameron v. Young, - - - -	7
Clapperton, Train v. - - - -	26
Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, - - - -	10
Crum Brown (Murdoch's Trustees), Weir v. - - - -	3
Dick (Dick's Trustee) v. Audsley, - - - -	27
General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, v. M'Gowan, -	24
Glasgow, Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in, Colquhoun v. - - - -	10
Haddington Corporation, Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. -	6
Laing (Sir James) & Sons, Limited, v. Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited,	1
M'Gowan, General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, v. -	24
Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation, -	6
Murdoch's Trustees, Weir v. - - - -	3
North British Railway Co., Toal v. - - - -	29
Pickett, Whitehouse v. - - - -	31
Toal v. North British Railway Co., - - - -	29
Train v. Clapperton, - - - -	26
Weir v. Crum Brown (Murdoch's Trustees), - - - -	3
Whitehouse v. Pickett, - - - -	31
Young, Cameron v. - - - -	7

ERRATA.

P. 116, line 18 from foot, for Chorlton read Charlton.

P. 161, note 3, for L. R. 1900, 1 Q. B. 413, read L. R. [1899], 1 Q. B. 413.

P. 295, line 22 from foot, for 1897 read 1894.

P. 431, note 1, for 224 read 244.

P. 637, note 1, for 10 S. L. R. 763, read 10 S. L. T. 763.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1907-1908.

SIR JAMES LAING & SONS, LIMITED (Respondents), Appellants.— No. 1.
Clyde, K.C.—F. E. Smith—John Macgregor.
BARCLAY, CURLE, & COMPANY, LIMITED (Petitioners), Respondents.— Nov. 25, 1907.
Dickson, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

Sale—Transference of property—Ship—Property in ship in course of construction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71).—A ship-builder contracted to build a ship for an Italian firm of shipowners. The purchase price was to be paid by instalments at certain stages of the construction. The contract bore that the vessel should not be considered as delivered and finally accepted by the firm until it had passed a certain trial trip. When the ship was completed, and the greater part of the purchase price had been paid, but before the trial trip, the ship was arrested in the hands of the shipbuilder for a debt alleged to be due by the Italian firm to the arresters.

In a petition by the shipbuilder the First Division recalled the arrestments, on the ground that the property in the ship had not passed to the Italian firm.

In an appeal, held (aff. the judgment) that, under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the passing of the property depended on the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract, and, on a construction of the contract, that it was not the intention of the parties here that the property in the ship should pass until it was finally handed over to the shipowners, and appeal dismissed.

(In the Court of Session Nov. 7, 1907, 1908 S. C., p. 82.)

Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, respondents, appealed.

After hearing counsel for the appellants,—

Ld. Chancellor
(Loreburn).
Earl of Halsbury.
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Lord James of Hereford.
Ld. Robertson.
Ld. Atkinson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is not necessary to trouble the learned counsel for the respondents in this case, because the question is whether the property passed, and whether the parties intended by the contract that it should pass. I do not know that any conclusive use can be made of a comparison with other contracts and the language that is used in regard to them in judgments. Speaking for myself, I always have some misgiving when presumptions in regard to the interpretation that is to be put upon particular words in a contract apart from their natural significance are put forward. It may be a very useful guide to look at other decisions, but, after all, the question is what the parties said and intended. The facts referred to by Mr Clyde and Mr Smith, namely, that the ship was to be paid for by instalments, and that there was a power of inspection on the part of the purchasers, may be

Nov. 25, 1907.

Sir James
 Laing & Sons,
 Limited, v.
 Barclay,
 Curle, & Co.,
 Limited.

marks pointing to the property passing, but they are not conclusive, and the question still remains as to what the contract really means.

I think the contract was for a completed ship, and the risk lay upon the builders until delivery, and there was no intention to make delivery or to part with the property until the vessel was completed. Under those circumstances, I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that a contract might be so framed as to give the purchaser power to claim the property in those parts which, when they are put together, make the complete ship; but in each case the question must be whether or not the contract has been such, and I think this has not been so made.

I confess I follow the judgment of the learned Lord President in Scotland with one little exception. I think the phrase that he has used about the presumption being in favour of the builders perhaps was not sufficiently considered by him. Perhaps he did not think it necessary; but if he had used a different phrase—if as a matter of proof the wood, the iron, the nails, and so forth, which constituted the ship ultimately, are once the builders' and are proved to be the builders', it does become necessary to shew that there is some contract transferring that property under the circumstances to the purchaser; and if instead of saying there was a presumption that it belonged to the builders, and proceeding upon the presumption, he had said that the proof was that it was the builders' property, and it became necessary to shew that the builder had divested himself of the property, and to shew that by the words of the contract it had become the property of somebody else—if he had said that, I should have entirely agreed. From the reasoning of the rest of the judgment I really do think that that is what the learned Judge meant. It was not a considered judgment, I understand, and the phrase that there was a presumption that it belonged to the builder was one used in the course of the argument, and in the sense in which I have explained it I should concur with it, otherwise I should not say that there was any presumption one way or the other. The question is, what is the contract, and by that contract to whom does the property belong?

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I concur.

LORD ROBERTSON.—The question in the present appeal seems to me to be governed by the Sale of Goods Act, and, by that statute, to be determinable by the intention of the instrument under which the ship is built. In aid and supplement of construction, the statute supplies certain rules; but these may or may not come in operation, according as the contract requires it. In the present case I find the contract to require no aid or supplement from the statutory rules, for it seems to me to provide from beginning to completion of this ship for the building of it by the shipbuilders with their materials, and transfers it to the purchasers only as a finished ship and at a stage not in fact yet reached. This is a simple view of the matter; but, in my judgment, it is the sound one. It treats the Sale of Goods Act as superseding the previous law; and if in some instance it may be found necessary to revive and reconstruct the old common law for purposes of illustration, I Nov. 25, 1907. can only say that that occasion has not yet come.

I therefore concur in the conclusion of the Court of Session, which rests on the contract. It seems right, however, to say that this does not imply my concurrence in all that is said, by way of statement of doctrine, in the judgments of the learned Lords. Some of them seem open to exception or at least criticism, but the judgments of the learned Judges do not seem to have been at least minutely considered. Among matters of omission I think the fifth head of the 18th section of the Act is so directly applicable that it required perhaps more attention than it has received. But I do not require to enter on those disputable matters, as the ground of judgment which your Lordships adopt is common to us and to their Lordships of the First Division.

Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited, v.
Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited.

Ld. Robertson.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

ORDERED that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

PRITCHARD, ENGLEFIELD, & CO.—STEEDMAN, RAMAGE, & CO., W.S.—BURCHELLS—
H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.

ALEXANDER MURDOCH WEIR AND OTHERS (Murdoch's Next of Kin) No. 2.
(Claimants), Appellants.—Upjohn, K.C.—C. D. Murray.
ALEXANDER CRUM BROWN AND OTHERS (John Murdoch's Trustees) Feb. 6, 1908.
(Pursuers, Real Raisers, and Claimants), Respondents.—Clyde, K.C. Weir v. Crum —Cullen, K.C.—Gillon. Brown.

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—Constitution—Construction—Uncertainty—Succession.—A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to employ the residue of his estate "in instituting and carrying on a scheme for the relief of indigent bachelors and widowers, of whatever religious denomination or belief they may be, who have shewn practical sympathy, either as amateurs or professionals, in the pursuits of science in any of its branches, whose lives have been characterised by sobriety, morality, and industry, and who are not less than fifty-five years of age, or of aiding any scheme which now exists or may be instituted by others for that purpose."

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) (1) that the bequest was "charitable," and therefore entitled to a benignant construction; and (2) that so construed it was not void from uncertainty.

(In the Court of Session, Dec. 4, 1906, 1907 S. C. 185.)

Alexander Murdoch Weir and others, Murdoch's next of kin, appealed.

The case was heard on 16th January 1908.

The House took time for consideration.

Ld. Chancellor
(Loreburn).
Lord Mac-
naghten.
Ld. Robertson.
Ld. Atkinson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question in this case is whether a charitable bequest is to be treated as void for uncertainty. The bequest was of an unusual kind. Its object, according to the will, was to benefit persons who had shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science. A number of conditions were prescribed. The recipients of this bounty were, among other things, to be widowers or bachelors of fifty-five years of age or upwards, whose lives had been characterised by sobriety and other specified virtues.

Feb. 6, 1908.

Weir v. Crum
Brown.

Lord
Chancellor.

They were to be indigent, a provision which stamps the bequest as charitable. These conditions were not really canvassed in argument and need not be further considered, for no one of them is such as to impart to the bequest an uncertainty which will vitiate it in law.

The only point seriously made against this clause in the will is that the recipients of this charity were to be persons who had "shewed practical sympathy in the pursuits of science." These words have been subjected to a rigorous criticism. What is science, it was asked, and how are we to know its bounds? What is sympathy in the pursuits of science, and when and how does it become practical? What are pursuits of science in the plural as distinguished from pursuit in the singular? The thought underlying this current of observation seems to be that, if a bequest is to a class of persons, the class must be capable of being defined, and be defined so precisely that there can rarely be a doubt who does or who does not fall within it.

Now, there is no better rule than that a benignant construction will be placed upon charitable bequests. It is difficult to imagine a construction less benignant than that suggested by criticisms such as those to which I have alluded. Few indeed are the charitable bequests that could survive such an ordeal. The fact is that whenever any one wishes to describe a class of people otherwise than by referring to their age, sex, birthplace, or similar facts capable of precise ascertainment, the language used must of necessity be general, and there must always be numerous cases on the border line. Deserving literary men who have not been successful, poor members of a particular trade, reduced gentlewomen, are examples of classes of persons who may certainly be benefited; but in each case exactly the same reasoning might be used as was used in the present case to destroy the validity of the will. There is no law requiring that kind and degree of certainty. All that can be required is that the description of the class to be benefited shall be sufficiently certain to enable men of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator. I have no doubt that this can be done here. Persons who have shewn practical sympathy in an object obviously are persons who have given time or money or made some sort of sacrifice to further it. I am satisfied that the trustees or, failing them, the Court, would find no difficulty in giving effect to the bequest. Accordingly I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed. The parties have agreed that the appellants are to have their judicial expenses of appeal out of the trust funds, the expenses as awarded in the Court of Session to remain unaltered. I think your Lordships may properly act upon this agreement.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—To my mind the difficulty in this appeal—and it is, I think, a real difficulty—is to discover any substance in the appellants' case.

The gift is a gift in perpetuity, to be administered by trustees, for the benefit of bachelors and widowers, poor and aged, whose lives have been characterised by sobriety, morality, and industry, "and who have shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science in any of its branches." This gift, it is said, is void for uncertainty. Why? The relief of those who suffer from the ills of poverty and the weight of advancing years is, by common consent, the peculiar province of charity in its popular as well as Feb. 6, 1908.

in its legal sense. Unhappily it is only too easy to recognise the aged and Weir v. Crum the poor, who are always with us. Then, I suppose, it has happened to Brown.
most men to have formed an opinion satisfactory at least to themselves as Lord Mac-to the moral and the general character of some applicant for some employ- naghten.
ment or other. Notwithstanding the ingenious argument of the learned counsel who spoke second, I cannot think that the task is really beyond the capacity of any ordinary individual.

There remains one other qualification to be considered. What is science?
and what is "practical sympathy in the pursuits of science?"

Science, it was said, is so vague and comprehensive a term as to be unmeaning. In the view of the Lord Ordinary, "'Science' is a term of no definite or 'particular' meaning." That is certainly not the view of the Legislature. There are, for instance, many enactments in favour of institutions formed for the advancement of "science." The generality of the word has never prevented the Court from applying to the particular case before it the provisions of the Act under its consideration. But what is "practical sympathy"? "An altogether nebulous phrase," says the Lord Ordinary. It is not, perhaps, a happy expression. But if you follow the directions of the testator with a willing mind it is, I think, perfectly intelligible. The wish of the testator was to help those who are in need of help, and who may have done something, much or little, in the way of promoting some branch of science. Within the realms of science the field of choice is wide. But the testator has taken pains to provide competent judges. It is for the trustees to consider and determine the value of the service on which a candidate may rest his claim to participate in the testator's bounty.

I think that the case is much too clear for argument, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I must own that I think this a perfectly clear case.
If it is said of any one that he has shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science, this is merely a roundabout way of saying that he has helped the pursuits of science; just as to shew practical sympathy with A B means to help A B. Again, the word "science" embraces a wide but perfectly ascertainable range of subjects. Accordingly I consider the meaning of this testator to be plain and intelligible.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed, and that the appellants have their judicial expenses of appeal out of the trust funds, the expenses as awarded in the Court of Session to remain unaltered.

COLLYER-BRISTOW & Co.—MURRAY LAWSON & DARLING, S.S.C.—
JOHN KENNEDY, W.S.—J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.

No. 3. MONTGOMERIE & COMPANY, LIMITED (Pursuers), Appellants.—

Clyde, K.C.—R. S. Horne.

Feb. 21, 1908.

THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCILLORS OF HADDINGTON
(Defenders), Respondents.—D.-F. Campbell—Malcolm.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

Police—Drainage—Sewers—Formation—Procedure—Statute—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 217, 220, 221—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), sec. 103—Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 24), secs. 1-5 and 7.—Held (off. judgment of Second Division) that notwithstanding the provisions of the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water Supply Act, 1901, it is competent for the town-council of a burgh, as sewerage authority in the burgh, (1) to carry out drainage operations in the burgh under the powers conferred by the 103d section of the Public Health Act, 1897, and (2) to do so without following the procedure or being subject to the conditions imposed by the Burgh Police Act, 1892.

Ld. Chancellor
(Loreburn).
Ld. Robertson.
Lord Collins.

(IN the Court of Session, Nov. 12, 1907, 1908 S. C. 127.)
The pursuers, Montgomerie & Company, Limited, appealed.
The case was heard upon 21st February 1908.
The respondents' counsel were not called upon.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I agree with the conclusion of the Second Division for one short reason. The pursuers' contention is that the works executed by the defenders could not lawfully be executed without their consent as required by section 217 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. Now, in my opinion that section does not touch this case at all. The Act of 1892 furnished burghs with one method of carrying out sewerage works. Another Act, the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, furnished burghs with another method of carrying out sewerage works; and each of those methods was complete in itself. In 1901 an Act was passed which put an end to some of the differences between those two methods, and also contained section 5, which to my mind is the only section of that Act which really concerns us to-day. By that section a burgh obtained or retained all the powers created by the Acts of 1892 and 1897, save as altered by the Act of 1901; and the Act of 1897 was incorporated with the Act of 1892 so far as was necessary to give effect to that enactment.

In my opinion the defenders, as the result, possess the right either to proceed under the Act of 1892—in which case the pursuers' consent was, I assume, needed—or to proceed under the Act of 1897, in which case the consent was not needed. They elected to take the latter course. The appellants cannot dispute that if consent was not needed their appeal must fail. But they say that the effect of incorporating the later with the earlier Act was to qualify the powers of the later Act by the restrictions contained in the earlier, and that as consent is required by the Act of 1892 so it is now required, when the powers of the Act of 1897 are exercised, because of incorporation.

I can see no foundation for this view. Section 217 of the Act of 1892, which requires the consent, is expressed to be a restriction only as to what is contained in that Act. If the appellants' contention prevails, the mere incorporation of a later Act would make it a restriction as to what is not so contained. Feb. 21, 1908.

I think that this is really a plain case, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I concur, and for the reasons which have been given by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. In reaching this conclusion I do not suppose that your Lordships applaud the legislation as it stands, and it is doubtful whether it is either symmetrical or even entirely coherent; but I am afraid as regards some modern legislation the maxim applies, which primarily relates to an earlier system: Non omnium quæ a majoribus nostris constitutæ sunt ratio reddi potest.

LORD COLLINS.—I am of the same opinion.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

JOHN KENNEDY, W.S.—T. S. PATERSON, W.S.—GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—
JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.

MRS ANN CAMERON AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Appellants.—
C. D. Murray.

No. 4.

JAMES YOUNG AND ALEXANDER YOUNG (Defenders), Respondents.—
Macmillan—H. W. Beveridge.

Feb. 27, 1908.

Cameron v.
Young.

Lease—Contract—Breach of Contract—Insanitary House—Title to Sue—Wife and Children of Tenant.—Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the wife and children of the tenant of a dwelling-house had no title to sue the landlord for damages for loss and injury caused to them by illness due to the insanitary condition of the house.

(In the Court of Session, Jan. 26, 1907 S. C. 475.)

Robert Cameron, tenant of a house in Crieff, Mrs Ann Cameron, his wife, and William, James, and Neil Cameron, his three sons, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Stirling against James Young and Alexander Young, bakers, Stirling, the proprietors of the house, for damages for injury to their health arising from defective drains. Ld.Chancellor (Loreburn). Lord Macnaghten. Ld.Robertson. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Collins.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) It being an implied condition of the let by the defenders' factor to the pursuer Robert Cameron that defenders would keep the premises so let in a habitable and tenantable condition, and the pursuers having suffered in health in consequence of their failure to do so, they are entitled to reparation therefor from the defenders. (2) The several pursuers having sustained loss, injury, and damage through the fault or culpable negligence of the defenders, and the several sums claimed by the pursuers respectively being fair and reasonable compensation, decree should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action. (7) If it be the fact, as condescended on by the pursuers, that they continued to live in said house after they considered it unfit for their habitation, they are barred from suing for damages on account of injury to their health.

On 21st June 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Dean Leslie) repelled

Feb. 27, 1908. the defenders' first plea in law, sustained the defenders' second and seventh pleas in law, and dismissed the action.

Cameron v.
Young.

On appeal the Sheriff (Lees), on 1st August 1906, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, sustained the defenders' first plea in law in so far as regards the pursuers other than Robert Cameron, and found that these pursuers had no title to sue; assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action so far as at the instance of these pursuers; and allowed to the pursuer Robert Cameron and to the defenders a proof before further answer of their averments.

The pursuer Robert Cameron appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial, and the other pursuers appealed against the interlocutor of the Sheriff.

The First Division, on 26th January 1907, allowed the pursuer Robert Cameron issues, and found that the other pursuers had no title to sue.

Subsequently Robert Cameron's claim was compromised, and the other pursuers, his wife and children, appealed.

In the appeal the appellants contended that they were entitled to damages for the injury they had sustained through the landlord's negligence in allowing the house to fall into a state of disrepair dangerous to persons having a lawful occasion to be on the premises.

The appeal was heard on 20th January 1908.

The House took time for consideration.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Robertson. I agree with it, and have nothing to add.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I have had the same advantage, and I also concur, and have nothing to add.

LORD ROBERTSON.—The facts giving rise to the important question now before the House are of the simplest. The respondents let to one Robert Cameron, the husband and father of the appellants, a dwelling-house at Crieff. The house was allowed to get out of repair in the matter of drains; disease was generated owing to this neglect, and Cameron and his family, the appellants, suffered accordingly. Cameron's own claim for damages was sued by him in this action; but he has been settled with, and is out of the case. The question is whether the appellants, who are not parties to the contract of lease, have a good ground of action against the landlord.

It seems to me perfectly clear that they have not; and I rest my opinion, not alone on the authority of Cavalier v. Pope,¹ but on principle common to the laws of Scotland and of England, which *Cavalier v. Pope*¹ applied.

These respondents were perfectly entitled to let this house or not to let it, and in either case they were entitled to allow the house to fall to pieces and the drains with it, so long as they did not injure any neighbour (by which I, of course, mean any neighbour in vicinage, whether the title of that neighbour was of property or of passage) or violate any existing law of nuisance, the only restraint on their action being obligations of contract with their tenant. Now it happens that in the present instance they were under such obligation to their tenant, by virtue of a condition which the Feb. 27, 1908.

¹ [1906] A. C. 428.

 Scottish law implies in leases of urban houses, that the landlord shall not ^{Cameron v.} only give the tenant a habitable house, but maintain it in that state. It ^{Young.} ought to be, but apparently is not, superfluous to say that if the law implies ^{Ld. Robertson.}
 this condition it is because this is the customary arrangement in Scottish towns, and therefore, when nothing is said to the contrary, parties are taken to have agreed to it. That an obligation to maintain a house habitable is not an essential term or obligation of the tenure of real property in Scotland, but a matter of agreement, is indeed most strikingly proved by the fact that, in the case of farmhouses, the contrary is the presumption of liability; for there it is the tenant, and not the landlord, on whom this duty of maintenance falls. It thus appears that the landlord's liability is conventional and contractual, and not the less so where it is implied by law and not written in the contract.

The argument for the appellants has indeed rested on invoking principles of the law of neighbours which have nothing to do with the rights of inhabitants of the house. Those principles are embodied in a distinct chapter of Scottish law, and are concerned with what may be called the external or foreign relations of the owner of a house. There he is liable, because the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non lœdas necessarily imposes on the proprietor the duty of exercising that measure of care which will avoid injury accruing to his neighbour from his house. He must not allow his house to get into such disrepair that it falls down on his neighbour's house, or injures the passer-by in the street. In all those cases the person injured and claiming damages stands on his own rights; and his relation to the offending or negligent proprietor is not constituted or measured by any voluntary contract.

These principles have no application at all to persons who are within the house, for they have and can have no right to be there except by the licence of the owner, given by the owner, on certain terms, to the person with whom he chooses to contract. Nor can it be omitted from notice that if the appellants' contention were sound, the liability of the landlord may be indefinitely increased or diminished according to the domestic or social relations or tastes of the tenant over which the landlord has no control.

I have examined all the cases prior to Cavalier v. Pope,¹ which were cited at the bar; and with one apparent, but not real, exception, and one real exception, there is none which conflicts with that decision. All fall within the category of external relations which I have discussed.

The apparent exception is the case of Shields v. Dalziel,² in the First Division. There it is quite true that the claim which the Court allowed was that of the wife of the tenant, and not of the tenant. I must, however, point out that neither in the written pleadings nor in the oral argument did the landlord question or object to the title or instance of the wife, the defence being rested on totally different grounds. The pleadings were written and the argument was conducted by very able counsel, and presumably they deliberately abstained from stating this plea. Suffice it to say that the present question was not before the Court, and the decision in

¹ [1906] A. C. 428.

² 24 R. 849.

Feb. 27, 1908. *Shields v. Dalziel*¹ is not a judgment adverse to the doctrine of Cavalier v. Pope.²

Cameron v.
Young.

Ld. Robertson.

The other case, which I have called an exception, is Hall v. Hubner,³ decided by the Second Division. There the landlord argued that "the pursuer being the tenant's wife was . . . a stranger to the landlord, and must seek her remedy not against him but the tenant." The learned Judges, in their reported opinions, take no notice of this argument; but their judgment allowing issues to be lodged amounted to its rejection. This decision, I therefore think, cannot be supported; but this is the only and the slender support of the appellants' case to be found in the Scottish cases prior to Cavalier v. Pope.²

I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD ATKINSON and LORD COLLINS concurred.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed.

WALTER H. GUTHRIE—MURRAY LAWSON & DARLING, S.S.C.—
A. & W. BEVERIDGE—MATHIE, MACLUCKIE, & LUPTON, Stirling—MORTON, SMART, MACDONALD, & PROSSER, W.S.

No. 5. JAMES COLQUHOUN AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Appellants.—Macmillan—Maitland.

Mar. 17, 1908.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

THE SOCIETY OF CONTRIBUTORS TO THE WIDOWS' FUND OF THE FACULTY OF PROCURATORS IN GLASGOW AND OTHERS (Defenders), Respondents.—Sir R. Finlay, K.C.—Hunter, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Insurance—Widows' Fund of Corporation—Contributor expelled from the Corporation—Right to remain a contributor—Glasgow Faculty of Procurators Widows' Fund Act, 1833 (3 Will. IV. c. lxiv.)—Glasgow Faculty of Procurators Act, 1875 (38 Vict. cap. vi.), sec. 3.—By the Act 3 Will. IV. c. lxiv., 1833, the contributors to the Glasgow Procurators' Widows' Fund were incorporated into a Society, and every person under fifty years of age becoming a member of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow was required to become a contributor and to continue to subscribe "so long as he lives." Only members of the Faculty were entitled to become contributors. The purpose of the fund was declared to be the payment of certain provisions "to the widows and children of the members of said Faculty who now are or may hereafter become entitled to the benefit of the fund under the provisions of this Act."

By the Act 38 Vict. c. vi., sec. 3, it was enacted that after the passing of the Act [April 1875], "No person shall be obliged or be entitled to become a member of the Society or a contributor to the fund."

In 1901 C., a Glasgow procurator, who had become a contributor to the Widows' Fund in 1870, was struck off the roll of the Faculty in respect of his having been convicted of a crime, and subsequently the Widows' Fund Society declined to receive his contributions.

In an action of declarator brought by C. and his wife and children against the Widows' Fund Society, the First Division, Lord M'Laren dissenting, held that as C. was no longer a member of the Faculty of Procurators he was not entitled to contribute to the Widows' Fund, and that at his death his widow and children would have no right to the benefit of the fund.

In an appeal, held (rev. the judgment diss. the Earl of Halsbury, Lord Robertson, and Lord Collins) that while it was a condition of a person being admitted as a member of the Widows' Fund that he should be a member of Mar. 17, 1908. the Faculty of Procurators, it was not a condition of the contract of insurance that he should continue to be a member of that Faculty during his life, and that C. was still a contributor.

¹ 24 R. 849.

² [1906] A. C. 428.

³ 24 R. 875.

Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

Ld. Chancellor (Loreburn).

Earl of Halsbury.

Lord Macnaghten.

Lord James of Hereford.

Ld. Robertson.

Ld. Atkinson.

Lord Collins.

(In the Court of Session Dec. 22, 1904, 7 F. 345.)

On 22d January 1904 James Colquhoun, his wife, and children, raised an action against the Society of Contributors to the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, and David Murray, LL.D., writer, Glasgow, and others, the trustees of the Society, concluding (1) for reduction of a minute or resolution of the Society dated 4th February 1901, whereby it was resolved that James Colquhoun had ceased to be a contributor to the Widows' Fund, or to have any interest therein; and whereby it was also resolved to strike his name off the list of contributors; and (2) for declarator that, notwithstanding the passing of said minute or resolution, James Colquhoun was, at the date thereof, and still is, a contributor to the Widows' Fund, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits of a contributor, and that his wife and children were, notwithstanding the said resolution, still entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits of the widow and children of a contributor to said Widows' Fund.

On 22d December 1904 the First Division by a majority (Lord President Kinross, Lord Adam, and Lord Kinnear, diss. Lord M'Laren) dismissed the action.

The pursuers appealed.

The appeal was heard on 10th and 11th June 1907 before the Lord Chancellor (Lord Loreburn), Lord James of Hereford, Lord Robertson, and Lord Collins, and afterwards on 6th February 1908 before their Lordships along with the Earl of Halsbury, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Atkinson.

The House took time for consideration.

On 17th March 1908,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case has been twice argued.

James Colquhoun, the appellant in this appeal, became a member of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow in 1870. Under an Act of Parliament then in force he was obliged to join, and did join, the Society of Contributors, which was a mutual insurance society for members of the Faculty, regulated by that Act. He paid a considerable entrance fee and an annual subscription down to the year 1899. Subsequently he was expelled from the Faculty for misconduct, and the Society claim that they also were entitled to expel him and to deprive him of all the benefits derived from his membership and past subscriptions. The question for your Lordships is whether this Society was so entitled; and that question must be solved by reference to the Act itself, which is 3 Will. IV. c. lxiv.

To begin with, this much is clear, Mr Colquhoun cannot be deprived of these benefits as a punishment for his misconduct. There is not a word in the Act which upon any construction can authorise the Society to deprive on the ground of delinquency where they could not otherwise deprive. If Mr Colquhoun is to lose the fruit of his insurance it must be on the ground that he is no longer a member of the Faculty, a ground which would apply whatsoever may have been the cause of his ceasing to be a member. And so it comes to this: Ought we to construe this Act of Parliament as meaning that whenever a member of the Faculty ceases to be a member he

Mar. 17, 1908. must necessarily also cease to be a member of and contributor to the insurance society?

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

Lord
Chancellor.

It is a question of contract. What were the terms on which Mr Colquhoun became a contributor to this Society? I think this is to be settled by the Act alone, and that no help can be gained by referring to anything beyond it.

Under the scheme of the Act any procurator who joins the Faculty is compelled to join the insurance society also, and thenceforward to subscribe to it as long as he lives, not, be it observed, for so long as he remains a member of the Faculty. He is allowed to renounce the benefits in due form, and will thereupon cease to have any interest in the fund. Also he may forfeit them by specified acts or omissions, all of which relate to some default relative to the fund itself. There is no provision that ceasing to be a member of the Faculty shall entail consequences so serious, and I cannot see any sufficient reason for implying such a provision.

It would operate very harshly upon those who had compounded for or, to use the language of section 27, "redeemed" their annual contributions; also upon any member of the Faculty who, having for many years paid to this fund, desired to quit the Faculty for another profession.

Between two equally admissible interpretations the more reasonable should be preferred. And if an Act will read equally well whether or not an unexpressed condition be implied, a Court ought surely not to imply a condition that works hardship. In my view this Act set up a statutory contract of insurance. Even if I thought the Act admitted of it, I would not imply a condition most onerous to the assured unless the Act also required it. But in the present case I do not think there is an ambiguity.

I am of opinion that, according to the letter of the Act, any member of the Faculty who once becomes a contributor to the fund is entitled to continue a contributor, and is entitled to the benefits offered in exchange, even though he ceases to be a member of the Faculty.

Under section 16, on payment of his entry-money, a member of the Faculty becomes a contributor to the fund "and entitled to the benefit thereof, under the provisions of this Act." Under section 18 such person is bound to pay the Society an annual contribution "during his life." And under section 9 one of the purposes of the fund is "payment to the widows and children of the members of said Faculty who now are or may hereafter become entitled to the benefit of the fund under the provisions of this Act, as hereinafter specified." All that is required is that the person entering the Society should be a member of the Faculty when he enters it. In my opinion the position of any member of the Faculty who has paid his entry-money is as follows:—He may renounce, he may redeem, he may forfeit the benefits for some cause specified in the Act. But if none of these things happen he is required to keep up his annual contributions whether he remains a member of the Faculty or not, and is entitled in return to the benefits like any other contributor.

Accordingly, with the utmost respect, I am unable to agree with the judgment of the First Division.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I think it is a very relevant consideration that the corporate body we are now dealing with has from its earliest institution Mar. 17, 1908. been confined to a separate professional class, and that from the year 1796 till 1833 and 1875 it has continued to be so confined and to the present day is undoubtedly so confined that no one can demand to be admitted within it unless he is a member of the class in question.

Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

It is not denied that for entry into the Corporation and its ancillary charitable provisions a person must be a member of the Faculty of Procurators. If he is, he may take a part in its government and, among other things, has his chance of being entrusted with the management and distribution of its funds.

Earl of Halsbury.

By section 2 of the Act of 1833, which is described as an Act for the better establishing and securing a fund for providing annuities to the widows and children of the members of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow, a scheme for the election of its officers is enacted which is described to be for the proper administration of the funds of the Society and management of the affairs thereof, and it provides that any member of the Society may be re-elected, or any other member may be elected also by section 11; former regulations as to the fund are cancelled by the statute, and it is enacted that in future the fund shall be administered in pursuance of the new enactment.

Up to the passing of the Act a person to be admitted was required to serve a regular apprenticeship for five years with one of the members of the Faculty, but by section 15 of the Act the Faculty was authorised to receive and admit any person who should be found duly qualified "in terms of the original charter, and upon such terms as to payments as the said Faculty and the said Society hereby constituted shall from time to time appoint."

I presume doubt had been raised as to the lawfulness of some of the appropriations of a portion of the funds, since by section 8 the appropriation of certain portions of "the funds of the said Faculty of Procurators" was declared to be lawful, and by section 9 the declaration of the object of the trust, after providing for the necessary charges, goes on to declare what is relevant to the present questions before your Lordships for provision and payment of an annuity to the widows severally and children of deceased members of the said Faculty.

The concluding words of that section seem to me most important: "And in the last place for provision and payment of an annuity to the widows severally and children of deceased members of the said Faculty, contributors to the fund and Society hereby established, and for payment to the widows and children of the members of said Faculty who now are or may hereafter become entitled to the benefit of the fund under the provisions of this Act as hereinafter specified. And it shall not be lawful to apply the said fund to any other use or purpose whatsoever."

Now, it will be observed that this is the section which defines the object of the trust and which prohibits any other disposition of its funds. That part of it which is relevant to the discussion defines the object as widows of members of the Faculty who were contributors, and must have been both members and contributors—in the latter part of the section it says "members of the said Faculty contributors to the fund and Society hereby established."

Mar. 17, 1908.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

Earl of Halsbury.

It seems to me impossible to construe the words here used as if they permitted the qualification for an annuity to cover the case of a widow who did not fill the character of a widow who became a widow by the death of her husband while he was a member of the Faculty and besides being a member of the Faculty had also been a contributor to the fund.

I do not think the question of forfeiture or loss of money comes into the question of construction. It is a question of what this definition of the object of the trust means, and, with all respect for those who think differently, I cannot doubt what the true construction is, much as I respect the views of those who differ. It may, of course, present a case calculated to raise a feeling that some injustice is being done when a man who has paid this contribution for twenty-nine years is refused permission to continue his contributions and thus lose for his wife and children a provision intended for them; but upon the question of construction it is immaterial whether it was twenty-nine years or twenty-nine days. If the contributor died within the first year and was a detected thief the day after his entry the construction must be the same. For my own part, I cannot understand why a member of such a Society, which means to confine the right to enter it to those possessing a particular professional qualification, is not supposed to possess throughout the qualification without which he could not have entered the Society.

Neither am I much impressed by the absence of a distinct provision that such a qualification is taken away by the person being detected as a thief. And, as I understand the argument, it is not now denied that, quite apart from the express power by later legislation, it was quite within the powers of the governing body to deprive the appellant of his character of procurator. Yet because of his having contributed to the society, which is simply ancillary to it, it is argued he is still entitled to remain a contributor.

I think that I misunderstood Lord M'Laren's observations¹ as to the power which every corporation possesses both of disfranchisement and amotion for heinous crimes, such as embezzlement undoubtedly is—see Lord Mansfield's judgment in *Rex v. Mayor of Liverpool*²; and though the loss of pecuniary profit may follow as a consequence, it seems to me fallacious to treat as itself a penalty what is the consequence of a loss of qualification, and the whole question seems to me to depend upon whether being a Glasgow procurator is or is not a qualification for joining in the society for providing funds for the widows and children of Glasgow procurators.

I have hitherto referred to the section which declares the object of the trust, but there is nothing in the rest of the Act which seems to me to militate against the construction I put upon that section. On the contrary, the title and preamble of the Act of 1833 seem to me to disclose with some distinctness the purpose of the Act, and certainly I should not suppose from the language used it was contemplated to erect two different societies, since the objects sought to be obtained are to be "the objects of the said incorporation." The charter granted, and the Act referred to, or said to be the Act, is said to be for the better and more convenient distribution of the funds thereof; still, be it observed, it is assumed to be the same corporation, and the Act is for the better and more convenient distribution of the funds thereof. Mar. 17, 1908.

¹ 7 F. 352.

² (1759) 2 Burr. 723, 731.

The preamble proceeds to recite that the said Faculty appropriated certain sums of money from the said funds and other contributions from the then present members and future members of the said Faculty, for establishing a fund or scheme for members and widows and children of the said Faculty contributors—observe it is still members who are within this description, but they must also be contributors. It goes on to mention that at a meeting of the members on 5th February 1827, amended regulations were made and approved of by the said Faculty at the time. Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.
Earl of Halsbury.

It then recites several alterations and amendments in the said scheme, that members of the said Faculty made certain alterations for the better management and distribution of the said fund. It then recites the great increase of the said fund by the contribution of the members of the said Faculty. It declares that it is expedient, without prejudice to what has been done, that the said Faculty should be enabled more effectually to manage the said fund and to extend the usefulness thereof by making provision for more ample annuities to the widows and children of the members of the said Faculty who may be willing to contribute for that purpose, and to adopt certain regulations for the more sure establishment and better administration of the said fund, and for the continuance of the benefits thereof, but which objects cannot be carried into effect without the authority of Parliament.

It then proceeds to enact that all and each of the members of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow and every other person who shall hereafter become members of and contributors to the said fund in manner after mentioned shall be and are hereby declared to be members of and contributors to such fund established under the provisions of this Act, and shall be called the Society of Contributors to the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

It is an old observation that in construing an Act of this character it is not the language of the Legislature itself, but the language which the promoters have used and to which the Legislature has assented.

I say this because the words I have quoted are in some respects slipshod and inaccurate. I do not know, speaking accurately, what is the meaning of the words "members of a fund," but it is impossible not to see what the draftsman intended. He has throughout referred to the Faculty and its members in respect of the greatly increased contributions by the Faculty, the enabling of the said Faculty effectively to manage and to extend its usefulness, and for giving more ample annuities to widows and children of "the members of the said Faculty who may be willing to contribute for that purpose."

From first to last I can find no trace of any intention to establish a fund independent of and not for the benefit of the profession of the Faculty of Procurators. That some words were necessary when the rule of compulsory contribution was abolished is plain enough, and that they only should be entitled who contributed is one thing, but that people who were not members of the Faculty should be entitled to contribute is another and a very different thing.

Mar. 17, 1908.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

Earl of Halsbury.

I do not think it is very relevant to the matter now in hand to consider the cases where by voluntary retirement the contributions should cease; they are provided for.

The very last words of the 1st section quoted by some of your Lordships describe the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

It is in view of the preamble and the enacting part of the 1st section that I think the 29th and 30th sections so important. It does not appear to me that there was ever any intention to alter the constitution of the Society, but the abolition of the compulsory contribution rendered appropriate an alteration of the phraseology, which, however, has not throughout been observed with strict accuracy, but the language appears to me to be sufficiently plain that while only the contributing members of the Society should receive the benefit, it is assumed all through that they must be members of the Faculty.

I am afraid I do not follow the argument derived from the statement that the relation between the corporation and its members is that of contract. There is no other contract than that of becoming a member of the corporation, and as such liable to all the incidents which belong to an individual corporator.

Lord Mansfield said the causes of the amotion of a corporator are,¹ first, offences against the duties of his office as a corporator; secondly, crimes in their own nature heinous and against the offender's general duty as a subject; yet not particularly relating to his corporate office or duty. It can hardly be doubted that the offence of embezzlement comes within Lord Mansfield's second category and requires no express contract that he should be removable for such a cause.

It would be intolerable that because a man was once a corporator the non-criminal corporators should be compelled to associate with and take part in the business of the corporation with a person who had been convicted of theft and suffered the punishment of penal servitude.

It is by the act of the person thus guilty that what is called his loss is incurred, and, indeed, it is not quite accurate to describe it as if his investment was entirely lost. During the twenty-nine years he had the security of his investment for his wife and children if at any time he had died during the period; and if in the end the pension has been lost, it is because he had committed a crime which involved the loss of his qualification when he was found out.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment below was right and ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In 1870 the appellant, James Colquhoun, became a member of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, a corporation established in 1796 by Royal Charter. At the same time he became a member of a mutual insurance society styled "The Society of the Contributors to the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow." This Society was constituted by Act of Parliament in 1833. The Act provides in section 16 that no person shall be admitted a member of the Faculty of Procurators without first paying entry-money to the Widows' Fund, and that after such payment the person admitted as a member of the Faculty of Procurators shall be "held and deemed a contributor to or member of the fund, and entitled to the benefits thereof under the provisions of this Act."

¹ Rex v. Mayor of Liverpool, 2 Burr. 733.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

In March 1900 James Colquhoun having been convicted of embezzlement, was struck off the roll of the Faculty. The trustees of the insurance society then removed his name from the list of the Society. It is not suggested that their action was justified by the crime which James Colquhoun had committed. Misconduct has nothing whatever to do with the position taken up by the respondents. Their attitude apparently would have been just the same if James Colquhoun had left the Faculty with an unblemished character and of his own free will. Their contention is that if a person becomes a member of the Society, and so by statute entitled to the benefits of its fund, and afterwards, from any cause or for any reason, ceases to be a member of the Faculty of Procurators, his statutory rights as member of the insurance society are at once extinguished and all his contributions confiscated for the benefit of the Society. Is that contention sound?

Lord Mac-
naghten.

The question, as it seems to me, depends on the meaning and effect of the Act of 1833, and on nothing else. Except so far as may be gathered from the recitals in the Act, the charter of 1796, and the regulations in force under it are, in my opinion, irrelevant. Equally irrelevant, I think, is any reference to a subsequent Act passed in 1875 for winding up the affairs of the Society. The question is simply a question of contract, and the contract is to be found within the four corners of the Act of 1833.

The Widows' Fund had its origin in certain provisions made by the Faculty of Procurators for the benefit of widows and children of members. Before the Act of 1833 everything was in the hands of the Faculty. The allocation and distribution of its fund was a matter of domestic arrangement and regulation. By the Act of 1833 the condition of things was altered. The old Widows' Fund with its existing liabilities was handed over to the insurance society, which was to have no claim on the Faculty fund in respect of new members. The Society from its inception was a body separate and distinct from the Faculty. Even the members were not identical, for no one who became a member of the Faculty after reaching a certain age could enter the Society, and members of the Society might leave that body and still continue members of the Faculty. The Society had its own treasurer and was under the control of its own officers. It had no disciplinary powers. It had no function but that of an insurance society. It was purely a business association of a common type intended to be conducted on sound actuarial principles, subject to periodical investigation in accordance with the most approved tables of mortality, "taken in connection," as the Act itself declares, "with . . . the experience of this and similar schemes." It is quite true that entrance to the Society could only be gained through admission to the Faculty of Procurators. Membership of the Faculty was the only passport to the Society. So far, but no further, the Faculty and the Society were linked together. When once the entrance gate was passed and a person became "a contributor to the Widows' Fund and entitled to the benefits thereof" his only statutory obligation to the Society besides

Mar. 17, 1908. payment of a marriage tax, if exigible, was to contribute during the whole of his life unless and until he purchased exemption by compounding or by contributing for a period fixed by the Act, or unless and until he renounced in due form for himself and for his widow and children all interest in the Society and its funds.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.

Lord Mac-
naghten.

The argument of the respondents, if I understood it aright, was founded partly on the language of the declaration of trust contained in the Act of 1833 and partly on inferences derived from the circumstances and position of the Widows' Fund before the Act.

The latter branch of the argument, which, at first sight, seems the more formidable, and on which much stress was laid, is, I think, displaced and excluded by the Act itself. In section 11 it was enacted that the regulations in force before the passing of the Act should be annulled, and that the fund as vested in the officers of the insurance society, with the whole increase thereof, should be administered under the provisions of the Act of 1833.

The declaration of trust on which the respondents rely is to be found in section 9. That section declares that the uses and purposes of the Society and of the funds vested and to become vested in it or in the trustees thereof shall, after satisfying certain prior charges, be "for provision and payment of an annuity to the widows severally and children of deceased members of the Faculty contributors to the fund and Society hereby established." Then follow these words dealing with present and future contributors—"and for payment to the widows and children of the members of the said Faculty who now are or may hereafter become entitled to the benefit of the fund under the provisions of this Act as hereinafter specified." What is the meaning of these latter words? In construing them you must, I think, bear in mind two things. In the first place, a person could only enter the Society as a member of the Faculty. The Society was formed for the purpose of insuring members of the Faculty and no others. In the next place, a member of the Society, in the view of the framers of the Act, became "entitled" to the benefits of the Society's fund immediately on his admission. That is plain enough from the language of this section. It is plainer still from the language of section 16, which has been referred to already. Now, the learned counsel for the respondents in construing the clause under consideration seemed to omit, or leave out of sight, the most important part of it. They read the clause as if the declared purpose of the fund was "for payment to the widows and children of the members of the said Faculty" without anything further in the way of defining the class of persons intended to be benefited. I venture to think that is not quite right. If I might paraphrase the sentence I should say the true meaning is "for payment to the widows and children of persons who, being members of the Faculty, are, or may hereafter be, admitted to the Society, and by virtue of their admission become entitled to the benefit of the fund." This construction is consistent with what is found in subsequent sections, where the phraseology is varied and the persons entitled to the benefits of the fund are described sometimes as "contributors" simply and sometimes as "members of the fund" without any reference to membership of the Faculty. What is more important is that it is consistent with the fundamental constitution of the Society as declared in section 1. The constituents of the Society Mar. 17, 1903. besides the then members of the Widows' Fund are to be "all and every other person or persons who shall hereafter become members of and contributors to said fund in manner after mentioned." The only conditions of membership of the Society are entrance in the prescribed manner and contribution, not contribution plus continued membership of the Faculty of Procurators.

Colquhoun v
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

The construction for which the respondents contend would certainly lead to strange and harsh results. A person might be a member of the Faculty of Procurators and also a member of the Insurance Society; he might have compounded for all future contributions to the Widows' Fund, and thus have purchased for his wife and children the benefit of the annuity by payment in full. Suppose he were then struck off the roll of Procurators in order to enable him to join the Bar or some other profession, membership of which might be incompatible with membership of the Faculty, it would be a strange thing that he, or rather his wife and children, should lose the benefit of his purchase—it would be a strange thing too, unheard of, I should think, in the practice of insurance companies, that this Insurance Society without making any refund should appropriate a windfall which the actuarial calculations of an insurance society would not, I suppose, take into account. But, however that may be, I rest my judgment simply and solely on the Act of 1833. It seems to me that when a person is declared by Act of Parliament to have become a member of a statutory body, and to be entitled to the benefit of a certain fund, his status and rights are not to be destroyed or taken away without plain language. An implied power of expulsion seems to me something of a novelty. Forfeitures, as a great Judge has said, "are not favoured in the law."

Lord Mac-
naghten.

I think the order appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—The question raised in this case can easily be stated.

The Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow are a Corporation existing under a charter. In 1833 an Act of Parliament was passed for the better establishing and securing a fund for providing annuities to the widows and children of the members of the Faculty. The general effect of the statute is that persons becoming in the future members of the Faculty had to contribute to the Widows' Fund, and, upon making certain payments, would be entitled to certain benefits. By the concluding words of the first section of the Act the position of such contributors is thus defined,—“shall be called the Society of Contributors to the Widows' Fund of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.”

The pursuer, James Colquhoun, being a member of the Faculty, became in 1870 a contributor to the Widows' Fund, making payment by way of entrance and subscription amounting to £179. He was always ready and offered to continue to pay the subscriptions due from him.

In 1899 James Colquhoun pleaded guilty to a charge of embezzlement, and the Faculty, acting within their powers, expelled him. The question before your Lordships is, What are the effects of that expulsion? Does it carry with it any forfeiture or loss of the benefits under the Widows' Fund

Mar. 17, 1908. to which he was entitled by virtue of his contributions? I think that it does not.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

The argument of the respondents is that inasmuch as no one could become a contributor to the fund unless he were a member of the Faculty, in like manner he lost his rights under his contributorship if he ceased to be such member of the Faculty.

Lord James of Hereford.

But such argument cannot be supported by anything expressed in the statute; it is by force of inference only that such contention can prevail.

Where, as in this case, it is sought to effect a loss of moneys paid, surely there ought to be clear and distinct grounds for drawing such inference. I cannot find them. On the contrary, I think the provisions of the statute shew that it was intended to protect the interests of the contributor. He is entitled to renounce or to redeem under sections 27 and 28, and is liable to forfeiture only for non-payment of contributions under section 26 of the Act.

It is true that in the first instance a contributor to the fund must be a member of the Faculty, but obligations are imposed upon him by the statute to make certain payments not only whilst he is a member of the Faculty, "but during the period that each of such contributors respectively shall live and be a member of such Society."

Now a member of the Faculty may desire to resign such position—as, for instance, if he sought to become a member of the Bar of England or Scotland—and the respondent's argument must go to the extent of saying that in such a case all right to the benefits resulting from the contribution would be lost. No reliance is placed upon the fact that in this case misconduct has occurred. It is the absence of Mr Colquhoun's name from the roll that is relied upon. If this were sufficient to cause the forfeiture the statute may well have said so; but it has not, and in the absence of any express declaration that only members of the Faculty can be allowed to remain members of the contribution fund, I come to the conclusion that the appellant's contention is correct and ought to prevail.

LORD ROBERTSON.—The judgment which I am now about to read was written after the first hearing, and I have nothing to add.

I am of opinion, and as there is a difference of opinion it is right to say clearly of opinion, that the judgment appealed against is right.

The claim of the appellant is that, albeit he is not a member of the Faculty of Procurators, he is entitled to contribute to their Widows' Fund and to receive the benefits of that institution. It seems to me that from the beginning, and of its essence, this fund has been one purely domestic to the Faculty, and that none of the modifications of the institution have impaired this essential characteristic and condition. Nor do I find in the successive charters and statutes anything affording the smallest countenance to the idea that the fact that a man, while a member of the Faculty, has been a contributor to the fund gives him any right to contribute to the fund when he has ceased to be a member. The nature of all such insurance exposes it to the risk that the contributions of years may be lost if a man has not the money, or has not the qualification, to contribute in later years. But I hope that I need not remind your Lordships that hardship will not supply a ground of decision which the contract does not supply, and that it would be at least as irrelevant to deplore James Colquhoun's loss as to reflect on his fraud. Mar. 17, 1908.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

Now, I do not intend to rehearse the developments of this fund ; for this has been done very adequately. But I take the several stages.

I should have thought it past all doubt that the claim of the appellant would have been impossible if the Act of 1833 had stood alone. The preamble and the enacting section (section 1) make membership of the Faculty the qualification of contributing to the new fund ; and, when we come to section 9 the Act declares the purpose of the trust to be the payment of annuities to the widows and children of members of the Faculty, "and it shall not be lawful to apply the said fund to any other use or purpose whatever." Ld. Robertson.

Now I turn to the Act of 1875, which, as has been said with substantial accuracy, provides for the winding-up of the fund. I must own that, this being so, it would be a singular occasion for increasing the number of contributors by bringing in persons who ex hypothesi were hitherto outsiders, or by abolishing a condition which on the same hypothesis had hitherto attached to existing contributors. In truth, however, the negative words of sec. 3 do not contain any such implication.

In what I have said, I assume the right of the Faculty to remove from their membership persons disqualified from membership, and such is a person convicted of the crime of embezzlement. I do not suppose that this was a new power conferred by the supplementary charter ; but it is there in black and white. The truth is that membership of any such body is precarious to this extent, that it is not the fact of a man having been honest at the time of his admission that will retain his position if in the sequel he is found dishonest. The same kind and degree of precariousness attend the corresponding investment of money by contributing to a professional widows' fund ; that and nothing more.

On these grounds I am for affirming the judgment of the First Division.

LORD ATKINSON.—Whatever may have been the true relation between the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow and the contributors to the Widows' Fund before 1833, the statute of that year, in my opinion, entirely altered their relative positions, and gave to those contributors a corporate existence, distinct from, and to a certain extent independent of, the older Corporation. It was by section 1 of that Act provided that those persons who were at the passing of the Act members or contributors to the Widows' Fund, together with all other persons who should thereafter become members or contributors to the fund, "in manner thereafter provided," should form the Corporation. From that time forward the new Corporation stood to the old very much, I think, in the position of an insurance company. Every member under fifty years of age admitted to the Faculty was bound to become a contributor to this fund, whereby, in consideration of the payment of a lump sum, varying from £25 upwards in an ascending scale according to his age, plus an annual contribution or premium during his life of £3, 10s., or such larger sum as the Society should have theretofore fixed, together with interest and penalties as in the statute

Mar. 17, 1908. provided, certain annuities were, after his death, to be paid to his widow or children. Every member of the Society could redeem, i.e., compound for, his annual contribution, and thus, if he were so minded, pay a lump sum at once. And none but members of the Faculty could become contributors.

Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

Ld. Atkinson.

It was not disputed, as I understood, that the relation between the contributors and the new Corporation became from 1833 a contractual relation. And the point for your Lordships' decision is, in my view, this, whether it is an implied term of this statutory contract—it is certainly not an express one—that the insurer must continue to be a member of the Faculty until his death, so that if for any reason he, during his life, should cease to be a member of the Faculty, he should ipso facto forfeit everything he had paid and the Society be relieved from every obligation to pay anything whatever to his widow or children.

This contingency, as appears from the actuarial tables used, was not taken into account in fixing the amount of the contribution. The latter is uniform, and the lump sum varies with the age of the insurer, and with that alone.

Section 13 provides for the restoration of members of the Faculty whose interest in the fund shall have been forfeited, and section 14 enacts that on being restored they shall become members of the Society, and each pay to the treasurer £1, 10s. during his natural life. Section 21 enacts that the customary payments of £1 in respect of every contributor who was admitted to the benefit of the fund before 7th February 1814, and of £1, 10s. in respect of every contributor admitted after that date, shall continue to be paid by the Faculty “during the period that each of the said contributors respectively shall live and continue to be a member of the Society,” not, be it observed, continue to be a member of the Faculty.

Section 18 provides that every person who should thereafter be admitted to the Faculty should be bound to pay to the treasurer of the Society for its benefit annually “during his life” the sum of £3, 10s., or such larger sum as the Society shall have theretofore fixed and appointed.

All these sections apparently contemplate that the annual payment should continue to be made during the life of the contributor, and that this is their true meaning is, I think, enforced by the fact that special provision is made for the cessation of this payment in three particular instances, and those alone, namely—(1) where the contributor has paid for forty years (section 27); (2) where he has renounced all benefits of the fund (section 28); and (3) where his interest in the fund has been forfeited by reason of his having been guilty of one of the several acts or defaults specified in the various sections, each of which is in its nature injurious to the interests of the fund. No provision whatever is made for the cessation of the contributions expressly made payable for life, on the happening of such a probable event as the contributor's ceasing, for any reason, to be a member of the Faculty. Prima facie it must, I think, strike one as strange that such a contingency was not expressly provided for, if it was the intention of the Legislature that forfeiture should follow upon its occurrence. It has been urged on behalf of the respondents that the omission is accounted for by the history of the fund, and by the special wording of several sections of the Act, notably the 9th, 29th, and 30th, which shew that the widows or children who are to receive annuities are the widows and children of persons who, at the time of their decease, were members of the Faculty, and that anything in the nature of a forfeiture clause, such as is above suggested, is therefore unnecessary.

Mar. 17, 1908.
Colquhoun v.
Society of Contributors
to Widows'
Fund of
Faculty of Procurators in
Glasgow.

The past history of the fund cannot, in my opinion, furnish any key to the meaning of the language of a statute which so fundamentally altered the previous position of things as did the Act of 1833, while the words used in the several sections relied upon do not, I think, when examined lead to the conclusion contended for. The words which occur in section 9 have been already quoted. Those used in section 29 are, "there shall be paid out of the funds of the said Society to each of the widows of the deceased members of the said Faculty whose names are specified in Schedule A"; and those in section 30 the following—"there shall be paid out of the funds of the said Society to the widow of every member of the said Faculty who shall have contributed to the said fund." It is to be observed, however, that in both sections 29 and 30, where the payment of annuities to children is dealt with, the words used are "deceased contributors" and "in case any member of the said Society shall die" and "widow of a contributor," while in section 31 the event, of the proof of which the trustees are empowered to call for evidence, is described as the "death of contributors." Again, in section 33 the phrase used is "widow of more than one contributor in succession." And in section 34 the word "contributor" is used throughout the section, the words "member of the Faculty" never, while the phrase "widow or children of such contributor" frequently occurs. It is clear, therefore, that under all the sections the essential fact which must be proved in order to entitle a widow, or a child, to an annuity is, that the husband of the widow, or father of the child, must have been a contributor at the date of his death, unless he had already redeemed, or had paid his contribution for forty years. These are the only exceptions. In the face of the clear provisions of sections 9 and 16, which have already been quoted, I think the words "widows of deceased members of the Faculty," or words of the like kind, may, when used in the three sections above mentioned, well be held to mean the widows of men who were members of the Faculty, and who consequently became contributors, but subsequently ceased to be members of that Faculty yet continued to be contributors; so that one is not constrained to adopt a construction which, at all events in the case of men who have paid their contributions for forty years, or who redeemed them, and thus purchased the benefits provided for their widows and children, if not in the case of others, would work the most gross injustice. Neither will this construction prejudice the interest of the Faculty or of the Society, while, in my view, it reconciles the several sections of the Statute of 1833 with one another and makes them consistent. If it be the correct construction, as it appears to me to be, then I think James Colquhoun has not forfeited his interest in the fund, and the respondents were not justified in the course they took; that the decision of the First Division was wrong and should be reversed, and this appeal allowed with costs.

Ld. Atkinson.

LORD COLLINS.—At the close of the first hearing I arrived at the conclusion that the decision of the Court below was right. Afterwards I had the Mar. 17, 1908. opportunity of reading in print the opinion of Lord Robertson. I did not attempt the superfluous task of trying to modify or improve upon that opinion, for I frankly felt I could not. Since then the case has been re-argued, and I am bound to say that the re-argument tended to confirm my original opinion. Since then again that opinion has been reinforced by that of my noble and learned friend Lord Halsbury, with the result that, with all deference to those who hold the opposite view, I am compelled to give my opinion that the judgment of the Court below is right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow.
Lord Collins.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—As the majority of your Lordships are in favour of allowing this appeal, I shall propose the following order:—"That the minute or resolution of 4th February 1901 be reduced, and that it be found and declared as concluded for." I apprehend if any question arises in the drawing up of this order the parties will settle it themselves. Failing that, it will be possible to submit it for your Lordships' consideration.

ORDERED that the order appealed from be reversed; that the minute or resolution of 4th February 1901 be reduced, and that it be found and declared as concluded for; and that the respondents do pay to the appellants their costs here and below.

A. & W. BEVERIDGE—GORDON MASON, S.S.C.—GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—WEBSTER, WILL, & Co., S.S.C.

No. 6. GENERAL ACCIDENT ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED, Appellants.— Danckwerts, K.C.—Constable—Beyfus.
April 8, 1908. JAMES M'GOWAN (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—
Att.-Gen. Sir W. S. Robson—Sol.-Gen. Ure—Munro.

General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, v. M'Gowan.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Fire and Accident Insurance—Balance of Profit—Deductions—Unexpired Risks.—In an appeal by an accident assurance corporation against an assessment for income-tax on profits, the First Division held, following Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Inland Revenue, Feb. 8, 1889, 16 R. 461 and 474, and Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Wilson, 1876, 35 L. T. R. 271, that in ascertaining for income-tax purposes the annual profits of a company carrying on the business of fire, sickness, accident, and guarantee insurance, no deduction fell to be made in respect of estimated losses on risks unexpired at the end of the year.

The Assurance Corporation having appealed to the House of Lords, held (in aff. the judgment) that the appellants had failed to shew that the rule adopted in these cases had operated inequitably in their case, and appeal dismissed.

Ld. Chancellor (Loreburn). Lord Ashbourne. Lord Macnaghten. Lord James of Hereford. (IN the Court of Session, June 4, 1907, S. C. 1004.)
The General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, appealed.
The appeal was heard on 19th and 20th March 1908.
The House took time for consideration.

Ld. Robertson. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Collins. LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the appellants, a fire and accident insurance company, appeal against an assessment for income-tax. The Commissioners arrived at the assessable profits by calculating income as the balance of receipts from premiums and other unquestioned sources over payments made in respect of losses and other unquestioned deductions. This balance they treat as the Company's income for each of the three preceding years, and thence derive the average for which they assess the appeal- April 8, 1908.

 tant Company in respect of the year 1905-6.

On the other hand, the Company claim that an allowance should be made for unexpired risks in the way following. They say that $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent of the premiums received in any one year, say 1903, represents that part of the risk covered by such premium which runs on into the following year. Accordingly they seek to deduct from the gross income of, say, 1903 $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent of the premiums received in that year because it really represents the money they earn for taking risks which run on into 1904. But at the same time they add to the gross income of 1903 $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent of the premiums received in 1902, upon the ground that 1903 has in fact borne that proportion of the risks paid for in 1902.

General
 Accident
 Assurance
 Corporation,
 Limited, v.
 M'Gowan.
 Lord
 Chancellor.

Now, in my opinion, there is one sufficient reason for rejecting this contention. It is not found as a fact that $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent does represent the real value of the risks that run on into 1904 in respect of premiums received in 1903. I am not prepared to assume that it is so, because of the statement of the Commissioners that it is the practice of insurance companies to estimate $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent as the proper figure to represent that value. We are not told either for what purpose such an estimate is made, or that it corresponds with the reality. If I am to conjecture, I should incline to the view that this percentage is very far from the proper figure. For if this estimate be accepted, then in the three years 1902, 1903, and 1904, taken together, the total profit of this Company, making certain deductions, was £15,338, whereas we know that for its own purposes the total profit, after the same deductions, was treated by the Company as £62,850, and dividends were paid and moneys carried to reserve on that footing.

During thirty-two years, since the decision of Imperial Fire Insurance Company v. Wilson,¹ the method of assessing fire and accident companies has been that adopted by the Commissioners in the present case. It is not scientifically unassailable, for it obviously proceeds upon the supposition that the unexpired risks at the beginning and at the end of the year are in substance the same, or that, if an average of three years is taken, they are upon an average the same. But no method is scientifically unassailable that does not enter into an analysis of the contracts made and contracts current in each year so minute that it is in a business sense impracticable. I think the particular correction sought by the appellants in this case is indefensible upon the materials before us, and, further, that the method adopted by the Commissioners is a good working rule in the present instance and generally. If in any particular case an insurance company can shew it works hardship, no doubt the rule ought to be modified so that the real gains and profits may be ascertained as near as may be. I am for dismissing this appeal with costs.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur with the Lord Chancellor.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Your Lordships would probably agree with Mr Danckwerts in thinking that the present mode of assessing the profits of a

¹ 35 L. T. 271.

April 8, 1908.

General
Accident
Assurance
Corporation,
Limited, v.
M'Gowan.

Lord Mac-
naghten.

fire insurance company for the purpose of the income-tax is neither accurate nor scientific. But it has been established for a very long time. It is simple, and it does not appear that in the long run it is productive of injustice. The alternative mode first proposed by the learned counsel for the appellants is certainly not more accurate. The inquiry afterwards suggested would, I think, be interminable. It is impossible to obtain anything approaching complete accuracy by any conceivable method. In a somewhat similar case—it was a rating case—Blackburn, J., delivering the judgment of the Queen's Bench, after stating that the Court had endeavoured to lay down a rule more satisfactory than the one then in force, makes the following observations: "We have not, however, succeeded in laying down a rule which would be consistent with the existing legislation and decisions on this subject, and would at the same time be capable of being satisfactorily worked, and we are strongly impressed with the importance of not unsettling the law as established by past decisions where we cannot lay down a rule that is not open to exception"—Sheffield United Gas-Light Company v. Overseers of Sheffield.¹

I think there is much good sense in that observation, and I think it is apposite to the present case.

I think the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I concur.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I concur.

LORD ATKINSON.—I agree.

LORD COLLINS.—This is, in effect, an appeal after thirty-two years from the decision of the Court of Exchequer in 1876 in the case of Imperial Fire Insurance Company v. Wilson.² In my opinion the proposed method of taking the accounts of the Insurance Company is open to the same objections that prevailed in that case, which has been acted upon in the interval. I am far from satisfied that it arrives at a result at all more approximately accurate than the less complex method suggested by the Legislature itself, and adopted by the Commissioners. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

SMILES & Co.—BONAR, HUNTER, & JOHNSTONE, W.S.—SIR FRANCIS C. GORE, Inland Revenue, England—PHILIP J. H. GRIERSON, Inland Revenue, Scotland.

No. 7.

May 25, 1908.

Train v.
Clapperton.

MISS ISABELLA TRAIN (Pursuer), Appellant.—Munro—A. A. Fraser.
ALAN ERNEST CLAPPERTON (Buchanan's Trustee) (Defender), Respondent.—Younger, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

Trust—Gift of whole or portion of annual income according to trustees' discretion—Assignment—Tantum et tale.—A testator directed his trustees to invest in their own names, as trustees, a sum of £5000, and to pay to A B during his lifetime "either the whole or only a portion of the annual revenue thereof, and that subject to such conditions and restrictions, all as my trustees in their sole and absolute discretion think fit," and, on the decease of A B, to pay "said sum of £5000, with any revenue accrued thereon that has not been paid to" A B, to A B's children, declaring that in the event of A B dying without children, "said sum of £5000 and accumulations of revenue, if any," should form part of the residue of his estate. The testator died in June 1899. A B was the testator's sole next of kin, and in 1903 he assigned to X, in security of a debt of £650, his interest in the deceased's estate as next of kin and as a legatee.

¹ (1863) 4 B. & S. 135-146.

² 35 L. T. 271.

Train v.
Clapperton.

In August 1904 an action was raised by X as assignee of A B against the trustees concluding (1) for payment of the income of the £5000. The pursuer maintained that the defenders—who had since the testator's death paid only certain trifling sums to A B from time to time—were bound to have exercised their discretion annually as to the amount of the income of the £5000 to be paid to A B, and in respect that they had failed to do so, were bound to make payment of the whole income thereof that had accrued since the date of the testator's death, under deduction of the sums paid to A B.

The First Division held that the payments to be made to A B were left by the testator entirely in the discretion of the trustees, and that in the circumstances the trustees had done nothing to entitle the Court to interfere with their discretion, and assoilzied the defender.

In an appeal the House affirmed the judgment.

(In the Court of Session, Feb. 5, 1907, 1907 S. C. p. 517.)

The pursuer appealed.

After hearing counsel for the appellant,—

Ld. Chancellor
(Loreburn).
Lord
Ashbourne.
Ld. Robertson.
Lord Collins.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I will not occupy your Lordships' time with this appeal, because it rests upon the statement of the appellant that the trustees who had the misfortune to be saddled with this duty have not exercised a discretion, or at anyrate have not exercised a reasonable and sound discretion. I think your Lordships are satisfied that they have exercised a discretion; whether it was reasonable or sound I cannot possibly judge, because the facts are not before us, but it looks to me very like a most sound and reasonable discretion.

LORDS ASHBOURNE, ROBERTSON, and COLLINS concurred.

Younger, K.C., applied that as this was an appeal in forma pauperis, the respondent, who was a trustee, should be allowed his costs out of the estate.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Let that be so.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed.

HERBERT G. DAVIS—A. W. GORDON, Solicitor—ROBBINS, BILLING, & Co.—
F. J. MARTIN, W.S.

JAMES DICK AND OTHERS (Claimants), Appellants.—Cripps, K.C.— No. 8.
Orr, K.C.—J. D. Millar—Munro.

JOHN EDWARD AUDSLEY AND OTHERS (Trustees under James Dick's Settlement dated in 1902) (Pursuers and Real Raisers and Claimants), Respondents.—Clyde, K.C.—Cullen, K.C.—R. Scott Brown. May 26, 1908.
Dick v. Audsley.

JOHN WATT AND OTHERS (Trustees under James Dick's Settlements dated in 1891, 1899, and 1901) (Claimants), Respondents.—Lees, K.C.—W. E. Vernon—Ingram.

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—Uncertainty—Local or Scottish charitable institutions constituted or to be constituted.—A testator

May 26, 1908. Dick v. Audsley. disposed his whole estate to certain trustees, and directed them to realise the whole residue of his estate at such time as they might think proper, and "at any time or times, or from time to time, as and when the said residue or any part thereof becomes available, as they may deem proper, to pay over or divide the said residue, or any part or parts thereof, to or amongst such local or Scottish charitable institutions and schemes already constituted, or which may hereafter be constituted, . . . as they may select, or any one or more of such institutions and schemes, and that at such time, in such manner, or in such proportions, all as they in their absolute discretion may deem proper." The testator further provided that his trustees should have "the fullest powers of and in regard to realisation, investment, administration, management, and division, as if they were beneficial owners"; that "the time, manner, and propriety of selling and disposing" of his estate, heritable and moveable, should be entirely at the discretion of his trustees; and that his trustees might, should they in their discretion see fit, retain the investments of which the estate consisted at the time of his death, "and that for such time or times as they might think fit or indefinitely."

The next of kin of the testator maintained that the directions of the trust-disposition with regard to the disposition of the residue were void from uncertainty, in respect that (1) the class of objects of the testator's bounty was not sufficiently definite; and (2) power was given to the trustees to postpone realisation indefinitely.

Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the bequest of residue was not void from uncertainty.

Ld. Chancellor (Loreburn). Earl of Halsbury. Lord Ashbourne. Ld. Robertson. Lord Collins. (IN the First Division of the Court of Session, 29th May 1907, 1907 S. C. 953.)

James Dick and other next of kin of James Dick, the testator, appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not think it is necessary to invoke in this case the rule that charitable bequests are an object of peculiar favour, because I do not think the points put by Mr Cripps had any real substance.

With regard to the first question, whether the trustees have an option to apply any part of this fund otherwise than to the charitable purposes designated by the will, I do not think that is the true construction of the clause. I think the words which are used, "any part or parts thereof," have relation to the time or times when the distribution may become practicable by reason of the fund becoming available.

With reference to the second point made by Mr Cripps, whether the bequest is bad because there was an option to retain indefinitely and so frustrate the trust or so render uncertain its objects, I do not think that is the meaning of the clause. The word "indefinitely" appears to me really to be redundant, meaning the same in substance as the words "for such time or times as they may think fit." Of course, the administration of a trust is always subject to the control of the Court if there is maladministration. Even if the word "indefinitely" meant something much more than that, I am by no means satisfied that the will could be set aside on that ground, but the point does not arise.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—So far as I am concerned, I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment perfectly satisfies everything that ought to be said upon the subject.

LORD ASHBOURNE, LORD ROBERTSON, and LORD COLLINS concurred.

May 26, 1908.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed: The appellants to pay the respondents, other than the trustees of the settlement of 4th March 1902, the costs of this appeal: The said trustees to have their costs out of the estate.

JOHN KENNEDY, W.S.—INGLIS, ORR, & BRUCE, W.S.—CROWDERS, VIZARD, OLDHAM, & CO.—HENRY ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—NEISH, HOWELL, & HALDANE—
W. & F. HALDANE, W.S.

JOHN TOAL (Pursuer), Appellant.—Munro—J. A. Christie.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY (Defenders), Respondents.—
Sol.-Gen. Ure—Forbes Lancaster, K.C.

No. 9.

May 26, 1908.

Reparation—Negligence—Railway—Failure of railway servants to close carriage doors before setting train in motion.—In an action of damages for personal injuries brought against a railway company by a passenger who, after alighting from a train, had been knocked down by an open carriage door as the train was leaving the station, the pursuer averred that “the said accident to the pursuer was due to the fault and negligence of defenders’ servants, for whom defenders are responsible. When said train was stopped at said platform there were no porters or officials on the platform to see that the doors of the carriages were closed before the train was restarted. It is the duty of defenders, and is the invariable practice of railway companies, to close the doors of compartments before a train is allowed to leave the station, but this the defenders and their servants culpably and negligently failed to do on the occasion of this accident to pursuer. The defenders and their said servants were also negligent in respect that they set said train in motion without closing said door.” He also averred that the defenders’ servants were negligent in failing to have the lamps at the station lighted, and that the station was so dark that the pursuer could not see whether the doors were closed or not.

Toal v. North
British Railway Co.

The First Division dismissed the action on the ground that there was no relevant averment of negligence on the part of the Railway Company.

In an appeal the House reversed the judgment on the ground that the pursuer had averred facts from which a jury might infer negligence.

(In the Court of Session, Oct. 31, 1907, 1908 S. C. 48.)

The pursuer appealed.

Ld. Chancellor
(Loreburn).
Earl of Halsbury.
Lord
Ashbourne.
Ld. Robertson.
Lord Collins.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question here is whether the pursuer avers, and offers to prove, facts from which a jury might legitimately infer that this accident was caused by the neglect of the Railway Company; and I do not suppose that your Lordships will conjecture whether or not that is the right conclusion, for it is really the province of the jury not only to ascertain the facts, but to draw their own inferences from the facts that are ascertained. I find in this case the pursuer says that the duty of the defenders was to close the door of the carriage before it started; that it was their duty to do so on the occasion of this accident; that they did not close the door, and so swept the pursuer from the platform on to the rails; and, further, that the station was so dark that the pursuer could not see whether the doors were closed or not.

What was the duty of the Railway Company in this matter, and what they did or omitted to do, is for a jury to determine. Accordingly, with the most sincere respect for the opinion of the Court of Session, I am constrained to the view that in this case there is material from which the

May 26, 1908. proper tribunal might conclude that the accident was due to the neglect of the defenders.

Toal v. North
British Railway Co.

I will not express any opinion of my own upon the subject, because I think it is not my province to deal with matters of fact, but the province of the constitutional tribunal.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I abstain from expressing any opinion of my own on the point, which is simply a question that the jury will have to determine. It is enough for me to say that in my view there was a case to be properly submitted to a jury, and it was for them to determine it.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I agree.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My opinion is that this appeal must be allowed. I differ with the greatest reluctance from a tribunal so able and experienced in administering this particular jurisdiction, but I think in this instance they have gone too fast.

I must not, however, be supposed in the least degree to hold that because the parties are not agreed as to the facts therefore a case must go to trial. That is a much cruder view than has ever been accepted by the Scottish Courts or by your Lordships in Scottish appeals. Much time and money have been saved by a more critical view of the case presented by the claimant. When a case comes, as this one did, from the Sheriff Court for trial by jury the duty of the Court of Session is to see, before a jury is summoned, that there is a case to try. This means an ascertainment of the gist or gravamen of the action. The mere fact that in what is probably an unnecessarily detailed averment of circumstances there is a dispute about facts is in no way decisive of the right to go to trial. If the defender can demonstrate that, assuming all the pursuer says, he has no case, then the Court has habitually, and most rightly, ended the litigation. This, however, is a delicate jurisdiction, because it depends in dubious cases on the language, very often obscure, applied to facts very often equivocal.

As I think this case must go to trial, I do not enter into any analysis of the points in the case, for that would merely prejudice the trial. My interposition at all is merely because, in my humble judgment, it has got to be remembered that the Scottish system obliges the pursuer to shew his hand and state his case before he is allowed to go to trial, and thus compels the Court, when invited, to ascertain the value of the case thus stated. In the present instance I think the Court have criticised the statements too severely and nicely.

LORD COLLINS.—I am of the same opinion.

ORDERED that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant his costs in the Court of Session so far as the same relate to the question of relevancy and also the costs incurred by him in respect of this appeal to this House, such last-mentioned costs to be taxed in the manner usual when the appellant sues in forma pauperis.

WARLOW & PATEY—ST CLAIR SWANSON & MANSON, W.S.—JOHN KENNEDY, W.S.—
JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.

G. W. WHITEHOUSE (Pursuer), Appellant.—Danckwerts, K.C.—J. R. Christie.

No. 10.

R. & W. PICKETT (Defenders), Respondents.—Watt, K.C.—Munro.

June 26, 1908.

Innkeeper—Limitation of Liability to guests—Negligence—Onus pro-bandi—Deposit expressly for safe custody—Innkeepers Liability Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 41).—The Innkeepers Liability Act, enacts, sec. 1, that no innkeeper shall be liable to make good to any guest of such innkeeper any loss of property brought to his inn to a greater amount than £30, except (1) where such property shall have been stolen or lost through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ; or (2) where such property shall have been deposited “expressly for safe custody” with such innkeeper.

Whitehouse v.
Pickett.

A hotel in Edinburgh exhibited on the wall of a corridor a printed notice that the proprietors “will not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but will take charge of same in office. See extract from Act of Parliament, chap. 41, Vict. 26 and 27, in entrance hall.” The extract in the entrance hall contained section 1 of the Act.

A commercial traveller for a manufacturing jeweller on arriving at that hotel on a Saturday afternoon handed to the hotel porter a bag, containing jewels to the value of £1800, to be placed in the office. The traveller made no statement as to its value, but he was in use to visit the hotel, and the hotelkeepers knew that he was in the habit of carrying jewellery with him.
At 11.30 P.M., when he asked for the bag with the view of taking it to his bedroom, it was discovered that his bag had been stolen. Another bag of the same size and appearance had been left at the office by one of three guests in the hotel who disappeared the same evening without paying their bill, but leaving behind them certain burglar's tools.

In an action by the jeweller against the hotelkeepers for the value of the bag, the defenders pleaded, inter alia, the statutory limitation of liability to £30.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) that the goods having been deposited with the defenders for safe custody he was entitled to indemnity; and (2) that the goods having been stolen through the default or neglect of the defenders or of their servants, they were liable in damages.

A proof was led, in which the facts above narrated were established.

The Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) held that the bag had been lost through the negligence of the defenders or of their servants, and gave decree for damages.

The Extra Division held (1) that the bag had not been deposited “expressly” for safe custody within the meaning of sec. 1, subsec. (2), of the Act; (2) that the onus of proving that it had been lost through “default or neglect” on the part of the defenders or of their servants lay upon the pursuer, and that that onus had not been discharged; and therefore (3) that the defenders were entitled to the benefit of the statutory limitation of liability.

In an appeal the House affirmed the judgment (diss. Lord Collins, who held that although there had not been an express deposit for safe custody the defenders, as bailees for reward, were bound to give a high degree of care, and that from the facts proved the Lord Ordinary was entitled to infer negligence, and that his judgment should be restored).

(In the Extra Division of the Court of Session, Nov. 16, 1907, reported in the present volume, p. 219.)

The pursuer appealed.*

Ld. Chancellor
(Loreburn).
Lord
Ashbourne.
Lord James of Hereford.
Ld. Robertson.
Lord Collins.

* The Appellant cited—M'Pherson v. Christie, 1841, 3 D. 930; Meda-war v. Grand Hotel Co., L. R., [1891] 2 Q. B. 11; O'Connor v. Grand International Hotel Co., L. R., [1898] 2 Q. B., (Ir.) 92.

The Respondents cited—Moes, Moliere, & Tromp v. Leith and Amsterdam Shipping Co., 1867, 5 Macph. 988; Moss v. Russell, 1884, 1 T. L. R.
13; Stevens v. Great Western Railway Co., 1885, 52 L. T. 324.

June 26, 1908. The House took time for consideration.

Whitehouse v.
Pickett.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I shall move your Lordships to dismiss this appeal. The contentions of the appellant were twofold. In the first place, he maintained that there had been a deposit expressly for safe custody; in the second place, that his property had been lost through the neglect of the innkeepers. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts, which have been fully stated in more than one of the opinions already expressed.

I cannot think that the pursuer should succeed on his first contention. Under the statute innkeepers are liable beyond £30 if property has been deposited with them expressly for safe custody.

The word “expressly” is not used without a purpose. It means that an intention by the bailor is not enough. That intention must be brought to the mind of the bailee or his agent in some reasonable and intelligible manner, so that he may, if so minded, insist on the precautions specified in the Act. The pursuer’s traveller caused to be placed in the office, without a word spoken, a bag of undeclared contents, which was laid in a corner of the room; and there is nothing more of substance proved in this case on this point, except that he had been in the habit of depositing similar property in that or an adjoining room for some years, also without word spoken. The Act meant to secure for the innkeeper, by warning, an opportunity of safeguarding himself when a heavy risk is placed on him. There is no ground for saying he had such a warning here.

As to the second point I see no sufficient evidence. Obviously it was for the pursuer to prove it if he could. He proved that his own traveller and other travellers also were somewhat careless as to the place where bags and parcels were deposited, and perhaps that the innkeeper or his servants were sometimes careless in fastening the doors of the office and the parlour, or in keeping someone constantly there. But no evidence was given to prove how in fact the pursuer’s bag was lost, or that it must have been lost through neglect either in leaving doors unlocked or in leaving rooms unwatched. The facts are equally consistent with loss by methods which implied no disregard of reasonable care, and the place chosen for deposit was chosen by the pursuer’s own traveller. If it were enough to shew that this property may have been stolen through the innkeeper’s neglect, an innkeeper might be liable in every case of unexplained loss. Nor is it enough to prove, if it were proved, that the innkeeper was neglectful in general. He is not liable unless the loss was due to his neglect, which is quite a different thing.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—There is practically little dispute as to the facts, although there is a difference of opinion as to the law applicable to the circumstances proved in evidence. This involves a consideration of the Innkeepers Liability Act of 1863, which altered the common law by limiting their liability for the property of their guests to £30 except in two cases—(1) where such goods or property shall have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ; (2) where such goods or property have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

Taking the second case in the first place, I cannot think that the evidence June 26, 1908. establishes any such deposit within the meaning of the Act. I do not think ^{Whitehouse v.} that any form of words was needed, but something should be said or done ^{Pickett.} by the guest that would clearly convey to the innkeeper that goods were ^{Lord} being deposited with him for safe keeping. Here the guest did not say a ^{Ashbourne.} word to draw attention to the fact that he was making any deposit whatever. The innkeeper probably never saw the bag at all. The course of dealing would not warrant the effort to spell out any liability. The bag, in my opinion, was left in the office to afford ready access to Mr Buckley whenever he wanted his bag for his trade purposes, he thinking it as safe and convenient a place as he could find. His removal of it to his bedroom each night demonstrates that he did not think he had fixed the innkeeper with any special liability by leaving it during the day in the office. The respondents cannot eke out a special undertaking by the notice that the proprietors would not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but would "take charge of same in office," and adding a reference to the statute. This, in my opinion, only invited guests to make deposits for safe custody as contemplated by the Act. Once it is decided that there was no deposit for safe keeping, it is manifest that the duty or obligation was entirely altered. The decision on this point colours the whole case, although, of course, the question of negligence has to be separately considered.

This latter question is somewhat more difficult, and needs close examination, but after the best consideration that I can give the case I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that on the actual evidence the respondents are liable. Most probably the loss was due to the theft of three daring confederates who had been shadowing Buckley, and according to the poster notice of the police had been following him from town to town—London, Manchester, Liverpool, Lancaster, Carlisle, and Glasgow. If Buckley had made an express deposit for safe custody the respondents would be liable, but as he did not do so, and only left his bag in the office in the way described, to be taken such good care of as the course of business in the hotel permitted, and as was extended to their own property, I cannot see any proof of negligence that would render the respondents liable.

It was urged by the appellant that the door from the private sitting-room into the passage was not always locked, and that the door next the bar-room was not always "snibbed" when the bar or sitting-room had, for the moment, no one in attendance. But there can be no doubt, I think, that the usual practice was to have a close attendance and also to keep the door secure. An occasional departure from a settled practice owing to the exigencies of the hotel business would not justify a speculation or guess that this might have led to the loss. The probability that has found most favour on all sides for the theft is that it occurred while the bar was attended by one of the family, whose attention was called away by one of the confederates whilst the others stole the bag. I would not on this speculation hold that the respondents were to be held liable for "wilful act, default, or neglect." There is no affirmative evidence bringing home to the respondents direct negligence from which the loss resulted.

I think that the appellant's argument seeking to hold the respondents liable by the imputation of neglect for the theft from the office is coloured

June 26, 1908.

Whitehouse v.
Pickett.

Lord James of Hereford.

I wish to observe that if the trial had been before a jury and it had been found by them that the defenders had been guilty of negligence, a grave question would arise whether such a verdict should be set aside, for it may be that some evidence of negligence might be discovered; but this is an appeal against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary upon the whole case, and your Lordships have to review his findings upon the facts as well as the law of the case. With sincere respect for the authority of that learned Judge, I cannot avoid differing from him and agreeing with the Judges of the Extra Division.

So it appears to me that on this second ground also the pursuer's case fails, and that therefore the judgment of the Court below is correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD ROBERTSON was absent, but his opinion was read by the Lord Chancellor:—

I think the judgment appealed against sound.

By statute, an innkeeper is no longer liable, on the old common law ground, for goods lost in his house, except to the extent of £30. Beyond that, he can only be liable on one or other of the two grounds stated in the statute, that is if the goods have been deposited with the innkeeper expressly for safe custody, or if they have been stolen or lost through the wilful act, default, or neglect of the innkeeper or his servant.

Now, on the first of those alternatives, the appellant has no case at all. Buckley, the traveller, says, in so many words, that he cannot remember ever asking the respondents to take charge of the bag. What he did was simply to put the bag in a place which he thought at once safe and accessible during the day, while, on the other hand, at night he took it to his own bedroom, the bag being, in each case, placed and taken away without reference to the respondents. There is, therefore, no suggestion that this practice was initiated by, or based upon, any original and continuing trust, made and accepted, which should apply to the whole course of Buckley's visits. The thing was done simply on Buckley's estimate of the physical conditions of safety afforded by the place in question, and not on any guarantee of the respondents; as is shewn by his considering his own bedroom, when occupied by himself, still safer than the office. In the one case, as in the other, the respondents were not consulted. They knew, of course, that he put his bag there and that he took it away, in each case at his own hand.

In the other matter, of neglect, it is necessary to see first what duty is said to be neglected. The hypothesis of the argument is that there was no legal deposit expressly for safe custody, and the duty must therefore be one applicable to any goods not deposited for safe custody, of large value or small value. The appellant has no affirmative case on this subject, and the suggestions made are merely hints that this valuable bag ought to have had more care taken of it, which, of course, is simply giving the statute the go-by. When the proved facts are examined, it is plain enough that the bag got exactly the same protection that everything in the office got, including the respondents' own till. Unless, then, there is ground for holding in fact that the till was neglected, there is no ground for holding that this bag was neglected. And ground there is none. It is true that no one June 26, 1908.

sat on the bag any more than on the till; but there is no scintilla of evidence of any desertion of the room, which held both. Nor does the fact Whitehouse v.
of the theft itself evidence neglect, for it is now plain that three thieves Pickett.
were at work, and it is plausibly suggested that two might engage the Ld. Robertson.
occupant of the room in conversation while the third abstracted the bag.
These are among the risks which of old fell on the innkeeper, and now do not.

I must frankly say that I think the case a clear one for the respondents.

LORD COLLINS was absent, but his opinion was read by Lord Ashbourne.
—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary restored.

The Innkeepers Act (of the provisions of which the Lord Ordinary finds that sufficient notice was given) cuts down the absolute liability of the innkeeper to his guest for loss or injury to goods, such as those here in question, brought to his inn, to £30, except (1) where they have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ; (2) where such goods or property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

It has been held that the word "wilful" in the first exception is to be read as applying to "act" only—Squire v. Wheeler.¹

The Lord Ordinary, without deciding whether there was an express deposit for safe custody within the second exception, held that the goods in respect of which the action was brought were stolen or lost through the negligence of the defenders or their servants, and awarded the pursuer damages accordingly to the amount of £1790.

I agree that it is not necessary to decide here that there was an "express" deposit for safe custody, though, on the other hand, it would not be a very unreasonable inference to draw, from sixteen years' uniform practice, that the innkeeper accepted an obligation with regard to the bag containing jewellery higher than that under which he received the ordinary luggage of his guest. But it is enough to say that, with regard to it, he was at least in the position of a bailee for reward, and bound as such to a high degree of care. The statute, no doubt, in such case, throws the onus of proving negligence on the guest, and there was, in my opinion, evidence of negligence on the part of the innkeeper or his servants which a jury, had the case been tried by one, would have been fully justified in treating as having caused the loss. There was evidence from which a jury might well have inferred that one at least of the defenders was aware that the pursuer's bag had been placed for greater security in the office, and as to one door, at all events, giving access to it, the defenders admitted that the rule was that, when no one was in the office, it should be kept "snibbed." There was evidence that this precaution had not been uniformly adopted on the day in question, and that no special precautions had been taken to make sure that someone should be always on the spot to keep an eye on the things left for safety in the office. The learned Judge who tried the case, and

¹ (1867) 16 L. T. 93.

June 26, 1908. Whitehouse v. Pickett. heard and saw the witnesses, was at least as well entitled as a jury to draw inferences of fact from evidence which, in my opinion, must have been left to a jury had there been one, and I am certainly not prepared to differ from his conclusions. The argument of the respondents seemed to me to ignore the high degree of diligence incumbent upon the defenders as bailees for reward, even though there had not been the express deposit for safe custody mentioned in the section. It was equally a bailment for reward whether express or implied, and the risk involved and the degree of care required were well understood, but there was a pressure of business in the hotel that night, and less than reasonable care seems to have been exhibited. The fact that they were equally negligent in the custody of the money in their own till, even if relevant in the case of a gratuitous depository—see *Doorman v. Jenkins*¹—cannot excuse a bailee for reward.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his conclusion and his reasons.

ORDERED that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

CHRISTOPHER & RONEY—GARDINER & MACFIE, S.S.C.—A. & W. BEVERIDGE—CUTHERBERT & MARCHBANK, S.S.C.

¹ (1834) 2 A. & E. 256.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

1907-1908.

JAMES FAIRBAIRN AND OTHERS, Appellants.—Orr, K.C.—Moncrieff. No. 1.
THE LOCHRYAN OYSTER FISHERY COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER, May 31, 1907.
Respondents.—Dickson, K.C.—Munro.

Summary Procedure—Complaint—Instance—Company.—A summary complaint may be presented at the instance of an incorporated company without the conjunction of an officer of the company.

JAMES FAIRBAIRN, fisherman, and others were charged in the Sheriff Court at Stranraer, on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of "The Lochryan Oyster Fishery Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, and having its registered office in Manchester, lessees of the Lochryan Oyster Fishery aftermentioned, and John Alexander Agnew Wallace, Esq., of Lochryan, Cairnryan, Wigtownshire, proprietor of the said fishery, with consent and concurrence of John Marquis Rankin, Esq., Procurator-fiscal of Court at Stranraer, for the public interest."

The complaint set forth an offence against the Oyster Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1840 (3 and 4 Vict. cap. 74), sec. 2.

The accused stated, inter alia, the following objection to the complaint:—(2) "Instance defective."

On 21st November 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) repelled the objection and, after a proof, convicted the accused of the contravention charged.

The accused obtained a case, one of the questions of law being:—(2) "Is the instance defective in respect that the manager or other official of the respondents, the Lochryan Oyster Fishery Company, Limited, is not associated with the Company as complainer?"

The appellants argued;—In any complaint at the instance of an incorporated company, it was necessary to conjoin in the instance of the complaint together with the company some individual as acting for and under the authority of the company, who would be directly responsible for the proceedings and for the manner in which they were carried on.¹ This had not been done, and the instance of the Lochryan Oyster Fishery Company was accordingly defective; and, this being a joint prosecution, it could not proceed at the instance of the other prosecutor, when the instance of one was bad.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

¹ Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. Anderson, Oct. 28, 1897, 25 R. (J.) 14, per Lord Trayner, at p. 16, 2 Adam, 381.

May 31, 1907. LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a case where a complaint is brought against certain fishermen for having contravened the provisions of an Act for the better protection of the Oyster Fisheries in Scotland, inasmuch as they did, in a part of Lochryan known as “The Field,” unlawfully and wilfully trawl with a seine net. Several objections have been stated. The first is as to the instance, the complaint being at the instance of the Lochryan Oyster Fishery Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, and John Alexander Agnew Wallace, Esquire, of Lochryan, with consent and concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. It is said that this is bad, because an incorporated company cannot make a good instance unless they are coupled with some officer who may appear in Court and act on their behalf. I have not been able to see that that is a good objection. The conduct of the case in Court is another matter, but I do not see how they can be said not to have a title to prosecute. In the case which was quoted to us it seems to have been said that in practice it was in use to conjoin one of the company’s officers. I do not see how that makes the instance any better, nor do I see why there should be any difference between the rules which prevail in civil cases and those which prevail in criminal matters.

Fairbairn v.
Lochryan
Oyster
Fishery Co.,
Limited.

But, apart from that, the instance of Mr Wallace in this case was perfectly good, and he could not be prevented from going on with the case if, for example, the other prosecutor did not come to take part in the proceedings.

LORD M’LAREN and LORD KINNEN concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

SIMPSON & MAEWICK, W.S.—GARDEN & ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 2.

DAVID FINDLAY, Complainer.—MacRobert.

WILLIAM WALKER (Burgh Prosecutor, Paisley), Respondent.—M. P. Fraser.

July 18, 1907.

Findlay v.
Walker.

Summary Procedure—Complaint—Sentence—Common Law Offence—Notice of Penalty—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 29—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 490.—A summary complaint in a burgh Police Court, charging assault at common law, was headed “Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,” and did not contain any reference to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.

Held that it was competent for the Magistrate on this complaint to pronounce a sentence within the maximum authorised by sec. 490 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, although the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorised by sec. 29 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
LdStormonth-
Darling.
Lord Ardwall.

DAVID FINDLAY, potato merchant, 3 Hamilton Street, Paisley, was charged in the Police Court at Paisley on a summary complaint at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, headed “Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,” and setting forth that the accused, “on 18th March 1907, within the public-house at 38 High Street, Paisley, occupied by John Merry Forrester, spirit merchant, did assault William Keter, farmer, residing at Bogside Farm, Moorpark, Renfrew, by striking him a severe blow on the face with his fist, whereby his left lower eyelid was severely cut to the effusion of blood, and to the hurt and injury of his person: And the said David Findlay has been previously convicted of the crime of assault." The complaint did not make any reference to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and prayed the Court to adjudge the accused "to suffer the pains of law."

Findlay v.
Walker.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Magistrate pronounced the following conviction and sentence:—
"In respect of the evidence adduced, finds the said David Findlay guilty of the crime charged, aggravated as charged, and therefore fines and amerciates him in the sum of £10, payable to the Clerk of Court, and in default of immediate payment thereof, decerns and adjudges the said David Findlay to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days, unless the said sum shall be sooner paid; further, ordains the said David Findlay to find sufficient caution acted in the Books of Court for good behaviour for the period of six months from and after the date of payment of said fine, or of the expiration of said period of imprisonment, under a penalty of £20, and in default of said caution being found, sentences and adjudges the said David Findlay to be imprisoned for the further space of thirty days from the date of the payment of said fine or the expiration of the term of imprisonment for non-payment thereof, and thereafter to be set at liberty, and for that purpose grants warrant," &c.

Findlay presented a bill of suspension, in which he stated, inter alia:—"4. The said complaint was brought under only the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, and not under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.* Under the Summary Jurisdiction and Criminal Procedure Acts, and at common law, the said sentence was excessive and ultra vires. The presiding magistrate was not entitled to fine the complainer in a greater sum than £5, nor was he entitled

* The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), enacts:—

Sec. 29. "Where by any Act of Parliament a power is or shall be given to any sheriff, justices or justice, or magistrate in the exercise of jurisdiction as a judge of police to take cognisance of offences punishable by fine or imprisonment, without any declaration being expressed or implied of the powers of such judge of police in relation to the punishment of such offences, it shall be lawful for such sheriff, justices or justice, or magistrate convicting for an offence of which he or they may lawfully take cognisance, to sentence the person convicted to pay a penalty not exceeding five pounds, or, in the discretion of the judge, to sentence him to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding sixty days from the date of imprisonment, and also to adjudge him to find caution to keep the peace for six months under a further penalty of ten pounds, and in default of such caution being found to be imprisoned for a further period not exceeding thirty days."

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), enacts:—

Sec. 490. "The magistrate may either sentence the accused on conviction for common law crimes or offences to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any period not exceeding two months, or he may impose a fine not exceeding ten pounds, and failing payment thereof award imprisonment, not exceeding the respective periods after specified; and in lieu of or in addition to either of these modes of punishment he may order the accused to find security for good behaviour for any period not exceeding six months, and, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, and failing the finding of such security, he may award imprisonment or additional imprisonment not exceeding the respective periods after specified, but in no case shall the total imprisonment exceed sixty days except as hereinafter provided."

July 18, 1907. to ordain the complainer to find caution for his good behaviour as above mentioned. The said conviction and sentence is accordingly irregular, incompetent, and invalid. The complainer had no notice of, nor was he aware of, the terms of section 490 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.”¹

Findlay v.
Walker.

At advising,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This suspension is brought (1) on a ground which this Court cannot possibly entertain, viz., that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction; but (2) it is brought on the ground that the sentence was not warranted by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, on which the complaint bore to proceed. It is not denied by the accused that the sentence actually imposed—a fine of £10, followed by an order to find security for good behaviour for a period of six months—was fully warranted by section 490 of the Burgh Police Act in the case of a conviction, as this was, for a crime at common law. But it is said that the Burgh Police Act was not mentioned in the complaint, and that the only statutes which were mentioned in the heading of the complaint were the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. Moreover, it is said that the accused had no notice of, nor was he aware of, the terms of section 490 of the Act of 1892. I think it did not matter whether he had notice of it or not, and that he was bound to know the law as to the punishment which could be inflicted; although, of course, that could never apply to any section that creates a statutory offence, as to which distinct notice must always be given in the body of the complaint, so that an accused person may know what he is being charged with. But a mere enlargement of the magistrate’s powers with regard to sentence for a common law crime seems to me to be attended with no such consequences, and therefore I am of opinion that this suspension should be refused.

LORD ARDWALL.—I am of opinion that this suspension ought to be refused.

The principal, and, indeed, practically the only, ground on which the conviction under review is attacked is, that while the complaint on which it proceeds bears to be brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, the sentence pronounced exceeds the maximum sentence of thirty days’ imprisonment or a fine of £5 which, under the 29th section of the Act of 1864, Police Judges have power to pronounce. But it is answered that by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 490, the powers of Police Judges in this matter were enlarged to the effect of enabling them to pronounce a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding two months or a fine not exceeding £10.

The matter simply stands thus, that the provisions in section 29 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1864 are altered as regards Police Magistrates by section 490 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892, and of course the provisions of the later statute must prevail. Then by section 516 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, it is provided as follows:—“If it should be found convenient in any prosecution under this Act or any special statute, any of July 18, 1907. the provisions or forms of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or of the provisions or forms of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, may be used." ^{Findlay v. Walker.}

¹ Cited at the hearing:—Reid v. Millar, July 13, 1899, 1 F. (J.) 89, 3 Adam, 29.

I think that the fact that the prosecutor has taken advantage of this section and made use of the forms and provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts in the present complaint cannot reasonably be held to reimpose upon the Police Magistrate disposing of the complaint in the Burgh Police Court the limitations in the matter of sentences which were imposed by section 29 of the Act of 1864, but removed by section 490 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. There is, in my opinion, no obligation on a prosecutor in the case of a common law offence to libel the Act or Acts of Parliament under which the Judge is authorised to pronounce any particular sentence. ^{Lord Ardwall.}

I am therefore of opinion that the Police Magistrate in the present case was competent to pronounce the sentence he did, and that the suspension ought to be refused.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur.

THE COURT refused the bill.

WALTER M. MURRAY, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

DAVID GOLD, Complainer.—A. M. Anderson.

No. 3.

GEORGE NEILSON (Police Court Procurator-Fiscal, Glasgow),
Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Shaw—M. P. Fraser—A. Crawford.

Nov. 7, 1907.

Procedure—Relevancy—Locus—Latitude—Reset.—In a summary complaint for reset of forty-four different articles the crime was libelled as having been committed at four different specified places in Glasgow, "or at one or other of said places, or elsewhere in Glasgow, the particular place or places being to the complainer unknown." Held that, this being a case of reset, the latitude taken as regards the locus was legitimate.

Gold v.
Neilson.

M'Intosh, 1831, Bell's Notes to Hume, p. 213, and Wilkinson, 1835, Bell's Notes to Hume, p. 213, followed.

Summary Procedure—Conviction—Reset—Charge of resetting different articles at different times and places—Conviction in general terms.—A person was charged on a summary complaint with resetting forty-four different articles during a period of three weeks at four specified places in Glasgow, "or at one or other of said places, or elsewhere in Glasgow." Objections to the relevancy were repelled, and the accused on evidence was found "guilty of the crime charged." Held that it was not necessary in the conviction to specify the particular articles which the accused was found guilty of resetting, or the particular times and places at which the articles had been reset.

Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that a conviction of "guilty as libelled" means guilty of all that is libelled or of a substantial part thereof, and that in the ordinary case where the crime is alleged to have been committed as regards a number of different articles, and there is doubt as to the guilt of the accused as to some of the articles libelled, it is not necessary to mention this in the conviction.

Summary Procedure—Record of Proceedings—List of witnesses—Misnomer of witness—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 16.—In the record of proceedings on a summary complaint the name of the first witness was entered as "Joseph Milligan" instead of "Joseph Milliken," but Milliken's designation and address were correctly stated. Held that the misnomer was not a sufficient ground for suspending a conviction.

Nov. 7, 1907.

Gold v.
Neilson.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

LdStormonth-
Darling.
Lord Low.

DAVID GOLD, 74 Parson Street, Glasgow, was charged in the Police Court at Glasgow on a complaint, under the Glasgow Police Acts, the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 to 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, which set forth that the accused "did, during the period between 19th July and 9th August 1907, in his licensed broker's shop at 75 Glebe Street, in his house at 74 Parson Street, in his store at 64 Parson Street, and in a close at 14 Albert Street, Townhead, all in Glasgow, or at one or other of said places, or elsewhere in Glasgow, the particular place or places being to the complainer unknown, on different occasions during said period, the particular occasions being to the complainer unknown, reset in all, ten rubber cycle tubes, eight free-wheel clutches, twenty-four cycle inflator connections, one cycle hub, and one horn, the particular articles resetted on each occasion being to the complainer unknown, the said articles having been dishonestly appropriated by theft from the shop of Joseph Milliken, at 6 George Street, Glasgow, by" two persons specified.

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint in respect of the width of latitude taken as regarded time and place. The Magistrate repelled the objection.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Magistrate found him "guilty of the crime charged," and sentenced him to thirty days' imprisonment.

Gold brought a bill of suspension.

The complainer averred, inter alia :—(Art. 8) "Further, the record bears that one Joseph Milligan was examined as a witness. There was no such witness examined. Further, one Milliken was examined as a witness and his name is omitted from the record."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia ;—1. The said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended simpliciter, and the complainer set at liberty, in respect (1) that the complaint against him is irrelevant on the grounds stated in the objections thereto and as herein founded on . . . and (3) that the complainer, owing to the absence of specification in the pretended complaint brought against him was seriously prejudiced, and had no opportunity of instructing a proper defence so as to prove his innocence. 2. Separatim, the said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended in respect that it does not disclose the particular acts of which the Magistrate found the accused guilty, and that the Magistrate, in convicting the complainer of the crime as charged, should have specified the particular place or places, the articles and the dates, in respect of which the said conviction passed. 3. The said conviction and sentence should be set aside in respect that the names of the witnesses examined are not noted in the record of proceedings as required by statute.*

Answers were lodged for the Procurator-fiscal, in which he stated :—(Ans. 8) "Admitted that in the record of proceedings the name of the witness Joseph Milliken is spelt as Joseph Milligan. His designation otherwise is correct."

The case was heard on 7th November 1907.

* The record of proceedings in the Police Court on the complaint bore that the following witness, inter alios, was examined in support of the complaint, viz. :—"1. Joseph Milligan, Wholesale Cycle Dealer, 6 George Street, City, Glasgow."

The argument for the complainer sufficiently appears from his Nov. 7, 1907.
pleas in law, supra. Counsel referred to the Summary Procedure Gold v.
Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), Sched. K, 1, and sec. 16. Neilson.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no doubt or difficulty in holding that this bill of suspension must be refused.

To take the last objection first:—One of the witnesses in the list of witnesses is slightly misnamed. The object of having the names of the witnesses recorded is that they may be ascertained. When a witness has been slightly misnamed in the list, but his address and designation are correct, there can be no difficulty in ascertaining the person who is meant. I have therefore no difficulty in holding that the conviction cannot be set aside upon that ground. It would be absurd to hold otherwise. The total omission of the name of a witness from the list is quite a different matter. But a slight mistake in the name of a witness is not material, provided the person is sufficiently identified.

The complainer also objects to there being no finding by the Magistrate specifying the particular places, times, and articles as to which he was found guilty. It is an entirely new idea to me that where alternatives as to time and place have been stated in a complaint, and these allegations as to time and place have been held relevant to be remitted to probation, it is necessary to have special findings in the conviction and sentence as to the particular times and places at and on which the crime has been committed. But it is said here that the prosecutor took too great a latitude. The place of the crime is stated as, inter alia, “or elsewhere in Glasgow to the prosecutor unknown.” I should like to say that prosecutors ought always to avail themselves of the simpler forms of stating place and time authorised by the statute, which makes a great deal that is often found in complaints like this—such as this statement of “elsewhere to the prosecutor unknown”—quite superfluous. But as regards the latitude here taken, such latitude has been long ago decided to be legitimate in cases of reset. There are two cases in Bell’s Notes which clearly shew this. In the first of these cases¹ the place libelled was “within your house in King Street, Leith, or in some other part within the town or in the vicinity of Leith to the prosecutor unknown.” In the second case² the place libelled was “some place in the county of Perth to the prosecutor unknown.” Such latitude is necessary in cases of reset. It is a continuing crime. The person accused may originally have got the goods honestly, but if he afterwards finds that he got them from a thief, the moment he knows this he is guilty of reset, unless he takes steps at once by informing the police to shew that he has no guilty intention with regard to the goods.

But it is said, further, that this is a general conviction of resetting a great number of different articles, and that the complainer has been put to a disadvantage because he did not know from the conviction which articles he has been found guilty of resetting. The Magistrate was not bound to make any such finding. He pronounced a verdict of guilty as libelled. Now,

¹ M’Intosh, Jan. 4, 1831, Bell’s Notes to Hume on Crimes, p. 213.

² Wilkinson, Sept. 30, 1835, Bell’s Notes to Hume on Crimes, p. 213.

Nov. 7, 1907. Gold v. Neilson.
 Lord Justice-Clerk. that means guilty of resetting all the articles or part thereof. It may some times be important to distinguish as to particular articles, for example where the charge is resetting one article of great value and also other articles of comparatively small value. In such cases it might be right to limit the verdict to particular articles, and the matter should be attended to at the trial. But in the ordinary case where there is a doubt regarding the guilt of the accused as to two or three of the articles libelled, there is no need to mention that in the conviction. A general conviction of guilty means guilty of all that is charged or of a substantial and material part thereof, and that is enough. I may add that reset is in many respects peculiar. For example, it is competent in a case of reset to prove previous convictions for the purpose of shewing guilty intention.

On the whole matter I think everything in this case was done regularly and properly, and that there is no ground for setting aside the conviction.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING and LORD LOW concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill of suspension.

BRYSON & GRANT, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 4. DANIEL STEWART, Complainer.—D. Anderson.
 Dec. 4, 1907. THOMAS WILLIAM TODRICK (Procurator-Fiscal of Haddingtonshire), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—Orr, K.C., A.-D.—A. M. Anderson, A.-D.
 Stewart v. Todrick. *Road—Road Authority—Motor-car—Road in Burgh maintained by County—Title to apply for Speed Limit—Motor-Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), secs. 9 and 18—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 47.—*The burgh of Dunbar, under sec. 47 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, devolved the “management and maintenance” of a road within the burgh upon the County Council of Haddington. The County Council, as being the Road Authority, thereafter applied for and obtained a Regulation made by the Secretary for Scotland, under secs. 9 and 18 of the Motor-Car Act, 1903, restricting the speed of motor-cars on this road to ten miles an hour. The driver of a motor-car having been convicted of a contravention of the Regulation, brought a suspension pleading that the Regulation was ultra vires, in respect that the County Council were not the Local Authority entitled to apply for the Regulation.

The Court refused the suspension, per Lord M'Laren and Lord Pearson, on the ground that the Regulation was not ultra vires, and, per Lord Kinneir, on the ground that even if the Regulation was ultra vires the burgh of Dunbar was alone entitled to take the objection.

Statute—Statutory Order—Competency of challenging validity of order in Summary Proceeding—Motor-Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), secs. 9 and 18.—Question whether it was competent in a summary proceeding, such as a suspension, to challenge the validity of a regulation made by the Secretary for Scotland under sec. 18 (3) of the Motor-Car Act, 1903.

HIGH COURT. ON 8th July 1907 Daniel Stewart, motor-car driver, was charged Lord M'Laren. in the Sheriff Court at Haddington on a summary complaint at the Lord Kinneir. instance of Thomas William Todrick, Procurator-fiscal of Court of Lord Pearson. the county of Haddington, setting forth that “on 3d July 1907, on the public highway leading between East Linton and Dunbar, and particularly at a part thereof in the village of West Barns, in the parish of Dunbar, in the county of Haddington, near the Public Hall, West Barns, he being the driver of a motor-car then on said public highway, did drive said car along said highway, place aforesaid, at Dec. 4, 1907. the rate of 17 miles per hour, being a speed exceeding 10 miles per hour, contrary to the Motor-Car Act, 1903, section 9, and the Motor-Cars Regulation (County of Haddington) (No. 2) Order, 1905, dated October 31st, 1905, regulating the speed of motor-cars within certain limits or places in the county of Haddington." *

Stewart v.
Todrick.

On 12th August 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Macleod), after a proof, convicted the accused of the contravention charged, and imposed a fine of £5.

Stewart brought a bill of suspension of this conviction.

The following facts were admitted by the parties:—The road to which the Order applied, and on which the offence was committed, lay partly in the county of Haddington and partly in the burgh of Dunbar, the medium filum of the road constituting the boundary. The whole of the road, however, was managed and maintained by the County Council of Haddington, on whom the burgh of Dunbar had devolved the management and maintenance under and in terms of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, section 47,† the burgh of Dunbar being situated within the county of Haddington, and having a population of less than 10,000 inhabitants. The Order was obtained solely on the application of the County Council of Haddington, but no objections thereto were lodged or stated by the burgh of Dunbar.

* The Motor-Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), enacts:—Sec. 9. "(1) . . . A person shall not under any circumstances drive a motor-car on a public highway at a speed exceeding twenty miles per hour, and, within any limits or place referred to in regulations made by the Local Government Board with a view to the safety of the public on the application of the Local Authority of the area in which the limits or place are situate, a person shall not drive a motor-car at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour. . . ."

Sec. 18. "In the application of this Act to Scotland—(1) a reference to the Secretary for Scotland shall be substituted for a reference to the Local Government Board; (2) a reference to the council of a royal, parliamentary, or police burgh containing within its boundaries, as ascertained, fixed, or determined for police purposes, a population according to the census for the time being last taken of or exceeding 50,000, shall be substituted for a reference to the council of a county borough, and every other burgh shall be deemed to form part of the county within which it is situate; (3) the Road Authority of any county, or of any royal, parliamentary, or police burgh, shall be the Local Authority within the meaning of the provisions of this Act which relate to the rate of speed and the erection of danger boards. . . ."

The Motor-Cars Regulation (County of Haddington) (No. 2) Order, dated 31st October 1905, provides, inter alia, that a person shall not drive a motor-car at a speed exceeding ten miles an hour on the main road passing through the village of West Barns.

† The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), enacts:—

Sec. 47. "The highways and bridges situated within any burgh shall be by virtue of this Act transferred to and vested in the Local Authority of such burgh, and such Local Authority shall have the entire management and control of the same, and shall possess the same rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same liabilities in reference to such highways and bridges (including the construction of new roads and bridges) as the trustees under this Act possess and are liable to in reference to roads, highways, and bridges (including as aforesaid) in the landward part of the

Dec. 4, 1907.

Stewart v.
Todrick.

The complainer pleaded;—(2) The said regulation of the County Council of Haddington is invalid and ultra vires, et separatim is invalid and ultra vires quoad the portion of said roadway not under their jurisdiction.

The respondent pleaded;—(2) The said Regulation Order of 31st October 1905 is lawful and valid in all respects, and, separatim, the complainer has no title to challenge its validity. (3) The said roadway is under the jurisdiction of the said County Council for the purposes of said Act. (4) The said conviction is well founded in fact, and is not open to review in this process; and the bill of suspension should be refused, with expenses.

Argued for the complainer;—The Order was invalid in respect that it was obtained at the instance of a party who, not being the “Road Authority” for the highway in question, had no title to apply for a regulation affecting it. The jurisdiction of the County Council of Haddington extended only over the portion of the road lying within the boundaries of the county, and did not extend over the portion situated within the burgh of Dunbar. The fact that the “management and maintenance” of the latter portion had been devolved upon the County Council did not constitute them the “Road Authority” within the meaning of the Motor-Car Act, 1903. The terms “management and maintenance” as used in section 47 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, were to be construed strictly,¹ and did not include the right to control the traffic upon the road. The Order being invalid, the conviction obtained under it should be suspended.

Argued for the respondent;—The Road Authority, and the only possible Road Authority, over the whole of the highway to which the Order applied, was the County Council of Haddington. There was nothing which a Road Authority could do to the roads under its charge which was not expressed in the words “management and maintenance.” These terms included not merely the duty of upkeep, but also the right to take such measures for the control of traffic as were proper in the interests of the public, and generally—in the words of section 47—the whole “rights, powers, privileges, and liabilities” originally possessed by the burgh. This was also in accord-county, including the right to any assets belonging thereto, and shall also have and may exercise with reference to the construction, maintenance, and repair of the roads, highways, and bridges within their respective boundaries, such and the like powers and authorities as they possess with reference to any streets within their respective boundaries: Provided that the Local Authority of any burgh not containing more than 10,000 inhabitants according to the census last taken may, by a resolution passed at a meeting summoned for the purpose, on not less than one month's notice, by special advertisement, devolve the management and maintenance of the highways and bridges within the boundaries or forming the boundary thereof upon the trustees of the county within which such burgh or any portion thereof is situated, on payment to such trustees of such an annual sum or upon such terms as may be agreed upon,” and in default of agreement, on the summary application of either party, by the Sheriff. “Provided also, that any such resolution of the Local Authority of a burgh may be rescinded, with the consent of, and on such terms as may be agreed upon with the County Road Trustees, and thereupon the original rights, powers, privileges, and liabilities of the said Local Authority shall revive in full force and effect.”

¹ Lanarkshire Road Trustees v. Kelvinside Estate Trustees, Nov. 12, 1886, 14 R. (H. L.) 18.

ance with the policy of the Motor-Car Act, 1903, which was¹ to treat small burghs as part of the county. But apart from the question of the extent of the County Council's authority, it was not competent—^{Stewart v. Todrick.} at anyrate in a summary proceeding such as the present—to challenge the validity of an Order made by a Department of Government under statutory authority, and ex facie valid.² Even assuming the competency of the objection, it was not one which could be taken by the complainer, for the only parties who could be heard to say that the Order had been applied for by the wrong persons were the parties who themselves might have had a title to apply, namely, the burgh of Dunbar, and they had taken no objection.

LORD M'LAREN.—We have had a very full and interesting argument upon the questions raised in this case, and especially concerning the validity of the Regulation Order made by the Secretary for Scotland under the authority of the Motor-Car Act, 1903. By section 9 of that Act it is provided that “within any limits or place referred to in regulations made by the Local Government Board with a view to the safety of the public on the application of the Local Authority of the area in which the limits or place are situate, a person shall not drive a motor-car at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour.” By section 18 it is provided that in the application of the Act to Scotland, “Secretary for Scotland” shall be substituted for “Local Government Board,” and that “the Road Authority of any county, or of any royal, parliamentary, or police burgh, shall be the Local Authority within the meaning of the provisions of this Act which relate to the rate of speed and the erection of danger boards.” Now, section 9 is a provision relating to rate of speed, and accordingly when, under that section, power is given to make regulations, the only authority entitled to apply to the Secretary for Scotland for such regulation is the Local Authority, that is, the Road Authority in the county or burgh as the case may be. But we are informed of a fact which does not appear in the bill of suspension but is disclosed in the answers, that, acting under the authority of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and particularly under section 47, the burgh of Dunbar has, in the words of the statute, “devolved” upon the County Council of Haddington the “management and maintenance” of the road in question “forming the boundary” of the burgh. I assume for the purposes of this case that all the requirements of procedure as to devolution were carried out. There is a general presumption that all public acts have been carried out in conformity with law, and I assume that it is so in this case. This devolution having taken place, can it be doubted that, so long as it continued, the whole administration of this road passed to the County Council of Haddington? It is quite certain that the burgh of Dunbar no longer possesses the power of administration, and cannot in any reasonable sense be considered the Road Authority. Unless the County Council is the Road Authority, we are shut up to this paradoxical result, that there is no Road Authority

¹ Cf. secs. 9 (4), (b), and (c).

² Crichton v. Forfar County Road Trustees, July 20, 1886, 13 R. (J.) 99, per Lord M'Laren, at p. 101, 1 White, 213; Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, June 11, 1894, 21 R. (H. L.) 61.

Dec. 4, 1907. Stewart v. Todrick.
 Lord M'Laren. having control of the road in question. I think there can be no doubt that the effect of the devolution was to make the County Council the Road Authority, not only for the purposes of the Roads and Bridges Act, but also for the purposes of the Motor-Car Act. I am confirmed in this opinion by the terms of the proviso to section 47 of the Roads and Bridges Act, which enacts that "any such resolution of the Local Authority of a burgh may be rescinded, with the consent of, and on such terms as may be agreed upon with the County Road Trustees, and thereupon the original rights, powers, privileges, and liabilities of the said Local Authority shall revive in full force and effect." It would be difficult in any view to say what would be left, after the "management and maintenance" had been devolved, except a naked right of property, but I read the proviso as putting a wide interpretation upon the terms "management and maintenance," and as making it clear that under these words are included all the "rights, powers, privileges, and liabilities" originally possessed by the burgh.

If such be the construction of the two Acts with which we are concerned, then the Order made by the Secretary for Scotland is in conformity with the statute, and must be obeyed. But I reserve my opinion on the question whether an Order made by a Department of Government in the exercise of authority conferred by Parliament, can be challenged as being ultra vires in a summary proceeding for the recovery of penalties. It is not to be supposed that an Order going beyond the powers conferred by Parliament has authority in an absolute sense, but it may well be that it is to be treated as a good Order until it is disaffirmed by a Court having jurisdiction to determine its validity. I see great inconvenience in admitting that, whenever a defender is brought before a Court of summary jurisdiction, he is entitled to raise the question of the validity of the Order which he is said to have transgressed. In this case the Judge having jurisdiction is the Sheriff, but offences against Orders such as the one in question are not infrequently tried in a Court where the Judge is not a trained lawyer, and I should not like to commit myself to the proposition that such a Judge has authority to absolve the accused on the ground that the Order is ultra vires. For the present I only say that I am not satisfied that this Court of Appeal would have power to determine a legal question which could not be raised in the Court of first instance.

I am of opinion that the bill of suspension should be refused and the conviction sustained.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree in desiring to express no view upon the question last mentioned by your Lordship, but I am clearly of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

On 31st October 1905 the Secretary for Scotland pronounced an Order upon the application of the County Council of Haddington forbidding any person to drive a motor-car at a speed exceeding 10 miles per hour within certain specified limits, and on 12th August 1907 the complainer was convicted of an infringement of this Order. It is admitted that the complainer had no right to challenge this conviction upon the merits, since there is no appeal upon the question of fact. But he objects to it upon the ground that the Order which he transgressed was ultra vires, because the statute allows the Secretary for Scotland to make such an Order on the application only of the Local Authority of the county or burgh where the road is situated. It appears that for a certain not very considerable distance the road to which the Order applies is situated upon the boundary between the county of Haddington and the burgh of Dunbar, the true boundary being the medium filum of the road, and it is said that the Secretary for Scotland had no power, on the application of the county of Haddington, to issue an Order affecting the portion of the road lying within the boundaries of the burgh of Dunbar, seeing that the County Council had no authority over this portion of the road. I do not think it necessary to consider whether, even if they had no other authority than that which extended to the medium filum, that would not have been enough to support the application on a sound construction of the Act of 1903, and to enable them to consider the question of the speed at which motor-cars could be driven on their own half of the road. I do not think that question arises. It is quite obvious that the management of such a road as this would be impossible if the two Local Authorities had not the good sense to provide by agreement for a uniform administration of the whole, and accordingly, in terms of the 47th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, these two Local Authorities had come to an arrangement by which the burgh of Dunbar "devolved" upon the County Council of Haddington the "management and maintenance" of the road. It is argued that all that was handed over was the "management and maintenance," the burgh retaining certain other rights and privileges comprehended under the term "control." I do not consider it necessary to decide what were the exact powers which were devolved upon the County Council, for I think it enough to say that when they took over the "management and maintenance" they became for certain purposes the Road Authority—and the only Road Authority—not only over their own half of the road, but also over the half which lies within the boundaries of the burgh, and by sec. 18 of the Act of 1903 the Road Authority is declared to be the Local Authority within the meaning of sec. 9. If the burgh of Dunbar had any right to maintain that the title to apply for an Order regulating the speed of motor-cars was one of the rights retained by them—and I express no opinion as to that—I am clearly of opinion that no one else has the right to maintain it. The whole procedure had the assent of the burgh, at least they stated no objections to it, and I do not think that the accused has a title to raise such a technical objection as this, when all the persons who could claim to be the Road Authorities are agreed on what has been done.

Dec. 4, 1907.
Stewart v.
Todrick.
Lord Kinneear.

I accordingly agree that the suspension should be refused.

LORD PEARSON.—I am of the same opinion. I have nothing to add as to the circumstances in which, and the pleas upon which, a statutory Order such as this can be challenged. On the merits we must bear in mind the peculiar circumstances found here, viz., a road forming the boundary between the burgh of Dunbar and the county, where the duty of management and control fell on each authority respectively up to the medium filum of the road. That was a case calling for some regulation by agreement between the two parties, and accordingly the burgh here has devolved the management of the road in question on the County Council. In consequence of

Dec. 4, 1907. this agreement the County Council became the Road Authority as regards the management of the road, and as such was the proper party to apply for the Order in question.

Stewart v Todrick.

THE COURT refused the bill, and sustained the conviction.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 5.

ANDREW PATERSON GREIG, Appellant.—Munro—Welsh.

JOHN MACLEOD, Respondent.—R. S. Horne.

Dec. 4, 1907.

Greig v. Macleod.

Public-House — Public-House Offences — Sale of Exciseable Liquors to children—Responsibility of Publican for assistant—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), sec. 59.—Under section 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, exciseable liquors to any person under fourteen years of age, except in corked or sealed vessels in quantities not less than one pint, is guilty of an offence.

Exciseable liquors in quantities less than one pint were sold in open vessels to a girl of eleven years of age by a publican's assistant, who had means of knowing the age of the child. The sale took place outwith the publican's presence and actual personal knowledge, but no sufficient instructions had been given by him to his assistant not to supply children under fourteen years of age with exciseable liquors except as provided by the statute.

Held that the publican had been rightly convicted of a contravention of the Act.

HIGH COURT.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinnear.
Lord Pearson.

ON 10th July 1907 Andrew Paterson Greig, residing in Moat Place, Edinburgh, and holding a certificate for a public-house at Nos. 23 and 24 Bridge Street, Leith, was charged in the Leith Police Court, at the instance of John Macleod, Burgh Prosecutor, with contravening section 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903. The charge was that "on the 29th June last, within the licensed premises occupied by him at 23 and 24 Bridge Street, Leith, he did knowingly allow David Inglis, an assistant in said premises, to sell and deliver exciseable liquor, namely, a half-pint of ale and a half-pint of porter, to Beatrice Nicholson, an orphan, residing with John Furlong, a labourer, residing in Carpenter's Land, Coburg Street, Leith, who was then eleven years and two months, and under fourteen years of age, for consumption off the said premises, such exciseable liquor not being sold and delivered to the said Beatrice Nicholson in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off said premises only." *

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted after a proof, and fined 20s.

He obtained a case in which the Magistrate set forth:—"The following facts were held by me to be proved, viz.—On the evening of Saturday, 29th June, between 9 and 10 o'clock, the said Beatrice Nicholson entered the appellant's licensed premises mentioned in the complaint by the jug bar. The jug bar is entered from the street by a separate door from that by which the public bar is entered. The public bar and the jug bar are divided outside the bar by a screen which is carried the breadth of the counter, and both are supplied from behind the counter. Beatrice Nicholson ordered half a pint of ale and half a pint of porter from David Inglis, an assistant in the appellant's shop. The said David Inglis has been in the appellant's employment as assistant since he purchased the business seven years ago. The said David Inglis supplied the said Beatrice Nicholson with the liquor ordered, as libelled. The appellant was not at the time either in the public or jug bar, but was engaged in a room in another part of the shop, and Beatrice Nicholson was supplied by the said David Inglis outwith the appellant's presence and actual personal knowledge. The said Beatrice Nicholson had left the appellant's shop without his having seen her, and he only saw her when she was brought back to the shop by the police, who noticed her leaving the shop with the beer and porter in open pitchers, and immediately took her back to the shop to ascertain whether she had been supplied there, and by whom she had been served.

* The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), enacts:—Sec. 59 (1). "Every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of exciseable liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years, for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such exciseable liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only, shall be liable to a penalty . . ."

Dec. 4, 1907.
Greig v.
Macleod.

"The said Beatrice Nicholson was eleven years and two months of age, and her appearance in the witness-box shewed that she was diminutive and youthful looking even for a girl of that age. She had previously frequented the shop with her mother. Her family was well known to the said David Inglis, who had a conversation with the mother about the girl's age, the mother stating that the girl was a twin and diminutive for her age. Inglis must or ought to have known that the girl was under fourteen years of age.

"No notice was displayed in the appellant's shop warning assistants to be careful to observe the provisions of the said section of the Act alleged to be contravened, and it was clear to me that sufficient instructions, verbal or written, had not been given to the said David Inglis not to supply children under fourteen years of age with excisable liquor, except as provided in said section.

"On the facts proved I found the appellant guilty as charged, fined him in the sum of 20s., and in default of immediate payment sentenced him to seven days' imprisonment."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was—"Do the facts proved warrant a conviction?"

Argued for the appellant;—No offence was committed unless the sale took place with the knowledge of the holder of the certificate. Knowledge meant either actual personal knowledge or connivance, and in this case it was expressly found that the sale took place outwith the knowledge or presence of the appellant. Failure to give instructions could not be considered "knowledge," and even if it were, there was sufficient evidence that the appellant had done all that was required of him. Section 59 of the Licensing Act, 1903, was in the same terms as section 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, under which it had been held that a licence-holder, whose assistant sold liquors to children contrary to the Act, outwith the personal knowledge of the licence-holder, was not guilty of an offence.¹

¹ Emary v. Nolloth, L. R., [1903] 2 K. B. 264; Conlon v. Muldowney, I. R., [1904] 2 K. B. 498; M'Kenna v. Harding, March 24, 1905, 69 J. P. Cases, 354.

Dec. 4, 1907.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

Greig v.
Macleod.

LORD M'LAREN.—In this case the question is, what constitutes an offence against the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 59. That section imposes a penalty on "every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of exciseable liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years, for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such exciseable liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels."

In the present case the facts as found proved by the Magistrate make it clear that such liquor was supplied, in an open vessel, to a girl of eleven years of age, whose appearance was suggestive that she was even younger, and that no notice or instructions had been given to the assistant, David Inglis, not to supply children under fourteen years of age in such a manner. The question is therefore, the liquor having been sold in these circumstances, by an assistant, has an offence been committed? In the case of Emery v. Nolloth,¹ we have the authority of Lord Alverstone for this construction of the provisions of the section, that if a person in the position of the appellant delegates the conduct of his business to another, he is responsible for the acts of the person to whom he has given the institorial power as if he had made the sale himself. Now, I think it is not an illegitimate extension of the rule thus laid down if I say that every licensee who delegates the conduct of a part of his business is at least responsible to the extent that he must give instructions to his assistant as to compliance with Acts of Parliament which regulate the spirit trade.

The Magistrate here has given the facts very clearly, and we must take his findings as conclusive on the facts. He says—"It was clear to me that sufficient instructions, verbal or written, had not been given to David Inglis not to supply children under fourteen years of age with exciseable liquor, except as provided in the section." In the absence of any such instructions I think it is consistent with a sound construction of the statute to hold that if the appellant does not instruct his assistant to give obedience to the requirements of the statute, he must be taken as assenting to what is done under his authority, and that in this case he has contravened section 59 of the Act. I am therefore of opinion that the argument for the appellant fails, and that this appeal falls to be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I only desire to add that the question which the case purports to raise is one of fact, and I see no ground in law for disturbing the Magistrate's finding on the facts.

LORD PEARSON.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

GARDEN & ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—R. H. MILLER, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ L. R., [1903] 2 K. B. 264.

ROBERTSON BARCLAY GORDON (Procurator-Fiscal of Elginshire), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—A. M. Anderson, A.-D.—John Harvey.
JOHN SHAW, Respondent.—Macmillan.

No. 6.

Jan. 17, 1908.

Statutory Offence—Fishing—Sea Fishing—Trawling within Prohibited Area—Seaman—Offence committed by member of crew acting under orders—Proof—Onus—Duty of Prosecutor to prove guilty knowledge—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 7 (1)—Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 10 (4), (5)—Bye-laws Nos. 10 and 14 of Fishery Board for Scotland.—Bye-law No. 10 of the Fishery Board for Scotland enacts that within a certain area “no person” shall use an otter-trawl for taking sea fish. Gordon v. Shaw.

In a complaint against a seaman charging a contravention of this bye-law, it was proved that the vessel on which the accused was employed had been engaged in trawling within the prohibited area; that the accused occupied a subordinate position on the vessel, and acted under the orders of his superior officers. It was not proved by the prosecutor that the accused knew, or must have known, that the vessel was within prohibited waters on the occasion libelled, and no evidence was led for the defence.

The Sheriff-substitute found the charge not proven.

In an appeal by stated case held (1) that it was no defence to the charge that the accused occupied a subordinate position on the vessel and acted under the orders of his superior officers; (2) that the prosecutor, having established the facts specified in the statute as constituting the offence, was not bound to prove further that the accused knew the position of the vessel when the offence was committed; and appeal sustained.

Question whether it would have been a sufficient defence for the accused to prove that he did not know that the trawling was within the prohibited area.

Question whether in the case of statutory offences, if the word “knowingly” is not used, ignorance can ever be a defence.

The King v. Marsh, 1824, 2 B. & C. 717, commented on.

JOHN SHAW, residing at 122 Orwell Street, Grimsby, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Elgin on a summary complaint, dated 22d May 1907, at the instance of Robertson Barclay Gordon, Procurator-fiscal of the Court. The complaint set forth that the accused “has been guilty of a contravention of the Sea Fisheries Acts and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts,* in so far as on 23d March 1907, at

HIGH COURT.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinneir.
Lord Pearson.

* The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 7 (1), enacts:—

“The Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling and otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, in any area or areas to be defined in such bye-law, and may from time to time make, alter, and revoke bye-laws for the purposes of this section, but no such bye-law shall be of any validity until it has been confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland.”

Bye-law No. 10, dated 27th September 1892, made by the Fishery Board for Scotland, under the powers conferred on the Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885, the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890, provides:—

“II. Whereas by the Act 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23, being the aforesaid Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, it is enacted that the Fishery Board for Scotland may by bye-law or bye-laws direct that the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeen-

Jan. 17, 1908.

Gordon v.
Shaw.

a part of the Moray Firth thirteen and one-third miles or thereby south-east by south a half south from Port Gower, Sutherlandshire and within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire, he being at the time a deck hand on board of the steam-trawler 'Zenobia,' S.R. 11, of Stavanger, Norway, and not in the service or possessing the written authority of the Fishery Board for Scotland, did use or assist in using an otter-trawl for taking sea fish, contrary to bye-law number ten, made by the Fishery Board for Scotland, under the powers conferred on the said Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885, the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (particularly section 7 (1) thereof), and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890, dated said bye-law at Edinburgh on 27th September 1892, confirmed by Her late Majesty's Secretary for Scotland on 22d November 1892, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette on 25th November 1892, as amended by bye-law number fourteen, made by the said Fishery Board for Scotland, under the powers conferred on the said Board by the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 7 (1), dated said bye-law at Edinburgh on 17th April 1896, confirmed by Her late Majesty's Secretary for Scotland on 6th August 1896, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette on 18th August 1896, a copy of which bye-laws certified by the Secretary of the said Fishery Board for Scotland is produced herewith: whereby the said John Shaw is on conviction liable, in terms of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, section 10 (particularly subsections 4 and 5), to a fine not exceeding One hundred pounds, and failing immediate payment of the fine, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days."

shire, in any area or areas to be defined 'in such bye-law,' it is hereby declared that the foregoing provision shall apply to the whole of the area above specified.

"III. Within the aforesaid area, as above defined, no person, unless in the service or possessing the written authority of the said Fishery Board for Scotland, under the hand of the Secretary thereof, shall at any time from the date when this bye-law shall come into force use any beam-trawl or otter-trawl for taking sea fish. . . ."

This bye-law was confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland on 22d November 1892, and was amended as to the penalties therein provided by Bye-law No. 14, dated 17th April 1896, made by the Fishery Board.

The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 10, enacts:—

"(4) Any person who uses any such method of fishing in contravention of any such bye-law shall be liable on conviction, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, and failing immediate payment of the fine, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or arrestment, if no imprisonment has followed on the conviction; and every net set, or attempted to be set, in contravention of any such bye-law, may be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of by any superintendent of the herring fishery or other officers employed in the execution of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts. Provided always that, if no conviction shall follow, any net so seized shall be forthwith returned, and due compensation made for any loss or damage occasioned thereto by such seizure.

"(5) Subsection two of section seven of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, is hereby repealed, and the provisions of the foregoing subsection shall be and are hereby substituted therefor."

The accused did not appear. Evidence was led for the prosecutor. Jan. 17, 1908.

The Sheriff-substitute (Webster) found the charge not proven, and assoilzied the accused. Gordon v.
Shaw.

The prosecutor obtained a case for appeal.

The stated case, after narrating the complaint, set forth as follows :
—“It was proved that the said steam-trawler ‘Zenobia’ was on the date libelled engaged in trawling with an otter-trawl for taking sea fish at the place mentioned in the complaint. It was further proved that the respondent was on that occasion not in a position of authority for the purpose of directing the navigation, management, or fishing operations of the ‘Zenobia.’ It was also proved that he did not direct, nor did he assist in directing, such navigation, management, or fishing operations. It was further proved that he occupied a subordinate position as a member of the crew of the ‘Zenobia,’ and as such member of the crew, acting under orders of his superior officers, he assisted in the trawling operation proved. It was not proved that he knew or must of necessity have known of the position of the said vessel on the occasion specified. The charge against the respondent was found not proven.”

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was :—“Whether, on finding the facts stated proved, the Sheriff-substitute was justified in finding the charge against the respondent not proven ?”

Argued for the appellant ;—The complaint was admittedly relevant, and the prosecutor had proved all the facts constituting the offence libelled ; this being so, the Sheriff had no option but to convict, and had erred in finding the charge not proven. He had done so on apparently two grounds—(1) because the accused was in a subordinate position ; and (2) because it had not been proved that the accused knew the position of the vessel. As to the first point, the plea of subjection was no defence, unless it could be shewn that the accused had acted under compulsion, and the facts as stated fell far short of this. This was the common law rule both in Scotland¹ and in England.² It was also in accordance with the terms of the Sea Fisheries Acts, for although under the earlier statutes and bye-laws made by the Fishery Board the penalty was confined to the master,³ the later enactments, including those under which the present complaint was brought, provided that any person could be convicted and punished for the offence.⁴ A similar distinction between offences for which the master alone could be punished and for which any ¹ H. M. Advocate v. Boyd, Jan. 7, 1842, 1 Broun, 7; H. M. Advocate v. Henderson, June 13, 1842, 1 Broun, 360; H. M. Advocate v. Woods, Feb. 25, 1839, 2 Swin. 323; Hume on Crimes (3d ed.), i. 47, 50, 53; Bell's Notes to Hume, pp. 7, 8; Alison's Criminal Law, i. 672; Fraser, Master and Servant (3d ed.), p. 305.

² Russell on Crimes (6th ed.), i. 146.

³ Sea Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 45), sec. 63; Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), sec. 20 (1); Bye-law No. 1, dated 1st Feb. 1886; Bye-law No. 2, dated 18th April 1887; Bye-law No. 3, dated 25th April 1887.

⁴ Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 4; Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), sec. 6, 7; Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 10), sec. 3; Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 10 (4), (5); Bye-law No. 8, dated 19th July 1890; Bye-law No. 10, dated 27th Sept. 1892.

Jan. 17, 1908.

Gordon v.
Shaw.

person was liable was taken in the analogous offence of smuggling.¹ As to the plea that there was no proof that the accused knew the position of the vessel, two answers could be given. In the first place ignorance was no defence to the charge,² though it might be a good plea in mitigation of the penalty. Ignorance could only be a defence when the statute provided that the offence must be committed "knowingly," which was not the case in the present instance. In the second place, even if ignorance were a good defence, it was for the accused to prove it, and this he had failed to do. The onus was not on the prosecutor to prove guilty knowledge. He had established the facts which constituted the offence as defined by statute, and it was for the accused to displace the presumption of guilt which thereupon arose³ by proving excusable ignorance. Bye-law No. 10 had already been before the Court in *Wilson v. Rust*⁴ and Mortensen v. Peters.⁵

Argued for the respondent ;—The Sheriff had found that the accused was acting under orders, and this was tantamount to saying that he acted under compulsion. The position of a seaman on board a vessel was very different from that of an ordinary servant.⁶ On the question of knowledge, the Sheriff was entitled to take into consideration all the circumstances—such as the distance of the vessel from land, and the improbability of an ordinary seaman being able to know the position of the vessel at any moment—and from these to infer that the accused was excusably ignorant that an offence was being committed. The English cases relied on by the appellant in support of the proposition that ignorance was no defence were not applicable. In The King v. Marsh,⁷ the judgments shewed that ignorance would have been considered a good defence if it had been proved. *The Queen v. Prince*⁸ was a case of malum in se, not malum prohibitum. *The Queen v. Bishop*⁹ dealt with an offence against the Lunacy Acts, and was decided on the view that none could have been ignorant that the persons concerned were lunatics. The offence here libelled was "using or assisting to use," and there was no proof of unity of purpose between the accused and the master, who was the person primarily responsible. It was for the appellant to shew that on the facts found the Sheriff was bound to convict, and was not entitled to infer innocence, and this the appellant had failed to establish.

At advising on January 17, 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal on a stated case from a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute at Elgin in a complaint under the Fisheries Acts, charging the defender with a contravention of a bye-law of the Fishery

¹ Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 36), secs. 172, 179; Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 12), sec. 12.

² The King v. Marsh, 1824, 2 B. & C. 717; The Queen v. Prince, 1875, L. R., 2 C. C. R. 154; The Queen v. Bishop, 1880, L. R., 5 Q. B. D. 259.

³ Macdonald on Crimes, p. 1.

⁴ Feb. 29, 1896, 23 R. (J.) 56, 2 Adam, 114.

⁵ July 19, 1906, 8 F. (J.) 93, 5 Adam, 121.

⁶ Rothwell v. Hutchison, Jan. 21, 1886, 13 R. 463, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 464.

⁷ 2 B. & C. 717.

⁸ 2 C. C. R. 154.

⁹ 5 Q. B. D. 259.

Board for Scotland duly made and confirmed, whereby the defender is on Jan. 17, 1908. conviction liable, in terms of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, Gordon v. 1895, sec. 10, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, or imprisonment Shaw. for a period not exceeding sixty days.

Lord M'Laren.

The Sheriff-substitute found the case against the defender not proven, and the Procurator-fiscal has appealed from this sentence to the Court.

The facts are very clearly and succinctly stated in the case, and all the facts found being essential, it is only necessary that I should read the paragraph in which these are set out—"It was proved that the said steam-trawler 'Zenobia' was on the date libelled engaged in trawling with an otter-trawl for taking sea fish at the place mentioned in the complaint. It was further proved that the respondent was on that occasion not in a position of authority for the purpose of directing the navigation, management, or fishing operations of the 'Zenobia.' It was also proved that he did not direct, nor did he assist in directing, such navigation, management, or fishing operations. It was further proved that he occupied a subordinate position as a member of the crew of the 'Zenobia,' and as such member of the crew, acting under orders of his superior officers, he assisted in the trawling operation proved. It was not proved that he knew or must of necessity have known of the position of the said vessel on the occasion specified."

It was not seriously disputed that a seaman, or fisherman serving as a seaman on board a fishing vessel, would be liable to conviction if he were proved to have assisted in the operation of trawling within a prohibited area, knowing that the vessel was within the locality in which trawling was illegal.

But on behalf of the defender and respondent it was contended that such knowledge could not be imputed to an ordinary seaman, who has not the means of determining the ship's position at sea, and who would not in the ordinary conduct of the business of navigating the ship be informed by the master as to the ship's position. As a matter of impression I think it is very likely that an ordinary seaman, when out of sight of land, would not know the exact position of the ship, and in this case it is found not proved that he knew, or must of necessity have known, what was the ship's position.

On the other hand, the respondent, although entitled to be a witness in his own case, did not come forward to excuse himself by professing ignorance of the ship's position.

While, in the case of a charge of crime under the common law, guilty knowledge or guilty intention is of the essence of the crime, yet there are many cases where such knowledge or intent is presumed from the facts in the absence of a special defence.

In the case of a breach of a statutory regulation, it is not a universal rule that intention to contravene the statute must be established. That may depend on the policy of the statute, and also on the language of the statute. If the enactment is in form an absolute prohibition against doing a certain thing, it seems to me that in general the prosecutor may be held to have established his case if he proves the commission of the prohibited act by the person accused, unless the accused is able to satisfy the Court that in the special circumstances of the case he is excusable.

In this case there are four statutes dealing with contravention of trawling

Jan. 17, 1908. regulations ; but it is only necessary to refer particularly to the latest of these, the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1895, sec. 10, subsec. (4), being the Act which prescribes the penalties for infringement of these regulations. Now, the enactment begins with the words, "Any person who uses any such method of fishing in contravention of any such bye-law shall be liable on conviction" to the fine or period of imprisonment there prescribed. This is in the nature of a universal prohibition, and there is not a suggestion in the words of the statute that knowledge of the locality is necessary to constitute the offence. If it were necessary to a conviction that the prosecutor should prove knowledge on the part of the contravener that he was fishing in prohibited waters, it would be very difficult to get a conviction against anyone, and I cannot see that there is any hardship in the case, because it is the duty of those who engage in the fishing industry to inform themselves, and to take care that they do not fish where they are not entitled to fish. In the case of the master of a trawling vessel this is clear enough, and it may be that the ends of justice would be satisfied if the penalty were only enforceable against the master.

Gordon v.
Shaw.

Lord M'Laren.

But evidently that was not the opinion of the Legislature, because the penalty for contravention is directed against all persons who shall use such method of fishing in contravention of a bye-law of the Fishery Board. I am accordingly of opinion that the respondent was not entitled to a judgment of not proven on the facts stated. I need hardly add that where a person in the position of the respondent comes forward, and is able to satisfy the Sheriff that he was excusably ignorant of the position of the fishing vessel, or that he acted under compulsion, and after protest, his case will always receive indulgent consideration ; but if he says nothing, and fishing within the prohibited area is proved against him, I think that the Judge or magistrate has no discretion, and that a conviction must necessarily follow.

LORD KINNEAR.—I come to the same conclusion. The question put to us in this special case is not very happily stated, because it appears on the face of it to be a question of fact, but when it is read in connection with the statement of facts given by the learned Sheriff, there is no real difficulty in ascertaining what is the point of law which it is intended to submit for our decision. I do not read over again the statement of facts which Lord M'Laren has already read, but I observe upon it that it is clear that the Sheriff held it to be proved that the respondent had done the very thing which is described by the words of the statute as constituting an offence to be punished. He used an otter-trawl for taking sea fish within the prohibited area. But the learned Sheriff follows his recital of what was proved by saying that it was not proved that the respondent knew or must of necessity have known of the position of the said vessel on the occasion specified, and then he asks as matter of law whether, on finding the facts stated to be proved, the Sheriff-substitute was justified in finding the charge not proven. Now, if on the evidence adduced before him the learned Sheriff had said that he had found as matter of fact that the charge was not proved, this Court could not have reviewed his judgment. But I think he makes it quite clear that the judgment he pronounced was not a mere verdict on matter of fact—because he considered this question to be a question of law—and that he proceeded upon a rule of law which he supposed to be binding on him, and in respect of that rule of law he held that the offence was not proved. The question is, what is disclosed in the case as the rule of law which the learned Sheriff accepted? In the statement of the facts there are no considerations tending to establish any defence except the finding that the respondent was not in a position of authority for the purpose of directing navigation or the management of the fishing operations of the ship, and that it was proved that he did not in fact direct or assist in directing the said navigation or management of fishing operations. It is not, I think, suggested, and I do not think the learned Sheriff intended to decide, that the mere fact of the respondent being a deck hand, and not a master mariner, exempted him from the operation of the clause, and that could hardly have been maintained, because, as Lord M'Laren has pointed out, the statute or bye-law which has statutory effect provides that every person, without any exception whatever, who is found doing a certain act shall be guilty of an offence. But when you take these findings in combination with what the Sheriff said was not proved, viz., that the man knew or must of necessity have known the position of the vessel, I think the question of law which is meant to be raised becomes clear enough. The direction which I think the learned Sheriff must have given to himself is that as matter of law it is not enough for the prosecutor to prove the acts which constitute the offence unless he goes on in the absence of evidence for the alleged offender to prove by affirmative evidence that the accused knew in fact that he was doing the thing prohibited, that is, that he knew in fact that he was within the protected area.

The appellant's counsel maintained that this was wrong upon two distinct grounds. In the first place, it was maintained by the learned Solicitor-General that, inasmuch as the enactment prohibits a certain thing being done without using the word "knowingly" or any equivalent word, it is not necessary that knowledge should be proved, because the offence is committed when the act is done, however ignorant the alleged offender may be of the act which constitutes the offence, or however innocent of any unlawful intention; and that is based upon what is said to be a general rule that, in the construction of statutes and statutory offences, if the word "knowingly" is not used, evidence of ignorance affords no defence. I do not think it necessary for the purpose of this decision to express any definite opinion upon that question, and therefore I shall only say that, as at present advised, I cannot myself assent to it. It was supported by no authority from our own books. The English cases upon which the learned Solicitor-General relied, with the exception of one, namely, The King v. Marsh,¹ to which I shall afterwards refer, appear to me altogether inapplicable, because they were constructions of particular statutes passed for a different purpose, and expressed in very different terms from that which we are considering.

But I do not think it necessary to say more as to the existence in our law of any general absolute rule of the kind stated by the Solicitor-General, because I think the second point taken by the appellant is

¹ 1824, 2 Barn. and Crea. 717.

Jan. 17, 1908. well founded. The prosecutor having proved a thing was done which the statute in express terms prohibited, and done by the accused on a particular occasion, the respondent chose to leave the case just where the prosecutor had left it, and it is now maintained on his behalf that he was rightly acquitted, because the prosecutor failed to prove that he knew in fact what the position of the vessel was at the time. I assume for the purpose of considering that question that it may be a good defence that the accused was ignorant of the position of the ship—excusably ignorant of the position of the ship. But it does not follow that the prosecutor can be required to do more than prove the existence of the facts which the statute describes as constituting the offence. The prosecutor has done all that could be required of him when he has proved the facts, and it lies upon the respondent to rebut the inference of guilt which arises upon these facts, if he can, by a proof of innocent ignorance, or of any other lawful excuse. The contention on the other side really puts it on the prosecutor to prove a negative, because the position of the case when the prosecutor has closed his proof is really this, that the facts constituting the offence, as defined in the statute, having been proved or admitted, the accused can still maintain his plea of not guilty on the ground that what he did—which, after all, was malum prohibitum and not malum in se—was done with lawful excuse. I am assuming for the purpose of the argument that innocent ignorance is a lawful excuse. But then it lies on him to prove that, not upon the prosecutor to disprove it by anticipation, which I apprehend in most cases it would be impossible for him to do. On the case as stated, it appears that the question whether, in fact, the accused had a lawful excuse, was not decided by the Sheriff, and it cannot be decided by us, because no such question is stated in the case. The Sheriff finds certain facts which may possibly be regarded as items of evidence tending to shew that the respondent was not really aware of the position of the ship. But although they tend in that direction they do not go very far, because it may well be that a sailor, knowing his ground, may have perfectly good reasons for knowing that he is still within the Moray Firth, although he is not directing the navigation of the vessel and is not capable of taking observations for the purpose of defining its position. He may know where he sailed from. He may know how long a time has elapsed since he left the land, or he may even be in sight of land. The question whether or not he knew where his ship was must always be a question of fact, and the circumstances may vary so indefinitely that it is quite impossible to lay down, as I think the learned Sheriff did, that the particular circumstances of this case are of themselves sufficient to prove or disprove that question. It may be again that although a man may not have known exactly where his ship was, he may have had good reason to believe that its master had set out upon an expedition for trawling within the prohibited area, and if so, a man who takes his chance of being found within the imaginary line that divides the prohibited area from the open area of the ocean, might be precluded from maintaining innocent ignorance. But then I think that all that relates to a question of fact which is not before us, although I have referred to the difficulty of proving the facts. I do not desire to express any real opinion as upon fact at all. I think the learned Sheriff has not done so. What he has done Jan. 17, 1908. is to say as matter of law, that the prosecutor has failed to prove what it is ^{Gordon v.} incumbent upon him to prove, viz., the absence of a particular defence ^{Shaw.} which might have been brought forward by a man who was acting in inno- ^{Lord Kinnear.} cent ignorance of the facts. I think that is an unsound view of the law. I think the prosecutor has done all that was required of him when he has proved his facts, and that it then lies upon the offender, if he has a defence, to bring it forward.

I referred in passing to the case of The King v. Marsh.¹ I return to it only for the purpose of saying that while I think the decisions of the English Criminal Courts must always be used in this Court with very considerable diffidence, I have read the whole series of decisions cited to us by the Solicitor-General as carefully as I can, and I think it satisfactory to find that the decision proposed by your Lordship, in which I agree, is entirely in accordance with the law stated by the learned Judges in the case of The King v. Marsh.¹ That is a case in which there was an information and conviction against a carrier for having game in his possession contrary to the Statute 5 Anne, cap. 14, sec. 2, which declares "that any carrier having game in his possession is guilty of an offence, unless it be sent by a qualified person." The only facts proved were that the defender was a carrier, and that he had game in his wagon on the road. The conviction was appealed on the ground that there was no evidence that the defender knew of the presence of the game in his wagon, or that the person who sent it was not a qualified person. The learned Judges held that there was a sufficient prima facie case, and that it was not rebutted by sufficient proof on the part of the defendant of the ignorance suggested on his behalf. I think the judgments quite plainly imply that if the defendant could have satisfied the jury of his ignorance there would have been a good defence, although the word "knowingly" was not in the statute, and it followed that in the view of the learned Judges the effect of the word "knowingly" being introduced into such an Act of Parliament might be to alter the burden of proof, but not to alter any ordinary rule of law that enables a man to plead ignorance as a lawful excuse. It had been shewn that game was in his possession as a carrier; it lay upon him to rebut that evidence; and, as he had not done so, the conviction was sustained. I think the present respondent stands exactly in the same position, not having endeavoured to rebut the inference from the facts.

Lord M'Laren intimated that LORD PEARSON, who was present at the hearing but absent at the advising, concurred in the judgment of the Court.

The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL, not having been present at the hearing, gave no opinion.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

CROWN AGENT—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

¹ 1824, 2 Barn. & Cres. 717.

No. 7.

Jan. 17, 1908.

Graham v.
Hart.

MARY GRAHAM, Appellant.—Crabb Watt, K.C.—R. S. Brown.
JAMES NEIL HART (Procurator-Fiscal for Lanarkshire), Respondent.
—Sol.-Gen. Ure—A. M. Anderson, A.-D.

Statutory Offence—Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 34), sec. 1—Police Force—Police-Constable—Agent and Principal—Bribery—Police-Constable agent of the Chief Constable.—Section 1 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, makes it an offence to offer any consideration corruptly to an agent as an inducement to do, or to forbear from doing, any act in relation to his principal's affairs, and the expression "agent" is defined as including any person employed by or acting for another, and "principal" as including an employer.

In a complaint under the above Act, charging an attempt to bribe a police-constable in Glasgow while in the execution of his duty and acting for his employer the Chief Constable, held that the police-constable was an agent in the sense of the Act.

HIGH COURT.
(Full Bench.)
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinnear.
LdStormonth-Darling.
Lord Low.
Lord Pearson.
Lord Ardwall.

ON 19th April 1907 Mary Graham, 207 Main Street, Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint, at the instance of James Neil Hart, Procurator-fiscal. The complaint set forth:—"That on 10th April 1907, in Main Street, Maryhill, Glasgow, while Albert Carson, police-constable in the Maryhill district of the Glasgow Police, was, in the execution of his duty, acting for his employer, J. V. Stevenson, Chief Constable, Glasgow, to prevent or to detect the commission of, and to obtain evidence in regard to, offences against the Street Betting Act, 1906, and, in particular, was engaged watching the actings of John Graham, 207 Main Street aforesaid, who was suspected of committing offences against said Act, Mary Graham, 207 Main Street aforesaid, mother of the said John Graham, did corruptly give £2, 5s. of money to the said Albert Carson as an inducement or reward or bribe to neglect his duty, and to forbear from watching the said John Graham as aforesaid, and to ignore or suppress any evidence which he might obtain or have obtained against him, and to refrain from reporting the same to his employer, contrary to the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, section 1,* whereby the said Mary Graham is liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding four months,

* The Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., cap. 34), sec. 1, enacts:—"(1) . . . If any person corruptly gives or agrees to give or offers any gift or consideration to any agent as an inducement or reward for doing or forbearing to do, or for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do, any act in relation to his principal's affairs or business, or for showing or forbearing to show favour or disfavour to any person in relation to his principal's affairs or business . . . he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding two years, or to a fine not exceeding five hundred pounds, or to both such imprisonment and such fine, or on summary conviction to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding four months, or to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, or to both such imprisonment and such fine. (2) For the purposes of this Act the expression 'consideration' includes valuable consideration of any kind; the expression 'agent' includes any person employed by or acting for another; and the expression 'principal' includes an employer. (3) A person serving under the Crown or under any corporation, or any municipal, borough, county, or district council, or any board of guardians, is an agent within the meaning of this Act."

or to a fine not exceeding £50, or to both such imprisonment and such fine." Jan. 17, 1908.

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, in respect that it did not set forth facts and circumstances from which an offence within the meaning of the statute libelled could be inferred; and that, in particular, the relation of principal and agent did not subsist between the Chief Constable of Glasgow and the police-constable referred to. Graham v.
Hart.

The objection was repelled, and thereafter, on 22d May 1907, the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe), after hearing evidence, convicted the accused of the contravention charged.

The accused obtained a case, which stated :—" At the hearing of the case the facts which were admitted or proved were :—(1) That the authority vested with the appointment of a Chief Constable for the city of Glasgow is a committee of Magistrates of the city, together with the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, and the cost of maintaining the police force, including the Chief Constable's salary, is defrayed partly out of money raised from police rates and partly by Government grant. (2) That this body met on 2d April 1902 to appoint a Chief Constable in room of Mr John Boyd resigned. (3) That at that meeting, Mr James Verdier Stevenson was, as the minute of meeting bears, appointed Chief Constable, ' the said James Verdier Stevenson to hold office during the pleasure of the Magistrates' Committee and the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, subject to the provisions of the Glasgow Police Acts, 1866 to 1901, and the Police (Scotland) Act, 1890. (4) That the Chief Constable receives payment of his salary from the Police Treasurer of the Glasgow Corporation. (5) That the Chief Constable has power which he exercises without consultation with anyone to appoint constables to hold office during his pleasure, and has power also to dismiss constables without consulting anyone. (6) That the wages of constables are entered in a pay-sheet which is certified by the Chief Constable. (7) That the actual disbursement for said wages is then made by the said Police Treasurer. (8) That Albert Carson is a Glasgow constable appointed by the Chief Constable who preceded Mr Stevenson, and he is paid in the manner described. (9) That when a constable has been appointed by the Chief Constable he, before entering upon duty, makes and signs before a Magistrate a declaration that he ' will faithfully and without fear or favour discharge the office of police-constable of the city of Glasgow, and will obey all lawful orders by the Lord Provost and Magistrates and the officers placed over me, and will attend to all rules and regulations of the force.' (10) That Constable Albert Carson had duly made and subscribed this declaration on 9th September 1901. (11) That the Chief Constable is assisted in the discharge of his duties by various subordinate officers, including district superintendents, inspectors, and constables. (12) That it is not the practice for the Chief Constable to give direct instructions to the constables (who number over 1500), but instructions as to their duty are conveyed to the men through the district superintendents or inspectors. (13) That on 10th April 1907 Constable Carson was attached to the Maryhill police district of the city. (14) That on that particular day he did not receive any specific instruction from anyone as to the duty he was on that day to discharge. (15) That shortly before that day, however, he had received instructions through the district inspector to watch for possible betting offences in the district, and, in particular, to observe the movements of a family named Graham, who reside in the district, and who were suspected by the police of conducting illegal betting transactions. (16) That one of the members of this family is named John Graham. (17) That shortly before 10th April Constable Carson had made a report to the Maryhill district inspector in regard to this John Graham. (18) That on said 10th April Constable Carson and another constable were on plain clothes duty in Bridge Street, Maryhill, when they met and had some slight conversation with John Graham. (19) That later in the evening as they passed over a railway bridge, the appellant, Mrs Mary Graham (who is the mother of John Graham) was standing on the bridge. (20) That she waved the constables to come over to her, and on their doing so she said 'Are you fireproof?' (21) That she then put two sovereigns and five shillings of silver into Carson's hand, remarking, 'that is one for each of you and something to get a drink to save you from breaking it. John would have given it to you but he was frightened.' (22) That she then walked away. (23) That Constable Carson regarded this as an attempt to bribe him to refrain from observing the movements of John Graham or reporting upon them. (24) That Constable Carson took the money to the police-office and reported the incident.

Jan. 17, 1908.

Graham v.
Hart.

"I held in law in respect the Chief Constable is entrusted with the duty of detecting crime and exercises his office through the district constables, that Constable Carson, being on 10th April engaged on police duty, was 'acting for' the Chief Constable, and therefore, in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, was an agent.

"In respect of the evidence adduced I convicted the appellant of the contravention charged and imposed a penalty of £10, and in default of payment thereof within fourteen days from said date, I adjudged her to be imprisoned for the period of ten days from the date of her imprisonment."

The first question of law for the opinion of the Court was—" (1) Was Constable Albert Carson, on 10th April 1907, an agent in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906?"

The case was argued before the High Court of Justiciary on 8th July 1907, when a remit was made to a Full Bench.

Argued for the appellant;—The Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, was not intended to apply to this type of case, but only to acts of corruption which were not punishable at common law. Bribery of an officer of the law was an indictable offence at common law,¹ and under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, 1889,² which was the proper statute under which to have proceeded. The police-constable was not the agent of the Chief Constable, for though he was under his orders he was neither "employed by" him nor did he "act for" him in the sense of section 1 (2) of the statute. The police-constable was not the servant of the Chief Constable in the ordinary sense of the word,³ nor had his acts any relation to the "affairs or business" of the Chief Constable—the preservation of order being the affair of the community and not of individuals. Subsection (3) of the first section of the Act referred to the private business of the Crown and of corporations, and to their mercantile dealings only. Jan. 17, 1908.

¹ Hume on Crimes, i., p. 408; H. M. Advocate v. Dick, April 26, 1901, 3 F. (J.) 59, at p. 64, 3 Adam, 344.

² 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 69, secs. 1 (2) and 7.

³ Cf. Bain v. Burnet, Feb. 11, 1857, 19 D. 405; Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, May 16, 1891, 18 R. 825; Girdwood v. Standing Joint Committee of the County of Midlothian, Oct. 25, 1894, 22 R. 11; Brown v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1907, S. C. 256.

Graham v.
Hart.

Argued for the respondent;—In considering whether the Act applied, it was beside the point to say that this offence was also indictable at common law and under another Act. There was nothing in the Prevention of Corruption Act to indicate that its scope was limited to mercantile agency. On the contrary, section 1 (3) expressly extended it to just such a case as the present. It was not necessary to shew that the constable was the servant of the Chief Constable in the limited sense of the word, but if it were, there were indications of judicial opinion in several cases that such was the true nature of the relationship between them.¹ It was, however, sufficient to point to the powers of appointment and dismissal possessed by the Chief Constable, and to the duty of the police-constable to obey orders, as evidence that the latter was acting for and employed by the former in the sense of the Act. The preservation of order might in one sense be the affair of the community, but in another sense it was the business, and the chief business, of the Chief Constable.²

At advising on January 17, 1908,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—(The opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling, who was present at the hearing but absent at the advising, was read by the Lord Justice-General)—The facts of this case, as stated by the Sheriff-substitute, are that Albert Carson, a police-constable in Glasgow, was, on 10th April 1907, engaged in the execution of his duty in Main Street, Maryhill, and, in particular, was watching the actings of a certain John Graham, who was suspected of committing offences under the Street Betting Act, 1906, when John Graham's mother accosted Carson, and put two sovereigns and five shillings into his hand, making at the same a remark which referred to her son John, and which led the constable to conclude that the act was an attempt to bribe him to refrain from observing the movements of John Graham, or reporting upon them. The constable accordingly took the money to the police-office and reported the incident.

A complaint was then brought against Mary Graham in which the constable was described as "acting for his employer, J. V. Stevenson, Chief Constable, Glasgow," and the accused was charged with a contravention of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, section 1. An objection to the relevancy was taken on her behalf, to the effect that "the relation of principal and agent does not subsist between the Chief Constable of Glasgow and the police-constable referred to." The Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection, and, after an adjournment of the diet to 22d May, the trial proceeded. The result was that the learned Sheriff convicted the accused of the contravention charged, and imposed a penalty of £10. The Sheriff

¹ Cf. Melvin v. Wilson, May 22, 1847, 9 D. 1129, at pp. 1136-7 (decided under the Glasgow Police Act, 1843, 6 and 7 Vict. cap. xcix.); Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 18 R. 825, at p. 829, per Lord Adam; Brown v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1907, S. C. 256, at p. 266.

² The following sections of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), were referred to as defining the powers and duties of the Chief Constable—Sections 71, 72, 74, 77, 78, 83, 87, 88.

Jan. 17, 1908. narrates the facts, and tells us that he held in law "in respect the Chief Constable is entrusted with the duty of detecting crime, and exercises his office through the district constables, that Constable Carson being, on 10th April, engaged on police duty, was acting for the Chief Constable, and, therefore, in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, was an agent." The only question of law which the Sheriff propounds for our opinion (the second question being merely on the facts), is this—"Was Constable Albert Carson, on 10th April 1907, an agent in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906?"

Graham v.
Hart.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

I have no hesitation in answering that question in the affirmative, which is only another way of saying that I think the learned Sheriff was right in his finding in law.

It seems to me very little to the purpose to point to the native vigour of the common law of Scotland, and say that an offence such as that of which the Sheriff has convicted Mary Graham would have been cognisable at common law. So it would (see Hume, Vol. I., 408). But if a statute, which is entitled "an Act for the better prevention of corruption" covers the case, why should it not be brought into use? Equally little to the purpose is it to say that this Act was mainly intended to prevent commercial corruption by striking at secret commissions in private life. If this Act was intended to be so limited, it would have been expressly restricted to such cases, instead of which subsection (3) of section 1 conclusively shews that the Act was intended to strike at persons serving under the Crown or under any corporation or local board. This it does by sweeping in all such persons under the generic name of agent, just as "agent" is defined in the immediately preceding paragraph as "any person employed by or acting for another," and "principal" is defined as including an "employer." At all points, therefore, these definitions seem to me to meet the case in hand. Mr Stevenson, the Chief Constable, was rightly described in the complaint as Carson's employer, for the holder of the office of Chief Constable appointed him under section 74 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, and had, under section 77 of the same Act, the absolute power of suspending or dismissing him. Similarly Carson answers the description of a person "employed by or acting for" Mr Stevenson, because the work which he was doing at the time when the offence was committed was work which by section 83 of the same Act was made part of the "duty of the Chief Constable, and of the superintendents, lieutenants, and constables acting under or appointed by him." When we are in the region of definition, I should like to say that the reference in section 1 of the statute, when it deals with a bribe given or offered to an agent as being "in relation to his principal's affairs or business," does not seem to me to create any difficulty, for this bribe was offered to the constable as an inducement or reward for forbearing to do an act in relation to the Chief Constable's affairs or business, i.e., forbearing to do a duty which was equally the Chief Constable's and his own.

I may add that if the Act of 1906 covers the case I think it quite idle to argue that another Act—the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act, 1889—might also be made to cover the case. Perhaps it might. But why should the fact of there being two or more statutes applicable to the offence disable the public prosecutor from making his election under which of them he is to bring a prosecution, any more than the existence of a rule of the common law to which he might resort if he chose? I may also add that I am quite at a loss to see what bearing decisions in the civil Court as to the liability of Hart. ^{Graham v.} public officials for the wrongous acts of constables can have on the construction of a statute dealing with a criminal offence.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I concur in that opinion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The contention of the appellant in this case as stated at the Bar is based upon the view that the words of the statute “affairs or business” must relate to “mercantile affairs,” and cannot be applied to employment for state or municipal duties, in which no question of business in the ordinary sense is involved. I am quite unable to accept any such view of the statute for the Prevention of Corruption which was passed in 1906. That view is completely excluded by the 3d subsection of section 1, by which it is provided that “a person serving under the Crown or under any corporation, or any municipal, borough, county, or district council, or any board of guardians, is an agent within the meaning of this Act.”

A police-constable is therefore plainly in the position of a person to whom the Act may apply. Therefore the sole question here is, whether the complaint correctly describes the agency. Is the police-constable correctly described as being the agent of the Chief Constable, under whom he was serving at the time? Now, the position of the Chief Constable is this, that he has delegated to him the power and duty of selecting and appointing all constables; that he has power to suspend or dismiss all ordinary constables, such as the constable whom it was attempted to bribe in this case; that the magistrates cannot interfere with him as regards engagement, or suspension, or dismissal; and that he being entrusted with the police duties falling on the municipal authority, and having engaged constables to carry out his duties of keeping order and dealing with crime, is in the active exercise of these powers through them. The constable in doing his duties on his beat is doing so because he is employed to do so by the Chief Constable, and is responsible to him to do these duties faithfully, and to resist all attempts to seduce him into doing things contrary to his duty. I cannot doubt that the Sheriff-substitute was entitled to hold on the facts which he found proved that in law the constable was “acting for the Chief Constable, and therefore in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, was an agent.”

I agree entirely with the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling, and do not think it necessary to say more.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in Lord Stormonth-Darling's opinion.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the opinions which have been delivered.

LORD LOW.—I am in the same position.

LORD ARDWALL.—I also agree with Lord Stormonth-Darling's opinion.

It was intimated that LORD PEARSON, who was present at the hearing,

Jan. 17, 1908. but absent at the advising, concurred in the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling.
 Graham v. Hart.

THE COURT answered the first question in the case in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

E. ROLLAND M'NAB, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 8. WALTER ROSS TAYLOR MIDDLETON (Clerk to the Conon District Fishery Board), Complainer (Appellant).—D.-F. Campbell—Chree.
 Mar. 10, 1908. MRS MARGARET ANDERSON TOUGH, Respondent.—Hunter, K.C.—Munro.
 Middleton v. Tough.

Statutory Offence—Fishing—Salmon Fishing—Weekly Close Time—Reasonable Excuse—Sunday Labour—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), section 24, Schedule D, Bye-law 3.—Under the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 24, Schedule D, Bye-law 3, the occupier of a fishery is bound to remove and take entirely out of the water the leader of every bag-net during the weekly close time, i.e., from six o'clock on Saturday night to six o'clock on Monday morning.

In a prosecution for a contravention of this bye-law it was proved that the leaders of the bag-nets had not been removed by the occupier of the fishery on a Saturday night, and could not have been then removed owing to a storm; that they could have been removed without danger on Sunday, but that no attempt was made to do so, and that they were not removed till Monday morning. The accused pleaded that the removal of the nets on the Sunday was an impossibility, inasmuch as it would have involved a breach of the Sunday Labour Statutes, 1579, c. 70, 1661, c. 18, and 1690, c. 5, which she was not bound to commit or procure others to commit.

Held that the accused was not justified in failing to comply with the bye-law, the operation thereby prescribed being a work of necessity and not struck at by the Sunday Labour Statutes, and in any event enjoined by an Act of Parliament of later date.

Middleton v. Paterson, 6 F. (J.) 27, overruled.

Osborne v. Anderson, Nov. 4, 1887, 15 R. (J.) 12, disapproved.

Master and Servant—Sunday Labour—Statute—Acts 1579, c. 70, 1661, c. 18, and 1690, c. 5.—Observations on the application of the Scots Acts anent Sunday labour.

Question whether these Acts are in desuetude.

Phillips v. Innes, Feb. 20, 1837, 2 Shaw & Maclean, 465, explained.

HIGH COURT. (Full Bench.) Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Lord Kinnear. Lord Stormonth-Darling. Lord Low. Lord Ardwall.

MRS MARGARET ANDERSON TOUGH, residing in Portmahomack, occupier of the Geanies Salmon Fishery, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Ross and Cromarty, at Tain, on a summary complaint at the instance of Walter Ross Taylor Middleton, clerk to the Conon District Fishery Board.

The complaint set forth that she, "occupier of the Geanies Salmon Fishery in the parish of Tarbat and said county of Ross and Cromarty, being a fishery at which bag-nets are used, has contravened the 'Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868,' section 24, and the bye-law, Schedule D, section 3, annexed to the said Act,* in so far as between

* The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 24, enacts:—"The proprietor, or when let the occupier, of every fishery at which . . . bag-nets are used shall, in regard to such nets, do all acts required by any bye-law in force within the district in which

6 o'clock P.M. on Saturday the third day of August 1907, and 6 Mar. 10, 1908. o'clock A.M. on Monday the fifth day of August 1907, and within or during the weekly close time for the district of the River Conon, ^{Middleton v. Tough.} under the Salmon Fishery Statutes, the said Mrs Margaret Anderson Tough did omit or fail entirely to remove and take out of the water the netting of the leaders of five bag-nets belonging to her on said fishery, all placed in the sea ex adverso of the lands of Geanies."

The case was tried on 23d October 1907, when the respondent pleaded not guilty.

After hearing evidence the Sheriff-substitute (MacWatt) assoilzied the respondent from the complaint.

In a case for appeal he stated the facts, and the grounds of his judgment, in the following terms:—"At the trial the evidence led established the following facts:—

"That the respondent is the occupier of the salmon-fishings specified; that she failed to remove and take out of the water the netting of the leaders of said five bag-nets belonging to her on the Saturday night in question; that owing to a strong wind and rough sea it was dangerous for the respondent or her men to remove the leaders on the Saturday night; that the leaders could have been removed without danger on Sunday, and that one of said leaders was in fact removed about eight o'clock that morning by bailiffs in the employment of the Fishery Board; that no attempt was made on the part of the respondent or her men to remove the leaders referred to on the Sunday in question, but they were removed as soon as possible on Monday morning.

"It was proved that the appellant wrote to the respondent on 22d March 1906, intimating that the Board held her bound to remove leaders on Sunday, when it was impossible to do so on the Saturday night. There was no evidence that the respondent's men were ever asked by her, or that they refused, to remove leaders on Sunday, or that it was impossible for the respondent to hire men willing to remove leaders on a Sunday.

"On these facts the Sheriff-substitute held that there was no contravention of the statute by the failure to remove the leaders on the Saturday night; and in respect of the decision in Middleton v. Paterson (6 F. (J.) 27), he refused to convict on account of the failure to remove on the Sunday."

The question of law stated was:—"Whether—the weather having been suitable—the respondent was bound, on the Sunday in question, to entirely remove and take out of the water the netting of the leaders of the five bag-nets specified?"

The case was sent to a Full Bench on 5th December 1907, and was argued on 10th March 1908.

Argued for the appellant;—The Salmon Fisheries Acts were unambiguous and imperative,¹ and must be obeyed to the letter such fishery is situated for the due observance of the weekly close time," under a penalty, and Schedule D contains a bye-law with regard to the observance of the weekly close time which requires—"3. That the netting of the leader of each and every bag-net shall be entirely removed and taken out of the water."

¹ Irving v. Phyn, Dec. 14, 1891, 19 R. (J.) 7, 3 White, 46, distinguishing Osborne v. Anderson, Nov. 3, 1887, 15 R. (J.) 12, 1 White, 497; Parr v. Mitchell, Feb. 24, 1890, 2 White, 434.

Mar. 10, 1908. unless a reasonable cause were shewn to the contrary.¹ In the present case no reasonable cause had been alleged. It could not be said that it was impossible to perform the work, for it was expressly stated that no attempt had been made to find men to do the work on the Sunday. The only reason which had been suggested was that it was illegal to do such work on Sunday. The case of Middleton v. Paterson,² founded on in this connection by the respondent, was wrongly decided. It proceeded on an erroneous view as to the scope of the Scots statutes against Sunday labour.³ These Acts—if they were not in desuetude—only prohibited such work as could be performed as well on weekdays as on Sunday,⁴ and had no application to works of necessity, such as the present, where the necessity arose from the fact that the work had been expressly enjoined by the Salmon-Fisheries Act. If the order to remove the nets on the Sunday had been given by the respondent to the men in her employment, it would have been a reasonable order, such as they would have been bound to obey.⁵

Argued for the respondent;—The present case was indistinguishable from Middleton v. Paterson.² If here no evidence had been led by the respondent to shew that no men could be procured to do the work on Sunday, that was only because it was matter of common knowledge that in this district Sunday labour was against the feelings of the people, and that no one would consent to do such work. The case of *Middleton*⁶ was rightly decided in law. It was a sufficient excuse for a breach of the Salmon Fisheries Acts that it was an impossibility to obey them. In this case the impossibility lay in the fact that Sunday labour was illegal. The Sunday Labour Statutes³ were not in desuetude, as appeared from the recent cases in which they had been recognised,⁶ and also from the fact that they were not included among the statutes abrogated by the Statute Law Revision (Scotland) Act, 1906.⁷ In these circumstances, as it would have been illegal to do the work, it would also have been illegal to procure the doing of the work, and it was not to be presumed that the Salmon Fisheries Acts intended to make it an offence to refrain from committing an illegal act.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The question brought before your Lordships is whether there ought to have been a conviction on the following facts, as stated by the learned Sheriff-substitute who states the case.

In the county of Ross and Cromarty, at the Geanies Salmon Fishery, there is in operation by force of law the bye-law contained in Schedule D of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act of 1868. The section of that

¹ Macrorie v. Forman, Nov. 17, 1905, 8 F. (J.) 23, 4 Adam, 682.

² 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

³ 1579, c. 70; 1661, c. 18; 1690, c. 5.

⁴ Phillips v. Innes, Feb. 20, 1837, 2 Shaw & Maclean, 465; Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 180, 1 Coup. 495; Nicol v. M'Neill, July 13, 1887, 14 R. (J.) 47, 1 White, 416.

⁵ Wilson v. Simson, July 11, 1844, 6 D. 1256.

⁶ Phillips v. Innes, Feb. 20, 1837, 2 Shaw & Maclean, 465; Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 180, 1 Coup. 495; Irving v. Phyn, Dec. 14, 1891, 19 R. (J.) 7, 3 White, 46; Middleton v. Paterson, Jan. 30, 1904, 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321; H. M. Advocate v. Gollan, July 23, 1883, 5 Coup. 317.

⁷ 6 Edw. VII. cap. 38.

statute which imposes the penalty is the 24th, and it puts upon the proprietor or occupier of every fishery the obligation of doing all acts for the due observance of the weekly close time, required by any bye-law in force within the district. The bye-law imposed by Schedule D provides that regard to the due observance of the weekly close time, which is a close time imposed from six o'clock on Saturday afternoon till six o'clock on Monday morning, "the netting of the leader of each and every bag-net shall be entirely removed and taken out of the water." Your Lordships will therefore observe that a positive duty is put upon the owner or the occupier of every fishing. The occupier, who is the respondent in this case, is a Mrs Tough, and she admittedly upon the occasion specified did not take out the leaders of her bag-nets during the whole of the specified period, but left them there from six o'clock on Saturday evening till a very early period on Monday morning. Prima facie, therefore, it is quite clear that she has contravened the statute, and consequently is liable to conviction. What, then, is her excuse? She says, and the learned Sheriff-substitute holds that it is proved, that at six o'clock on Saturday evening the state of the weather was such that it was a physical impossibility to remove the leaders. Then he goes on to say that the leaders could have been removed without danger on Sunday. As a matter of fact one of them was removed by the Fishery Board people on that day, and he further finds that there was no evidence that the respondent's men were ever asked by her to remove the leaders on the Sunday, or that they refused to do so, or that it was impossible for the respondent to hire men willing to remove leaders on the Sunday.

Upon that state of the facts I think that there must be a conviction here, because the onus upon the prosecutor is satisfied as soon as he shews that there was a contravention of the bye-law. That he does by shewing that the leaders were not removed. No doubt there may be an answer to that which has always been held as an answer satisfactory to avoid conviction, namely, that there was impossibility. Physical impossibility there undoubtedly was at six o'clock on Saturday evening by reason of the weather, but it was not, according to the stated facts, impossible on the Sunday morning. Therefore, there must have been some other class of impossibility which the respondent was bound to table, and she has not proved either that she took the slightest trouble to try and get her men to remove the leaders, or failing them that she could not get others. Practically speaking, that is enough for the decision of the case.

But Mr Hunter has appealed to us not to decide the case upon that matter alone, because I understand that this case has been brought up in order to review the decision in Middleton v. Paterson.¹ I have no hesitation in saying that I agree with the opinion of Lord Moncreiff in Middleton v. Paterson,¹ and that I do not think that case was rightly decided. There are various grounds for my opinion. The argument for inability is admittedly entirely based upon the Scottish statutes against Sunday labour. These are certain old statutes of the Scottish Parliament. I am bound to say that for myself I am greatly in doubt whether these statutes are still in operation, or whether they have not fallen into desuetude. But I do not

¹ 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

Mar 10, 1908. think it is necessary to decide that question, as I shall presently explain.

Middleton v. Tough. Prima facie I do not think that these statutes have anything to do with it, because the question is not as to whether a conviction could be secured under these statutes for doing a certain thing, but whether this person was prevented from doing what she should otherwise have done by vis major. Lord Justice-General. I use that expression because it comprehends laws of every kind, physical or otherwise. It may be that you could find persons who would be content to work on the Sunday and take their risk of a conviction under the statutes, and looking at the general state of affairs as matters go nowadays, I do not think the risk would be a very great one. But it was argued that this was so clearly against the statutes that really it becomes tantamount to an impossibility, because if you engage anybody to do that thing, you would be engaging him to do a thing which was in itself unlawful. I cannot follow that, because, assuming as I do for the moment, that the statutes are still in observance and not in desuetude, I cannot say that the act here would ever be struck at by the statutes. What may be called the leading case for the statutes is that of Phillips v. Innes,¹ where it was held that looking to the prohibitions of the statutes a barber's apprentice in Dundee, who had been engaged to do his master's work, holidays excepted, was justified in refusing to shave customers as an ordinary business on Sunday before ten o'clock in the morning. The one point was that shaving customers before ten o'clock on Sundays was ordinary work, and that if he had been obliged to do it, he would have had to shave Sunday after Sunday just as on other days. In point of fact, he might have had to shave more than on ordinary days, because there are men of peculiar habits who prefer shaving on Sundays rather than on other days. But the learned Lords who decided that case seem to have been very careful to distinguish between ordinary and regular labour and labour of a casual sort, which might be called for in an emergency, because the Lord Ordinary and one of the noble and learned Lords, Lord Wynford, put as an exception the particular case of a man being called upon to shave someone suffering from acute illness, and the shaving of whose head became more or less a work of necessity. I am of opinion that this particular operation of taking up the leaders on a Sunday, when it has been rendered impossible on Saturday by the state of the weather, is just such a work of necessity, and there again I agree with the opinion of Lord Moncreiff in Middleton v. Paterson.² Mr Hunter read a passage in Lord Brougham's opinion in Phillips'¹ case, in which the noble and learned Lord used some expressions which seem to mean that the necessity must be that of the person called upon to work, and not that of the person whom he serves. That view, I think, is absolutely untenable. It is perfectly evident that you cannot so limit it, for it is possible, not only to have works of necessity where the necessity is for the weal of the public in general, but also to identify the interests of the master and servant. If it were not so the feeding of cattle, e.g., would not be lawful, because there is no necessity, so far as the servant is concerned, it being the master's loss and not his if the cattle die.

But the matter does not end there, because I think there is another ground which takes this case out of the decision in the case of Phillips,¹ Mar. 10, 1908. and it is this. These old statutes may not be in desuetude, but they certainly are not, to say the least of it, rigorously enforced. Then, in 1868 Middleton v. Tough. Parliament passed another Act, which shews upon the face of it that something must be done by somebody on Sunday, because Parliament must be Lord Justice-General. held to have had the common sense to know that occasionally there would be states of the weather which would make it impossible to remove the leaders on Saturday. Still, Parliament has held that the leaders must be taken out of the water during the weekly close time. That is equivalent to a positive enactment, not necessarily repealing the old statutes, but holding that such a work is a work of necessity. Upon that ground I come to the opinion clearly that there was here no justifiable excuse for not complying with the Act of Parliament. Of course, whether a person could get a servant or not to do the work is another matter. The duty is put upon the occupier or owners, and if they cannot do it themselves they must get someone who will. You might find certain persons who would not work for you on Mondays, but you may contract with those who will. Or, take one religion, and you will find a person who refuses to work on a Saturday. But that is your affair. All that it is necessary to say here is that such an excuse is not vis major. Whether you can get a servant to do the work or not is simply a matter of contract. That is sufficient, I think, but I ought also to say that *Osborne's case*² was overruled by the case of Irving,³ and on the whole matter I come to the conclusion that in this case there ought to have been a conviction.

¹ 2 Shaw & Maclean, 465.

² 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur with your Lordship. The statute providing for the weekly close time is imperative, and lays upon the occupiers of salmon fisheries a positive duty to throw their nets out of gear by removing the leaders. I do not consider that the existence of those old Scots Acts dealing with Sunday labour provides any excuse for not obeying the directions contained in an Imperial Act of recent date.

It is of course quite true that there may be cases where a servant, by refusing to carry out the instructions of his employer, may put his employer unavoidably in the position of contravention of a statutory enactment, but that is a question of fact, and there is no suggestion in the case before us that that was what happened here. This case differs from that of Middleton v. Paterson,⁴ because here it is expressly said that the respondent's servants were never asked to remove the leaders on the Sunday in question, while there it did appear that there had been an attempt made to get the work done, and that there was a refusal to do it.

With regard to the case of Middleton v. Paterson,⁴ where the judgment seems to be in conflict with what we are deciding here, I should like to say that I was very doubtful about that case at the time, but, in my position at the hearing, I had no vote in the decision, except in the case of disagreement between my brethren, which in fact was what occurred. In that case there was this peculiarity, that there was an official of the Fishery Board present, and that he did not require that the leaders should be

¹ 2 Shaw & Maclean, 465.

³ 19 R. (J.) 7, 3 White, 46.

² 15 R. (J.) 12, 1 White, 497.

⁴ 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

Mar. 10, 1908. removed. In these circumstances I felt constrained to concur with Lord Trayner in a conclusion which meant acquittal, rather than with the conclusion of Lord Moncreiff, which meant conviction.

Middleton v.
Tough.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

I may add that it seems to me that, in the case of Osborne v. Anderson,¹ the majority of the Court proceeded on a fallacy. It appeared that owing to the tide at the particular time and place the nets could not be put out of fishing order until several hours after the appointed time on the Saturday, and that similarly they could not be put again in fishing order on the Monday until some hours after the lawful time, and that the nets were out of fishing order for the full period of thirty-six hours, although not precisely between the times prescribed in the statute. Now, I agree with Lord Rutherford Clark, who dissented there, that this was not an admissible construction of the Act, which plainly intends that all nets should be out of action during the fixed time—Saturday night at a fixed hour and Monday morning at a fixed hour. The object aimed at is to give the fish a free run for the specified period past all nets, and that object would obviously be defeated if the result was that fish which passed nets, the leaders of which had been lifted, were in risk of being caught in those which had been left down.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur with your Lordship in the chair. So far as the question is affected by authority I think the explanation given by the Lord Justice-Clerk of the case of *Middleton v. Paterson*² is very important, because I understand that in that case, and according to the constitution of this Court, his Lordship only gave a casting vote, and it is well known that in such circumstances considerations are taken into account which would not affect a vote given under ordinary conditions. In any case, this question has been remitted to a full bench of Judges, and it is for us to decide the matter now.

Even supposing the earlier statutes relating to Sunday trading and Sunday labour to be in observance to certain effects, it is the fact that a later statute has been passed by the Imperial Parliament imposing the duty of putting the salmon nets out of fishing order during the whole period from Saturday evening until Monday morning. This consideration in my judgment is sufficient for the decision of the case. As, however, the whole law of the subject has been discussed, I think it desirable that we should also consider how far the old statutory law opposes obstacles to the performance of what most people would regard as necessary and suitable Sunday labour. There may be a difficulty in consequence of the case of *Phillips*³ in holding that the statutes are altogether in desuetude. But in the case of *Bute v. More*⁴ no precedent could be found for a conviction under these Acts, and neither the ingenuity of counsel nor the experience of the Judges composing the Court was able to discover any form of process under which a person might be penalised for the contravention of those statutes. Therefore, it is not saying too much when I conclude that these statutes are not likely to be again enforced. Indeed, without doing any violence to authorised

¹ 15 R. (J.) 12, 1 White, 497.

³ 2 Shaw & Maclean, 465.

² 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

⁴ 9 Macph. 180, 1 Coup. 495.

expositions of the law, it may very well be held that the statutes have gone Mar. 10, 1908. out of use altogether. But, without entering further into that question, we know that it was the practice of the Scottish Legislature to pass statutes Middleton v. Tough. which were expressed in very general terms, which were not always work- Lord M'Laren. able without the aid of judicial construction, and which were intended to be worked out by the Courts of law applying common-sense principles to their interpretation. Both before and after the passing of these Scottish statutes it is needless to say that there were certain descriptions of labour which had to be regularly performed on Sundays. Domestic service and a considerable portion of the work of farm service had to be carried on upon the first day of the week. Horses had to be fed, cows had to be milked, cattle had to be driven out to the pasturage in the morning and brought home at night. The statutes never were understood to prohibit anything except such work as was ordinarily carried on during weekdays and could be as well done on any other day as on the Sunday. The tailor or boot-maker was not to work at his trade nor to require his men to work for him on Sundays. The case of fishing for salmon with all its statutory obligations, and the work of putting nets out of gear, must be held to be ejusdem generis with these kinds of work which have to be carried on upon Sundays, and as the Act of Parliament makes it necessary that the leaders should be removed either at six o'clock on the Saturday evening or as soon thereafter as the state of the weather permits, that is a sufficient reason why the lessee of such fisheries should be held bound to engage men who are willing to do this trifling amount of Sunday work when occasion requires. I have no conception that there would be any difficulty in finding men willing, when necessary, to perform these services on Sunday, just as servants can be found to undertake other services which are usually performed on Sundays as well as weekdays. I agree with your Lordship in the chair that we should answer the question by holding that the person accused was liable to be convicted.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree entirely with the Lord Justice-General, and I only add, since this case has been brought for the purpose of reviewing the decision in Middleton v. Paterson,¹ that I agree with the opinion of Lord Moncreiff in that case, and that my only difficulty in doing so has been removed by what the Lord Justice-Clerk has said.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair, and particularly in your Lordship's agreement with the dissent of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Middleton v. Paterson.¹ He there points out that "Sunday constitutes two-thirds of the weekly close time, and the regulations contain no sanction for non-observance of them on that day, on any ground whatever."

LORD LOW.—I concur.

LORD ARDWALL.—On the application of the statute and the general law of the case, I entirely agree with your Lordship in the chair and with Lord

¹ 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

Mar. 10, 1908. Moncreiff's opinion in the case which has been cited. I should be very sorry if anything that we are deciding should seem in any way to derogate from the proper observance of Sunday. And I recommend the following view of the matter to these worthy people in Ross-shire who, greatly as I think to their credit, are desirous of avoiding unnecessary labour on the first day of the week. In the first place, I would point out that by leaving the nets set for fishing all Sunday, the people who fail to remove the leaders are truly guilty of engaging in the industry of fishing the whole of the Sabbath day. In the next place, it may well be considered a work of necessity or mercy to lift the leaders of the nets on the Sabbath day. The phrase "work of necessity or mercy," though embodied in a statute, is taken from the Confession of Faith and the Shorter Catechism, and these excellent documents profess to be founded on, and binding only so far as founded on, Scripture. Now, in Scripture I find direct authority to the effect that if a sheep fall into a pit on the Sabbath day, it is lawful to lay hold on it and lift it out (see Matt. xii. 11). I hold that it is an analogous act to take up the leaders of salmon nets on the Sabbath day, and let out the unfortunate salmon which have been entrapped by an illegal net, and mercifully to restore them to their native freedom.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the affirmative, sustained the appeal, and found that the Sheriff-substitute ought to have convicted the respondent.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—ALEXANDER ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 9.

PATRICK FALCONER, Complainer.—Morton.

ROBERT ALGERNON WHYTE, Respondent.—*Cooper, K.C.—
C. D. Murray.*

Mar. 20, 1908.

Falconer v.
Whyte.

Public Health—Sale of Food—Prosecutions by officers of Local Government Board and Board of Agriculture as private purchasers—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), secs. 6, 12, 14, 20—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 and 63 Vict. cap. 51), secs. 2 (1) (2), 3 (2) (3), 23, 24.—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, confers on the Local Government Board and the Board of Agriculture, and the corresponding boards in Scotland and Ireland, powers, in default of action by the Local Authority, to institute proceedings at the instance of their officers against persons infringing the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and prescribes procedure to be followed in such prosecutions.

Held that the exercise of these powers was optional and not obligatory; that the officers of these boards were entitled to institute proceedings as private individuals in the method prescribed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875; and that they were not limited in prosecutions at their instance to the procedure prescribed by the Act of 1899.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

ON 21st November 1907 Patrick Falconer, provision merchant, 70 Main Street, Gorbals, Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of "Robert Algernon Whyte, of Glenmaye, Manchester Road, West Timperley, Altrincham, Cheshire," setting forth "that the complainer caused the analysis to be made, of which the certificate is herewith annexed, and from which it appears that the following offence has been committed against the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899:—

"That Patrick Falconer, provision merchant, 70 Main Street, Gorbals, Glasgow, did, on the 24th day of August 1907, in his shop at 70 Main Street, Gorbals, Glasgow, sell to the complainer to his prejudice half a pound of Irish butter which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the complainer, in respect that the complainer demanded Irish butter, and that the article sold to him as aforesaid did not consist of genuine Irish butter, in respect that it contained foreign fat to the extent of 74·30 per cent or thereby, contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, particularly the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6, and that said offence is a first offence, whereby the said Patrick Falconer is liable to pay a penalty not exceeding £20." *

Mar. 20, 1908.
Falconer v.
Whyte.

* The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), enacts :—

Sec. 6. "No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty"

Sec. 12. "Any purchaser of an article of food or of a drug in any place being a district, county, city, or borough, where there is any analyst appointed under this or any Act hereby repealed, shall be entitled, on payment to such analyst of a sum not exceeding ten shillings and sixpence, or if there be no such analyst then acting for such place, to the analyst of another place, of such sum as may be agreed upon between such person and the analyst, to have such article analysed by such analyst, and to receive from him a certificate of the result of his analysis."

Sec. 14 (as amended by the Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 and 63 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 13):—"The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall divide the article into three parts to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall if required to do so, deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent. He shall afterwards retain one of said parts for future comparison, and submit the third part, if he deems it right to have the article analysed, to the analyst."

Sec. 20. "When the analyst having analysed any article shall have given his certificate of the result, from which it may appear that an offence against some one of the provisions of this Act has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty herein imposed for such offence . . . in a summary manner."

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 and 63 Vict. c. 51), enacts :—

Sec. 2 (1). "The Local Government Board may, in relation to any matter appearing to that Board to affect the general interest of the consumer, and the Board of Agriculture may, in relation to any matter appearing to that Board to affect the general interests of agriculture in the United Kingdom, direct an officer of the Board to procure for analysis samples of any article of food, and thereupon the officer shall have all the powers of procuring samples conferred by the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and those Acts shall apply as if the officer were an officer authorised to procure samples under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, except that (a) the officer procuring the sample shall divide the same into four parts, and shall deal with three of such parts in the manner directed by section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as amended by this Act, and shall send the fourth part to the Board. . . ."

Sec. 2 (2). "The Board shall communicate the result of the analysis of any such sample to the local authority, and thereupon there shall be the like

Mar. 20, 1908. Falconer was convicted by the Sheriff-substitute (A. O. M. Mackenzie) and adjudged to pay a penalty of £10.
 —
Falconer v.
Whyte.

He brought a bill of suspension in which he stated, inter alia:—
 (Stat. 2) “ . . . The respondent is Chief Inspector for Great Britain employed by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, and part of his duties as such inspector is to look after the sale of Irish produce in Great Britain, and to see that it is sold as such. Some months before the date of the prosecution he was instructed by the Irish Department of Agriculture to go to Glasgow and make investigations about the sale of Irish produce there, and as the result of these investigations he received further instructions to again visit Glasgow and make purchases with the object of prosecuting the sellers. Those instructions were given by the said Board in the interest of the consumer and of agriculture in the United Kingdom. On 24th August last, in fulfilment of these instructions, he made four purchases of Irish butter, including the purchase from the complainer. When making said purchases, and, in particular, the purchase from the complainer, upon which the prosecution was instituted, the respondent stated he was making such purchase on behalf of the Irish Board of Agriculture for analysis.”
 (Stat. 5) “After purchasing said butter from the complainer the respondent divided it into three parts—one of which he kept for himself, another of which he gave to the complainer, and the third part he sent to be analysed by Mr F. W. Harris, one of the city analysts for Glasgow. When the respondent received the analyst’s certificate he handed it to Lord Ikerrin, the British Commissioner upon the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland. The said certificate was considered by Lord Ikerrin and by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland.”
 (Stat. 6) “ . . . No communication was sent to the Local Authority in Glasgow with regard to the purchase of said butter by the respondent or by the said Department of Agriculture and Tech-duty and power on the part of the local authority to cause proceedings to be taken as if the local authority had caused the analysis to be made.”

Sec. 3 (2). “If the Local Government Board or Board of Agriculture, after communication with a local authority, are of opinion that the local authority have failed to execute or enforce any of the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts in relation to any article of food, and that their failure affects the general interest of the consumer or the general interest of agriculture in the United Kingdom, as the case may be, the Board concerned may by order empower an officer of the Board to execute and enforce those provisions, or to procure the execution and enforcement thereof in relation to any article of food mentioned in the order.”

Sec. 3 (3). “The expenses incurred by the Board or their officer under any such order shall be treated as expenses incurred by the local authority in the execution of the said Acts, and shall be paid by the local authority to the Board on demand, and in default the Board may recover the amount of the expenses with costs from the local authority.”

Sec. 23. “This Act shall apply to Scotland with the substitution for ‘The Local Government Board’ of ‘The Local Government Board for Scotland.’ . . .”

Sec. 24. “This Act shall apply to Ireland with the substitution for ‘The Board of Agriculture’ of ‘The Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland,’ and for ‘The Local Government Board’ of ‘The Local Government Board for Ireland,’ and for ‘The London and Edinburgh Gazettes’ of ‘The Dublin Gazette.’” nical Instruction for Ireland, or with regard to the analysis of it by Mr Harris, and no request was made by the respondent or by or on behalf of the said Board to the said Local Authority that they should enforce the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts." (Stat. 8)

Mar. 20, 1908.
Falconer v.
Whyte.

"The respondent when procuring the sample did not divide the same into four parts, and did not deal with the same in the manner provided by the provision (a) of subsection (1) of section 2 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, in respect that no fourth part was transmitted by him to the Board under whose instructions he was acting." (Stat. 9) "In convicting the complainer the Sheriff-substitute stated that he held it proved that the respondent had been instructed to prosecute, and did prosecute, by direction of the Board of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, but that nevertheless he was in the same position as any other private person who made a purchase on his own behalf and for his own purposes in a Glasgow shop and submitted the same for analysis."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The conviction and sentence complained of having been obtained upon a complaint brought by the respondent on behalf and by direction of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, and said complaint having been brought without an analysis of the butter complained of, and a request to prosecute having first been communicated to the Local Authority at Glasgow, said conviction and sentence are invalid, and ought to be suspended. (2) The conviction and sentence complained of having been obtained upon a complaint brought by the respondent on behalf and by direction of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, and the butter referred to in said complaint having been divided into three instead of into four parts contrary to the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts relative to a prosecution on behalf of said Department, said conviction and sentence are invalid, and ought to be suspended, with expenses.

Argued for the complainer;—The respondent had in fact made his purchase and instituted his proceedings not qua private individual, but qua officer of the Board of Agriculture. As such he was bound to proceed under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899,¹ the provisions of which were obligatory upon him. He could not proceed under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875,² as he might have done had he been a private individual. Admittedly he had not complied with the provisions of the Act of 1899,¹ and accordingly the conviction was bad.

Argued for the respondent;—He had proceeded under, and admittedly complied with, the Act of 1875,² which was available to everybody, whether member of the ordinary public or inspector. The conviction, accordingly, was good. The Act of 1899¹ was merely an enabling statute, intended to confer additional powers on the Boards and their officers, but not to deprive them of those they already had under the Act of 1875.² Its use was optional.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It has been frankly admitted by Mr Morton that if the Act of 1875 had stood by itself then he could not have made any objection to this complaint on any ground which he has now stated.

¹ 62 and 63 Vict. cap. 51, secs. 2, 3.

² 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63, secs. 12, 14.

Mar. 20, 1908. Under that Act a person purchasing any article, no matter who he is, is entitled to state, after he gets the article, that he intends to use that article for analysis in order to test whether it is genuine or not. And if he does that—if he announces that he is to take that specific course—he must divide the sample that he takes into three parts, one of which he hands to the seller, another of which he keeps to himself, and the third of which he must submit to a public analyst. If he gets a certificate from the public analyst, which is to be evidence under the Act, he is entitled to prosecute the person who sold him the article if he finds cause. A difficulty thereafter arose as to whether or not a public official going to buy an article of that kind could prosecute, in respect that he was not bona fide purchasing the article for his own consumption, but specially and solely for the purposes of analysis. That difficulty was put right by special enactment which prohibited the sellers from refusing to sell a specimen of any of the goods they had falling under the Act to a person coming officially and asking for it.

Falconer v.
Whyte.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Now, therefore, we are in this position—Mr Whyte, who comes from Ireland in the interests of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction of Ireland, purchased a sample of butter, taking the course prescribed by the Act of 1875 and dividing it into three parts and distributing them as he was required to do by that Act. He proceeded to get an analysis from the public analyst, which justified a prosecution. He instituted his prosecution, and he was successful in obtaining a conviction. In that I can see nothing that was in the least degree irregular. Mr Morton says that since the Act of 1899, Mr Whyte, being an inspector of the Department in Ireland, could no longer proceed under the Act of 1875, and he founds upon section 3 of the Act of 1899, which gives the Board of Agriculture in Ireland certain powers which it had not before, inter alia, that where the Board is not satisfied that the Act has been carried out efficiently by the Local Authority, the Board can, after certain procedure, empower one of its own officers to execute and enforce the provisions of the Act, and, if necessary, prosecute at the Local Authority's expense.

Now, there can be no doubt that, if the Board avails itself of the special powers conferred by the Act, it must also carry out its other provisions including the division of the sample taken into four parts, a proceeding which seems to be solely for its own information, or possibly to keep a sample for the Local Authority on which the expense of the proceedings is to be put. If, however, the Board does not think it feasible or necessary to avail itself of these special powers, but instead chooses itself to use the machinery provided by the Act of 1875, as it has done in the present case at its own expense, I can see nothing in the Act of 1899 to forbid it to do so. What it could have done before, it can do still. It has, it is true, certain additional advantages under the Act of 1899, but it may consider that in certain circumstances it is better not to make use of these advantages but to proceed in the ordinary way. I have no difficulty in holding that this suspension must be refused.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. It is conceded, and is clear, that if it was competent for the respondent in this suspension (the complainer in the Sheriff Court) to proceed under the Act of 1875 the Mar. 20, 1908. whole proceedings were regular and cannot be objected to. But it was ^{Falconer v.} argued that the respondent, being the Chief Inspector for Great Britain of Whyte. the Board of Agriculture for Ireland, and having acted under the instruc- ^{Lord Low.} tions of that Board, proceedings could only be taken in terms of the provisions of the 2d and 3d sections of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1899. I confess that I was at first impressed by that argument upon reading the parts of these sections which alone are set forth in the case, because, if that were all that these sections contained, it would look very like a code regulating the procedure which must be followed if the Board in Ireland chose to raise questions in Scotland through one of their inspectors. But I think that, when the whole sections are read, it becomes plain what the object of these enactments was. It was to enable the Board in Ireland to carry through proceedings in Scotland at the expense of the Local Authority within whose jurisdiction the offence had been committed, and that explains why there are all these careful provisions. That being so, if the Board in Ireland choose to bear their own expenses, I see no reason why their inspector should not proceed, as an ordinary purchaser, under the Act of 1875. And, therefore, I have no doubt that the Sheriff was right here.

LORD ARDWALL.—When I learned at a very early stage in this debate that the complainer in the suspension had no objections to the instance of the original complaint, I at once came to the conclusion that this suspension must fail, because the first and second pleas in law are founded upon this—that certain procedure prescribed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, where proceedings are initiated by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, had not been followed,—that is all. Now, that Act was passed for the purpose of giving additional powers to central authorities, and did not, in the least, detract from remedies provided by the Act of 1875, and Mr Morton's argument resolved itself into this amazing series of propositions—he argued that the respondent, instead of proceeding as if the complaint were at his own instance, which it is, ought to have proceeded under the powers and privileges given to the Department of Agriculture in Ireland under the Act of 1899; and in the next place, that if he had done so he would have required to have done certain things which he has not done, and, therefore, the whole of the proceedings complained of must be quashed. Now, it is very considerate of an accused person in a case of this sort to suggest the procedure the prosecutor ought to have followed, but a complainer can adopt what procedure he likes provided he keeps within the terms of the statutes, and the procedure in this case was properly conducted under the Act of 1875. The respondent was under no obligation whatever to take advantage of the Act of 1899. I am accordingly of opinion that this bill of suspension should be refused.

THE COURT refused the bill of suspension.

NORMAN M. MACPHERSON, S.S.C.—ERSKINE DODS & RHIND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 10.

ALEXANDER FORBES AND OTHERS, Complainers.—Macphail.
 JOHN MAIN (Procurator-Fiscal for the County of Linlithgow), Respondent.—A. M. Anderson, A.-D.

Mar. 20, 1908.

Forbes v.
Main.

Procedure—Proof—Witness—Citation of witnesses for precognition on oath—Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. cap. 60).—The Procurator-fiscal of a county presented a petition to the Sheriff setting forth that at a Masonic bazaar held in October 1907 a lottery had been carried on in contravention of the Lotteries Act, 1823, and that the Chief Constable had endeavoured to get evidence against persons engaged in the lottery from persons able to give information, but that they had refused to give it, and praying for a warrant to cite all available witnesses for precognition on oath if necessary.

The Sheriff granted the warrant craved, and certain persons were cited.

The Court suspended the warrant and citations.

Observed that it was conceivable that in very serious cases such a warrant and citation might be justifiable.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Lord Low.

Lord Ardwall.

JOHN MAIN, Procurator-fiscal of Court for the county of Linlithgow, presented a petition to the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles in the following terms:—

“That the petitioner has received information that raffling or disposing of goods by lottery was extensively carried on at a Masonic bazaar in the Victoria Hall, Linlithgow, on 3d, 4th, and 5th October 1907, in contravention of the Lotteries Act, 1823, and notwithstanding of ample warning having been given to the promoters of the said bazaar that this proceeding was illegal, and also in the full knowledge, as advertised by the promoters of said bazaar, that raffling had been stopped, which was baffling their efforts to raise the money they required.

“That the Chief Constable has endeavoured to obtain evidence against individuals who were prominently engaged in the said raffling or disposing of goods by lottery from persons who are well known to be able to give such information, but that several of such persons refuse to give any information to the police.

“That the present application is therefore necessary, to have a precognition of all available witnesses who can give evidence against the principal offenders.

“May it therefore please your Lordship to grant warrant to officers of Court to cite all available witnesses for precognition on oath if necessary regarding their knowledge of the premises; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordship shall seem proper.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) granted warrant as craved.

Thereafter Alexander Forbes, road surveyor, Royal Terrace, Linlithgow, was cited by a police-constable “to compear within the Sheriff Court House, Linlithgow, upon the sixth day of December 1907 years, at ten o’clock forenoon, to be examined in precognition on oath if considered necessary, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court for the public interest, anent contraventions of the Lotteries Act, 1823, at the Masonic Bazaar, Linlithgow, on 3d, 4th, and 5th October 1907, with certification.”

Similar citations were served upon Robert Jamieson junior, Charles F. Cran, and John Hebson.

Forbes, Jamieson, Cran, and Hebson all brought bills of suspension.

Forbes stated, inter alia;—3. “The said application does not set forth that any person has been arrested, or is suspected of any offence or contravention of any statute, or that any charge of any kind has been made against any person whatsoever. It further does not state what provisions, if any, of the said Lotteries Act have been contravened. 4. It is believed and averred that the sole object of the respondent is illegally and unwarrantably to endeavour to coerce the complainer into making statements on oath, in the hope that he may thereby obtain information to enable him to take proceedings against some person or persons unknown, and the complainer is under the necessity of applying to your Lordships for redress."

Mar. 20, 1908.
Forbes v.
Main.

Forbes pleaded;—The proceedings complained of being illegal and incompetent, the complainer is entitled to suspension and sist thereof, as craved; et separatim, the proceedings complained of are oppressive.

The same averments and plea were stated for the other complainers.

Counsel for the complainers maintained that a warrant to cite witnesses for the purpose merely of precognition was, in the circumstances disclosed, unheard of and illegal.¹

Counsel for the respondent appeared and stated that he did not oppose the suspension.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt whatever that these warrants ought to be quashed. I can conceive that in very serious cases what was done here might be resorted to, and might be useful, but it is quite inapplicable to such a case as that with which we are dealing. This is certainly a proceeding which has not been taken before in our time in ordinary cases, and I think it might tend to a very evil practice on the part of those investigating crime to sanction it in such a case as this.

LORD LOW and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

THE COURT suspended the warrant and citations.

CORNILLON, CRAIG, & THOMAS, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

JOHN TURNBULL, Complainer.—Crabb Watt, K.C.—Trotter.

No. 11.

HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—

Lyon Mackenzie.

Mar. 20, 1908.

Review—Appeal—Appeal from Sheriff to Court of Quarter Sessions—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), secs. 2 (5), 21.— Turnbull v. H. M. Advocate.
The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), enacts:—
Sec. 2 (5). "If any person feels aggrieved by any conviction made by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, he may appeal therefrom to a Court of Quarter Sessions." Sec. 21. "In the application of this Act to Scotland the following modifications shall be made:— . . . The expression 'Court of Summary Jurisdiction' means the Sheriff Court, and all jurisdiction necessary for the purpose of this Act is hereby conferred on Sheriffs."

Held that in a prosecution in Scotland under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, the above enactments did not make it competent to appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff to a Court of Quarter Sessions.

JOHN TURNBULL, tweed merchant, 110 Houston Street, Glasgow, who carried on business in Hawick under the name of Armstrong & Company, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk, at Hawick, with a contravention of the Merchandise

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

¹ Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, vol. 314, p. 390.

Mar. 20, 1908. Marks Act, 1887,¹ on a complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 to 1881.

Turnbull v.
H. M. Advocate.

He was convicted and sentenced by the Sheriff (Chisholm) to one month's imprisonment.

He presented a bill of suspension and liberation, in which he stated a number of objections to the regularity of the conviction which are immaterial to this report.

At the hearing his counsel stated that the complainer was about to appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions under the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887,* and craved the Court to pronounce an order of interim liberation pending such appeal.

Argued for the complainer;—The appeal was clearly competent under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887,¹ secs. 2 (5) and 21. Pending its result the Court were bound to grant interim liberation.² Even if the competency of the appeal were doubtful, that question must first be decided by the tribunal to which the appeal was taken, viz., the Court of Quarter Sessions.³ The fact that an appeal to the High Court was permitted by the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875,³ could not deprive the complainer of the special appeal conferred by the Merchandise Marks Act. It was further immaterial that the appeal had not actually been taken, as the Act prescribed no time limit.

Argued for the respondent;—Interim liberation could only be granted where an appeal had been already taken. The proposed appeal, however, was incompetent. In Scotland an appeal from the Sheriff Court to a Court of Quarter Sessions would be absurd. Statutory provisions as to procedure contained in Acts applicable both to England and Scotland had to be construed in the light of the practice of each country.⁴ So construed section 2 (5) of the Act obviously only applied to England. The complainer's proper remedy was under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875,³ section 3 of which provided for an appeal to the High Court by stated case, and section 3, subsection 6, for interim liberation pending such appeal.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complainer here asks for interim liberation pending an appeal to a Court of Quarter Sessions of a case which was tried before the Sheriff. Such an appeal would be an absolute novelty in procedure, and, I think, an absolute innovation on procedure. In a case in which jurisdiction is committed to the Sheriff it is absurd to say that he should have his decision reviewed by a Court of Quarter Sessions, and not by this Court, which usually has the power of review. This Act of Parliament was originally framed as an English Act, in which the original proceedings were before the Justices, and gives an appeal to Quarter Sessions, which is the usual Court of Appeal in that country. But the Legislature in applying the Act to Scotland saw fit to exclude the jurisdiction of the Justices and to give the jurisdiction to the Sheriff. I think the sound view is, that if the Justices are not to try the case in the first instance, the Court of

¹ 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28.

* Quoted in rubric.

² Pirrie v. List, June 8, 1867, 5 Irvine, 433.

³ 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62.

⁴ Dunbar v. Johnston, Dec. 22, 1904, 7 R. (J.) 40, 4 Adam, 505.

Quarter Sessions cannot be the Court of review. It must be borne in mind Mar. 20, 1908. that a proceeding before a Court of Quarter Sessions is not a process of review, but a new trial from the beginning, the proceedings before the Justices in Petty Sessions being nullified by the appeal. It is inconceivable if the Legislature had intended to bring about this extraordinary result of a new trial by Justices of a case dealt with by the Sheriff that they should do it by a side wind, and should have left open two alternative modes of review—(first) an appeal to a Court of Quarter Sessions, and (second) an appeal by way of stated case to the High Court of Justiciary under section 3 of the Summary Appeals Act, 1875. If the complainer here had brought an appeal by way of stated case instead of a suspension, he would have been in a more favourable position, for he would then have been heard on the merits. I hold that the suggestion of an appeal to a Court of Quarter Sessions is quite out of the question. I adopt what Lord Kinnear says in the following passage from his judgment in the case of *Dunbar v. Johnston*¹—“There are Summary Jurisdiction Acts in England and also in Scotland. Trial in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts means trial in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts in force in either country according as the trial takes place in the one or the other.” (His Lordship then adverted to points not now reported.) I am of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

LORD LOW and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill.

J. D. TURNBULL, S.S.C.—W. F. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

PETER MAGUIRE, Complainer.—Morton.

No. 12.

H. M. ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—A. M. Anderson, A.-D.

May 12, 1908.

Procedure—Indictment—Relevancy—Specification—Fair Notice—Reset—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 19 and 58.—An indictment for reset set forth that “during the period between 1st July 1907 and 3d March 1908,” at a place libelled, “on different occasions during said period, the particular occasions being to the prosecutor unknown,” the accused “did reset in all 25 lbs. of brass and copper electric and gas fittings, and 25 lbs. of solder, the same having been dishonestly appropriated by theft.” Annexed there were (1) a list of productions, including certain specified brass and copper electric and gas fittings, and 2 lbs. 10 ounces of solder; and (2) a list of witnesses.

Maguire v.
H. M. Advocate.

Held that, in view of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, secs. 19 and 58, the indictment was relevant; and that read along with the lists of productions and witnesses it gave the accused sufficient notice of the charge he had to meet.

H. M. Advocate v. M'Donald, 1888, 1 White, 593, 15 R. (J. C.) 47, commented on.

PETER MAGUIRE, general dealer, 1 St John Street, Edinburgh, was indicted at the instance of His Majesty's Advocate, the charge being “that during the period between 1st July 1907 and 3d March 1908, in the premises at 27 Jeffrey Street, Edinburgh, occupied by” the accused “on different occasions during said period, the particular occa-

High Court.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

¹ 7 R. (J.) 40, 4 Adam, 505.

May 12, 1908.

Maguire v.
H. M. Advocate.

sions being to the prosecutor unknown," the accused "did reset in all 25 lbs. of brass and copper electric and gas fittings, and 25 lbs. of solder, the same having been dishonestly appropriated by theft."

Annexed to the indictment there was a list of productions containing, inter alia, the following items:—

- "Label 1. A brass electric lamp suspending eye.
- „ 2. Thirty electric shade carrying rings.
- „ 3. Seventeen pieces of brass and copper fittings.
- „ 4. A brass and copper electric lamp gallery, 2 brass and 1 copper leaves.
- „ 5. Eighteen old brass couplings.
- „ 6. 2 lbs. and 10 ounces of solder."

There was also a list of witnesses, containing the names and designations of six persons.*

At the first diet it was objected for the panel that the indictment was irrelevant in respect it did not give the accused fair notice of the charge he had to meet.

The Court (Sheriff-substitute Orphoot) repelled the objection, and the panel pleaded not guilty.

At the second diet the panel was tried before the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles (Maconochie) and a jury. He was found guilty as libelled, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

Maguire thereupon brought a bill of suspension and liberation.

The complainer averred:—(Stat. 7) "From the evidence led against him (the complainer) it was manifest that the prosecutor had all along intended to prove that on particular occasions, viz., in the month of August 1907 and in the months of November or December 1907, as well as on other occasions, the complainer had purchased certain brass and copper electric and gas fittings and solder from John Fraser . . . and James Thomson . . . both of whom immediately before the sales to the complainer had stolen said fittings and solder from the premises of their employers, David Purves & Company, plumbers . . . In addition to being examined as to occasions, the dates of which they did not specify, the said John Fraser and James Thomson were examined by the prosecutor as to particular occasions on which they had stolen metal from the premises of David Purves & Company and sold it to the complainer, viz., an occasion in the month of August 1907 and an occasion in November or December 1907. Witnesses in the employment of David Purves & Company were examined by the prosecutor as to thefts from said premises by the said John Fraser and James Thomson

* The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), enacts:—Sec. 19. "It shall not be necessary to set forth in an indictment . . . productions . . . but it shall be sufficient that they be entered in the list of productions to be used at the trial. . . ."

Sec. 58. " . . . Under any indictment charging the resetting of property dishonestly appropriated . . . it shall not be necessary to set forth any details of the crime by which the dishonest appropriation was accomplished, but it shall be sufficient to set forth that the person accused received such property, it having been dishonestly appropriated by theft, or robbery, or by breach of trust and embezzlement, or by falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, as the case may be."

Schedule A. "Examples of Indictments . . . You did reset a watch and chain, pocket-book, and fifteen pounds, eleven shillings of money, the same having been dishonestly appropriated by theft or robbery."

of the very articles which the complainer was alleged to have resetted. May 12, 1908.
There was no reason why the indictment should not have contained information of the particular charges which the complainer would be required to meet." Maguire v.
H. M. Advocate.

The complainer pleaded ;—The indictment on which the complainer was convicted being irrelevant in respect that it did not give him fair notice of the charge he had to meet, the sentence complained of should be suspended, and liberation granted, with expenses as craved.

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 12th May 1908.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this suspension cannot be sustained. The crime of reset is peculiar, and it is often difficult to draw an indictment which shall be specific and detailed. For instance, in the case of workmen employed in a granary stealing grain and selling it to dealers, it is impossible to specify the particular parcels of grain taken, and the exact time at which they were taken. Now here we have a case in which the prosecutor says: "You at certain times between July 1907 and March 1908, (I being unable to state the particular times), did reset 25 lbs. of brass and copper electric and gas fittings and 25 lbs. of solder." That would be sufficient specification in charging thieves, and I cannot see why it should not be sufficient in the case of a resetter. There is no doubt that the indictment is in accordance with the forms prescribed by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. But it has been suggested that it does not give sufficient notice to the prisoner, and that where the prosecutor has not the means of stating the particular articles resetted he should make a statement in the old form that the particular articles are to him unknown. But I do not think that that is necessary. With regard to the case of *M'Donald*² I am bound to say that having carefully considered the judgment of Lord Trayner, I do not understand his reasoning. Under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, such words as "the particular occasion being to the prosecutor unknown," are unnecessary. Where it is alleged that an act has been done on a number of occasions, without the particular occasions being specified, it is implied that the particular occasions are unknown. The Solicitor-General has pointed out that under the Act of 1887 it is no longer necessary to name the articles to be produced in the indictment. It is enough if they are named in the list of productions. On the whole matter I think there are no grounds for the suspension, and that it must be refused.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. I understand that the objection is, not so much that there is a want of specification in the indictment as to the time when the alleged crime was committed, as that there is not sufficient notice to the accused of where the articles which he is charged with resetting came from, and what these articles actually were.

¹ Authorities referred to :—

For the Complainer: H. M. Advocate v. M'Donald, 1888, 1 White, 593, 15 R. (J. C.) 47; Macdonald's Criminal Law, p. 359; Gold v. Neilson, 1908, S. C. (J.) 5.

For the Respondent: Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 19 and 58.

² 15 R. (J. C.) 47.

May 12, 1908.

Maguire v.
H. M. Advocate.

Lord Low.

It appears that at the trial it was found that the accused had bought certain brass and copper fittings, and some solder, from two men who had stolen these things from their employer; and the objection substantially is that these facts ought to have been set out in the indictment. It is plain that so far as form goes that was not necessary in view of section 58 of the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887, which provides that "it shall not be necessary to set forth any details of the crime by which the dishonest appropriation was accomplished, but it shall be sufficient to set forth that the person accused received such property, it having been dishonestly appropriated by theft" and so on.

There may, however, I imagine, be cases in which, although the indictment cannot be said, so far as form goes, to fall short of what is required by the statute, it may not, in the peculiar circumstances of the particular case, give the accused fair and reasonable notice of the case to be met by him. That consideration has occasioned me some difficulty in view of the opinion of Lord Trayner in the case of M'Donald,¹ but I have come to the conclusion that, taking the indictment, list of productions, and list of witnesses together, the accused had reasonable notice of the case to be made against him, and accordingly I agree with your Lordship that there are no sufficient grounds for suspending the conviction.

LORD ARDWALL. — I agree. The indictment here is in the form prescribed by statute. But it is said that it does not give the accused sufficient notice of the precise charge which he has to meet, but when one looks at the list of witnesses and productions coupled with the indictment, it cannot be said that these together fail to give such due notice as the accused is entitled to, and such as is sufficient to enable him to prepare for his defence.

THE COURT refused the bill.

NORMAN M. MACPHERSON, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

No. 13.

May 12, 1908.

Martin v.
Boyd.

DANIEL MARTIN, Complainer.—Lippe.
LEONARD CECIL BOYD (Burgh Prosecutor, Ayr), Respondent.—
Hon. W. Watson.

Statutory Offences—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), secs. 7 and 20—"Crime"—"Theft which may be punished with penal servitude."—The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, by sec. 20, defines the expression "crime" as meaning in Scotland, inter alia, "any theft which in respect of any aggravation or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen may be punished with penal servitude," and by sec. 7 makes certain enactments to apply where a person has been convicted on indictment of a crime and a previous conviction of a crime has been proved against him.

Held that where a person had been convicted in the Sheriff Court on indictment of theft, aggravated by five previous convictions of theft and attempt to steal obtained in the Sheriff and Police Courts (followed by sentences varying from fourteen days' to six months' imprisonment), he had been convicted of a "crime," and had had "a previous conviction of a crime" proved against him, within the meaning of the Prevention of

¹ 15 R. (J. C.) 47.

Crimes Act, 1871, although he had never been convicted in any Court May 12, 1908. which could competently impose a sentence of penal servitude.

Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that any person who is charged with theft may be tried before the High Court, and on conviction may be sentenced to penal servitude. Martin v. Boyd.

Procedure—Proof—Proof of previous conviction—Proof of previous conviction of theft aggravated by previous conviction—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), secs. 7 and 20—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 67.—Held in a prosecution under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, that in view of sec. 67 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, the production of an extract of a previous conviction on indictment in the Sheriff Court of theft aggravated by five previous convictions, three of theft and two of attempt to steal, scheduled thereto, was, in the absence of any objection by the prisoner to such previous convictions, sufficient evidence both of a conviction on indictment of a “crime,” and of previous conviction of a “crime,” within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871.

Review—Suspension—Improper statement by prosecutor.—In a suspension the complainer, inter alia, alleged that in his address to the magistrate the prosecutor (the procurator-fiscal) had made an allegation which was not proved in the evidence. In his answers the procurator-fiscal stated that the magistrate had intimated that he would not allow himself to be influenced by the allegation complained of. The Court refused the suspension.

DANIEL MARTIN was charged in the Police Court of the burgh of Ayr upon a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal and Burgh Prosecutor for said burgh, which set forth that the accused “who was, on 18th May 1903, convicted on indictment before the Sheriff and Jury Court at Kilmarnock of the crime of theft, aggravated by a previous conviction of theft, which is a crime *within the meaning of section 20 of the Act after mentioned, and punishable with penal servitude, and against whom there was then proved a previous conviction obtained against him on 9th December 1901, on indictment before the Sheriff Court at Glasgow of the crime of theft, aggravated by previous convictions of theft, which is a crime punishable with penal servitude within the meaning of said Act, and against whom there was passed on the date first above mentioned a sentence of six months’ imprisonment, was, on the 18th day of April 1908, being a date within seven years immediately after the expiration of the foresaid sentence passed on him, found within an enclosed yard in the rear of the pawn office at 70 High Street, in said burgh of Ayr, occupied by Daniel Eadie Hill, about to commit theft by housebreaking, which is an offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction, contrary to the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, section 7, whereby the accused is liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year.” **

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

* The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), enacts:—

Sec. 7. “Where any person is convicted on indictment of a crime, and a previous conviction of a crime is proved against him, he shall, at any time within seven years immediately after the expiration of the sentence passed on him for the last of such crimes, be guilty of an offence against this Act and be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year, under the following circumstances or any of them:—
. . . Thirdly, if he is found in any place, whether public or private,

May 12, 1908. The words printed in italics were introduced by amendment before the complaint went to trial.

Martin v. Boyd. The accused's law-agent objected to the competency and relevancy of the complaint on the ground that it was not averred that the accused had been previously convicted of a crime within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871. The Magistrate repelled the objection. Thereafter the amendments above referred to were allowed to be made upon the complaint. The accused's law-agent objected that the two thefts of which the accused was alleged to have been convicted were not "crimes" within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871. The Magistrate repelled the objection.

The accused pleaded not guilty.

Evidence was led. Inter alia, Malcolm M'Phee, detective-sergeant, Kilmarnock, produced an extract of a conviction on indictment in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Kilmarnock, on 18th May 1903, of the theft of a purse containing £3, 9s. 5½d., and previous conviction of dishonest appropriation of property, upon which conviction the extract bore that the accused was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.* David Gillies, detective-officer, Glasgow, produced an extract under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court before whom he is brought that he was about to commit or to aid in the commission of any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction, or was waiting for an opportunity to commit or aid in the commission of any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction."

Sec. 20. "The expression 'crime' means . . . in Scotland any of the pleas of the Crown, any theft which, in respect of any aggravation, or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude. . . ."

* Appended to the extract conviction there was a "Schedule of Previous Convictions" in the following terms :—

Date.	Court.	Crime.	Sentence.
1899. Jan. 31.	Eastern Police, Glasgow.	Attempt to Steal.	14 days' imprisonment.
1899. Aug. 26.	Do.	Theft.	30 days' imprisonment.
1901. Jan. 18.	Northern Police, Glasgow.	Do.	40 days' imprisonment.
1901. May 6.	Sheriff Court, Glasgow.	Attempt to Steal.	4 months' imprisonment, hard labour.
1901. Dec. 9.	Do.	Theft.	6 months' imprisonment.

The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), enacts :—

Sec. 67. " . . . Where any person is convicted of any crime, and also of any aggravation by previous conviction, the Clerk of the Court in which sentence is pronounced shall enter in the record of the trial a statement of the contents of any extract conviction that is put in evidence, setting forth the date, the place of trial, the Court, the nature of the crime, the aggravations accompanying it, if any, and the sentence pronounced; and where such person is again accused of any offence, in regard to which such conviction may be competently used as an aggravation, a duly certified extract of the conviction setting forth the particulars of previous conviction as above shall be admissible and sufficient as evidence to prove against him all the previous convictions and aggravations therein set forth."

of a conviction against the accused under the name of James Brown in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, on 9th December 1901, on indictment for theft of a purse, 6s. 3½d. of money, and ten receipts, aggravated by previous conviction of theft and attempt to steal, upon which conviction the extract bore that the panel was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

May 12, 1908.
Martin v.
Boyd.

The Magistrate, in respect of the evidence adduced, found the accused guilty of the contravention charged, and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment.

Martin brought a bill of suspension and liberation.

The complainer in the suspension averred (with regard to the objection taken as above mentioned to the competency and relevancy of the complaint):—(Stat. 4) “. . . The grounds of this objection were that the two convictions of theft founded on in the complaint had both been obtained in the Sheriff Court; that the thefts charged could not, therefore, have been punished with penal servitude; and that penal servitude was not the appropriate punishment, the sentence in each case being one of six months' imprisonment.” (With regard to the witness David Gillies above mentioned, and the production by him of the second extract conviction referred to, supra),—(Stat. 7) “In the course of his examination, it transpired that the said David Gillies had not been present in Court when the suspender was said to have been convicted on said 9th December 1901; that he had no personal knowledge of the conviction; and that such knowledge as he had was derived from the fact that he was present in the Eastern Police Court, Glasgow, on 18th January 1907, when, he stated, the suspender was charged with a contravention of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, and the conviction in question was proved to apply to him. The suspender's agent thereupon objected to the admissibility of the evidence of the witness Gillies on the ground that it was mere hearsay, and also to the production by him of the extract conviction referred to, but the presiding Magistrate repelled the objection and allowed the evidence to be received and the witness to put in the extract conviction as a production in the case. The suspender's agent thereupon asked that his objection to the admissibility of the evidence of the witness, and to the production of the extract conviction, be noted, in order to an appeal, but the clerk of Court, with the approval of the presiding Magistrate, declined to note said objection.” (Stat. 8) “After evidence in support of the complaint had been led, the respondent and the suspender's agent addressed the Court, and, in the course of his address, the respondent, in spite of the remonstrances of the suspender's agent, and in order to shew the suspender's intent to commit the crime of theft by house-breaking, laid stress upon the fact that, at the time of his apprehension, the suspender had been seen at the locus libelled in the complaint acting in concert with a man named Hutchison, who had pleaded guilty to a precisely similar charge as that brought against the suspender, and who had been sentenced to a year's imprisonment. No evidence was led to shew that the suspender had been with Hutchison on the occasion in question, or that Hutchison had pleaded guilty to the charge foresaid; but the suspender believes and avers that the Magistrate was influenced in coming to a decision on the merits of the case by the representations made to him, as aforesaid, and for which there was no warrant in the evidence adduced.”

May 12, 1908.

Martin v.
Boyd.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—The said conviction and sentence should be set aside in respect—(1) That the suspender has never been convicted of a “crime” within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, and that section 7 of said Act does not apply to him. (6) That the evidence of the witness Gillies, being mere hearsay, was incompetent, and that neither it nor the extract conviction produced by him should have been received. (7) That the procedure was illegal and irregular in respect of . . . (b) the Clerk of Court’s refusal to note the objection to the admissibility of the evidence of the witness Gillies, and the production of the extract conviction put in by him; and (c) the introduction by the respondent in his address to the presiding Magistrate of matters not brought out in evidence, whereby the Magistrate was prejudiced in coming to a decision on the merits of the case.

The procurator-fiscal lodged answers in which he stated, inter alia, with regard to the evidence of Gillies and the extract conviction produced by him—(Ans. 7) “. . . Explained that no written notice of objection to said convictions was given, in terms of the section 66 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, and that the convictions specified in said extract conviction and in the schedule annexed thereto had already been proved in evidence by the witness Malcolm M’Phee, detective officer, Kilmarnock, and by the extract conviction of date 18th May 1903, produced in evidence by him.” (Ans. 8) “Denied. There was ample evidence laid before the Court to shew that the suspender and the man Hutchison had been arrested together at the same time and place. . . . The Magistrate was not influenced in coming to a decision by what had happened to Hutchison, but on the contrary intimated to the respondent and the suspender’s agent, through the Clerk of Court, that he (the Magistrate) would deal with suspender’s case entirely on its own merits.”

The case was heard before the High Court on 12th May 1908.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this bill of suspension it is maintained in the first place that the complainer was never convicted of a crime within the meaning of the Act of 1871, and that section 7 of that Act does not apply. That contention amounts to this, that because the Public Prosecutor has seen fit to send a case of theft to be tried by the Sheriff and a jury, the accused, no matter how often he has been previously convicted, has not been guilty of a crime punishable with penal servitude. I am unable to hold that to have been the intention of the Legislature. The definition in the Act is a very unfortunate one indeed. In this country every person accused of theft may be brought before a jury in the High Court of Justiciary. That to do so is competent I have no doubt. It is equally competent for the High Court to pronounce a sentence of penal servitude, if it thinks that the circumstances warrant that course, and therefore every such case is a case in which a sentence of penal servitude may be pronounced.

But no such question arises here, because we are dealing with a case of theft with aggravation. That comes in under plea 7 (b). It is not disputed that the conviction of 18th May 1903 was properly proved. To the May 12, 1908.

Authorities referred to:—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), secs. 7 and 20; Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 66, 67, and 71; Christie v. Adamson, 1853, 1 Irv. 293.

extract conviction was attached a schedule of previous convictions to the Martin v.
number of five, and, under section 67 of the Criminal Procedure Act, Boyd.
1887, it is not necessary to prove these convictions again. I therefore Lord Justice-hold that all these convictions were properly before the Court. The Clerk.
prisoner was entitled to impugn these convictions, and to shew that he was not the person convicted, or at least he would have been entitled to do so if he had given notice. He did not attempt to do so, and must be held to have confessed that he was convicted of these offences. There were five convictions previous to the conviction of May 1903, the sentences ranging from fourteen days' to six months' imprisonment. Can it be suggested that that man could not have been punished with penal servitude? He might have been brought before the High Court of Jus-ticiary, and, if he had, he would probably have received a sentence of penal servitude.

The only remaining objection is the last of all. It would be most hazardous to hold that because a prosecutor in his address to the Court says something which he ought not to say the conviction must be set aside.
But in this case we have it stated in the answers, which we must take to have the authority of the Magistrate, that he did not allow himself to be influenced by what was said with regard to the man Hutchison, and that he dealt with the suspender's case entirely on its own merits. I think that the suspension must be refused.

LORD LOW and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

THE COURT refused the bill.

GARDINER & MACFIE, S.S.C.—JAMES AYTON, S.S.C.—Agents.

DAVID HASSON, Appellant.—Crabb Watt, K.C.—Findlay.
GEORGE NEILSON (Police Court Procurator-Fiscal, Glasgow),
Respondent.—Morison, K.C.—M. P. Fraser—A. Crawford.

No. 14.
May 12, 1908.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap.
43), secs. 1 (1) and (4) and 3—"Passage."—The Street Betting Act, 1906, sec. 1 (1), enacts that "any person frequenting or loitering in streets . . .
for the purpose of . . . betting" shall be liable to a penalty. Sec. 1 (4) enacts that "for the purpose of this section the word 'street' shall include any . . . public . . . passage," and sec. 3 enacts that "in Scotland . . . 'passage' includes common close or common stair, or passage leading thereto."

Hasson v
Neilson.

In a prosecution under the Act for loitering in a public passage for the purpose of betting, it was proved (a) that the passage in question was a passage to which the public had no right of access, but to which the public in fact could obtain access owing to the lock of the door being broken, and
(b) that it led directly to a court which gave access to at least one common stair.

Held that the passage in question was not a public passage within the meaning of sec. 1 (4) of the Street Betting Act, 1906; and (2) that it was not a passage leading to a common close or common stair within the meaning of sec. 3 of that Act.

May 12, 1908.

Hasson v.
Neilson.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

DAVID HASSON was charged in the Western District Police Court, Glasgow, upon a complaint, under the Glasgow Police Acts, the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 to 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of George Neilson, writer, Glasgow, Procurator-fiscal of Court, in which it was alleged that the accused did on "Friday, 14th June 1907, loiter in a public passage, videlicet, a common passage at 167 Finnieston Street, and in a public court, videlicet, a common court at 169 Finnieston Street, both of Glasgow, said passage and court each being a street within the meaning of the Street Betting Act, 1906, on behalf either of himself or of some other person to the complainer unknown, for the purpose of betting on horse races with David Alexander, of 2 Hill Street, Anderston, Glasgow, and with four men whose names and addresses are to the complainer unknown, being an offence contrary to and within the meaning of the Street Betting Act, 1906, sections 1 and 3 thereof, and such offence is the first offence, whereby the accused is liable to a fine." *

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led he was found guilty by the Magistrate of the offence charged as libelled, but that only in the public passage libelled, and was fined £10, with the alternative of sixty days' imprisonment.

Hasson appealed upon a case stated.

With regard to the passage and court libelled, the Magistrate found the following facts proved:—"Many years ago Messrs James & George Thomson, engineers and shipbuilders, were the sole occupants of the premises at Nos. 167 and 169 Finnieston Street, and while so possessed the premises were occupied by them as their engineering work and offices. At that time the public had not free access either to the passage or the court. Shortly after Messrs James and George Thomson left the premises the present state of the occupation came into existence, and has now subsisted for a number of years. That occupation is as follows:—The entrance at No. 167 is a door described on the plan produced and put in evidence as a door with lock, but the lock is broken and useless, and has been so for some considerable time. While the door may occasionally be pulled close at night, the entrance is freely accessible to the public, night and day. The door in question forms the entrance to the passage libelled, which is not more than 15 feet long by about 5 feet broad. In the passage there is a door with a padlock on it . . . that door being the entrance to a small store occupied by Thomas Sergeant, cooper, one of the witnesses for the defence. The passage is quite open at the south end, and leads directly into the court libelled. This gives an entrance to the court available to the public by the open door at No. 167. At No. 169 there is a sliding door or gate of access to the court, but from disuse the southern half of that gateway, in which there are

* The Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), enacts,—Sec. 1 (1), "Any person frequenting or loitering in streets or public places on behalf either of himself or of any other person for the purpose of bookmaking or betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying or receiving or settling bets, shall" in the the case of a first offence, be liable to a fine.

(4) "For the purpose of this section the word 'street' shall include any highway and any public bridge, road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not. . . ."

Sec. 3. "In Scotland . . . 'passage' includes common close or common stair, or passage leading thereto. . . ."

letter-boxes for the use of some of the tenants in the court, has become fixed, and always stands closed. The other or northern half of the gateway, which half the plan shews to be about 11 feet wide, is constantly open for access, with this exception, that it is sometimes, but not regularly, shut from Saturday nights till Monday mornings. There are at least ten different tenancies entering from the court by various doors or entrances, including a door at the western extremity of the building on the north side of the court leading to a common stair, by which is approached the Dock Labourers' Hall, shewn on the plan, and other occupancies. On the south face of the south wall of the old pay-box, now forming part of Sergeant's store . . . there are painted the words 'No admittance except on business.' The lettering is very indistinct, and has not been re-painted since the whole premises were occupied as stated by Messrs James & George Thomson."

The question of law was:—"Was I right in holding the passage libelled to be a street within the meaning of the Street Betting Act, 1906?"

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 12th May 1908.¹

LORD LOW.—The question in this case is whether the Magistrate was right in holding that the passage shewn on the plan as entering from 167 Finnieston Street was a "street" within the meaning of the Street Betting Act, 1906. The circumstances are very fully stated in the case. It appears that the passage was originally used as the entrance from Finnieston Street to an office or pay-box. Between Finnieston Street and the passage there is a door with a lock, but the lock is broken, and accordingly there is nothing to prevent anyone who chooses from entering the passage. The passage, after passing the pay-box, leads into a court, the main entrance to which is from Finnieston Street by means of the large door marked 168 on the plan. Various premises, and, at all events, one common stair, are entered from the court. The question is whether in these circumstances the passage is a street within the meaning of the Street Betting Act.

By section 1, subsection 4, of the Act, it is provided that "the word 'street' shall include any public . . . passage." Leaving out of view for the present the definition of the word "passage" in section 3, I am clearly of opinion that the passage in question is not a public passage within the meaning of section 1 (4). The public are able to go there only because the door is out of repair. That does not make the passage a public passage in the sense of the statute, because I apprehend that when a statute speaks of a place as being "public," it means a place where the public are entitled to be as a matter of right, and does not include private property to which the public can obtain access simply because there is no sufficient barrier to keep them out. Therefore, so far as subsection 4 of section 1 of the Act is concerned, I do not think that this case presents any difficulty.

It is, however, necessary to consider section 3, which gives a special definition of the word "passage" in the application of this Act to Scotland.

¹ Authorities cited:—Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), secs. 1 (1) and (4) and 3; Vallance v. Campbell, 1906, 5 Adam, 70, 8 F. (J. C.) 62; M'Arthur v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1906, 8 F. 1123.

May 12, 1908. The provision is that "In Scotland 'passage' includes common close or common stair, or passage leading thereto." I am inclined to agree with Mr Fraser that the word "passage" which is there defined must be read as meaning "public" passage. At all events, I shall assume that that is so, but even upon that assumption I do not think that section 3 affects the conclusion at which I arrive upon a construction of section 1 (4).

Hasson v.
Neilson.

Lord Low.

The passage is of course not a common stair, and it is not contended that it is a common close. The question therefore is whether it is a passage leading to a common close or a common stair? As I have already pointed out, the passage leads directly into the court, and I think that it is sufficiently clear that the court which is shewn on the plan is not a subject of the kind to which in Scotland the term "close" is applied. Indeed I did not understand it to be contended that the court was a "common close." It was, however, maintained that the passage leads to a common stair. That is true to this extent, that the passage leads into the court, and the court gives access to a common stair. But I do not think that that position of matters satisfies the description in the statute of a passage "leading" to a common stair. It seems to me that what is meant is a passage leading directly to a common stair, and not a passage leading directly to some other place from which in turn access can be had to the common stair. I am, therefore, of opinion that the question of law should be answered in the negative.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree. The locus in this case seems to have been inside a small house, originally used as a pay office of a large public work. One half of the house is apparently still kept carefully locked up, but in the other part, which is the place in question, there is a door which, having got out of repair, is not kept closed, and which persons may pass through and gain access to an open space lying beyond. The fact, however, that the door is not kept locked does not make the house a public or common passage. The place in question is private property, and any person using it for betting purposes does so as a mere trespasser, and cannot correctly be said to be loitering in a public passage.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with your Lordships. I have no doubt that if it had been in contemplation that there were such places as this where betting might be carried on, the Act would have been so framed as to have covered them. This, however, was not done, so the conviction here must be quashed.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and quashed the conviction.

BRYSON & GRANT, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES STENHOUSE, Complainer.—M'Lennan, K.C.—Paton.
 THOMAS DYKES (Govan Burgh Prosecutor), Respondent.—
M. P. Fraser—D. P. Fleming.

No. 15.

May 13, 1908.

Stenhouse v.
Dykes.

Summary Procedure—Conviction—Alternative charge and general conviction—Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), sec. 1 (1).—A person was charged with loitering in a street libelled “for the purpose of bookmaking or betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying or receiving or settling bets,” contrary to the Street Betting Act, 1906, sec. 1. He was found “guilty of the offence charged.”

Held that this was not a case to which the rule against a general conviction proceeding upon an alternative charge could be held to apply, and conviction sustained.

Summary Procedure—Sentence—Imprisonment in default of immediate payment of fine—Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), secs. 1 (1) (a) and 3—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 18 (3) and (6), Schedule K, 3 and 6—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 6 (b).—The Street Betting Act, 1906, enacts, sec. 1 (1) (a), that a person for a first offence against the Act shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £10, and sec. 3, that in Scotland “in the event of an offender failing to make payment of a fine imposed under sec. 1 (1) (a) . . . he shall be liable to imprisonment in accordance with the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.”

A person who had been convicted of an offence under sec. 1 (1) (a) of the Act was fined £10, “and in default of immediate payment thereof” was sentenced to be imprisoned for thirty days, this sentence being in the form of Schedule K, 3, of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864.

Held that, in view of the provisions of sec. 3 of the Street Betting Act, 1906, and of sec. 6 (b) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, this was a case of a contravention of an Act of Parliament under which the accused, in default of payment of a penalty, was liable to be imprisoned for a period limited to a certain time in the sense of sec. 18 (3) of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and that consequently a sentence in the form of Schedule K, 3, of that Act was competent.

JAMES STENHOUSE, baker, Govan, was charged in the Police Court of the burgh of Govan upon a complaint, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of Thomas Dykes, writer, Glasgow, the Burgh Prosecutor, which set forth that the accused “did on the 22d day of November 1907, between the hours of 12.30 P.M. and 2 P.M., loiter in Lambhill Street, between Paisley Road and Tower Street, in the burgh of Govan, said Lambhill Street being a street within the meaning of the Street Betting Act, 1906, section 1, on behalf of himself or some other person or persons to the complainer unknown, for the purpose of bookmaking or betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying or receiving or settling bets with a person or persons to the complainer unknown, on horse races publicly announced to take place on or about the date libelled, at Manchester, England, or on other horse races or events whereof the dates, places, and particulars are to the complainer unknown, contrary to the said Street Betting Act, 1906, section 1, particularly subsection 1 thereof, and such offence is a first offence, whereby the accused is liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding £10, and in default of payment to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months.”

The accused pleaded not guilty. Evidence was led in support of the complaint, and the Magistrate, of date 29th November 1907, “in

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

May 13, 1908.

Stenhouse v.
Dykes.

respect of evidence adduced," found "the accused guilty of the offence charged, and therefore" fined and amerced him "in the sum of ten pounds sterling, payable to the Clerk of Court, and in default of immediate payment thereof," sentenced and adjudged "the said accused to be imprisoned for the space of thirty days from this date, unless said fine be sooner paid, and thereafter to be set at liberty; and for that purpose" granted "warrant to officers of law to convey the said accused to the prison of Glasgow, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law."

Stenhouse brought a bill of suspension.

The complainer averred:—"(4) The charge brought against the complainer was an alternative one, but the conviction following thereon is general, and it cannot be ascertained therefrom, or from the whole proceedings, of what the complainer was convicted. (5) The sentence pronounced by the said Magistrate is ultra vires, incompetent, and oppressive. The statute founded on does not authorise imprisonment for a first offence in default of immediate payment of the fine imposed."

The complainer pleaded;—(2) The conviction or sentence complained of ought to be suspended in respect that a general conviction was pronounced on a charge which is alternative. (3) The sentence complained of being illegal, incompetent, and oppressive, the conviction ought to be suspended.*

* The Street Betting Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 43), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "(1) Any person frequenting or loitering in streets or public places, on behalf either of himself or of any other person, for the purpose of bookmaking or betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying or receiving or settling bets, shall (a) in the case of a first offence be liable on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a fine not exceeding ten pounds. . . ."

Sec. 3. "In Scotland . . . in the event of an offender failing to make payment of a fine imposed under sec. 1 (1) (a) . . . of this Act, he shall be liable to imprisonment in accordance with the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts."

The Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), provides:—

Sec. 18. "In cases of conviction or judgment against the respondent in prosecutions and proceedings under this Act the sentence of the Court may be in one or other of the forms contained in the Schedule K to this Act annexed, or as nearly as may be in such form according to the nature and circumstances of the complaint, viz.— . . . (3) In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament under which the accused is or shall be liable to forfeit a penalty, and in default of payment thereof to be imprisoned for a period limited to a certain time, at the expiration of which he shall be entitled to liberation although the penalty has not been paid, the judgment of the Court shall be in the form No. 3 in the said Schedule. . . . (6) In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament under which the accused is or shall be liable to a penalty, and where no special provision is made for the recovery thereof, or for the substitution of a term of imprisonment in default of payment . . . the judgment of the Court shall authorise execution by arrestment, poinding, and sale, and imprisonment (unless recovery by imprisonment is excluded by the terms of the Act), and may be in the form No. 6 in the said Schedule. . . ."

Schedule K, form No. 3 (Conviction for a penalty and in default of payment Imprisonment), is as follows:—"The justices [or justice or sheriff or magistrate] in respect of the judicial confession of the said J K [or of the

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 13th May 1908.¹

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

Stenhouse v.
Dykes.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think it is necessary to call for a reply. As to the first objection that this was a general conviction following on an alternative charge, I see no ground for it. The Act specifies loitering as an offence in certain circumstances, namely, loitering for the purpose of book-making or betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying or receiving or settling bets. If a man is found loitering for all or any of these purposes, it does not matter which, he is liable to fine or imprisonment. In many cases where two modes of committing a crime are specified a general evidence adduced] convict the said J K of the contravention [or offence] charged [or state to what extent he is guilty] and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay the sum of £ of penalty [or of modified penalty where there is power to modify,] [with the sum of £ of expenses, where expenses may be awarded], and in default of immediate payment thereof [or if time is allowed, say within days from this date] adjudge him to be imprisoned in the prison of for the period of from the date of his imprisonment unless the said sum [or sums] shall be sooner paid, and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend him and convey him to the said prison and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him accordingly.

[Signature of judges or judge]."

Schedule K, form No. 6, Judgment for a penalty recoverable by Diligence, is as follows :—"The justices [or justice or sheriff or magistrate] in respect of the judicial confession of the said J K [or the evidence adduced] convict the said J K of the contravention [or offence] charged [or state to what extent he is guilty], and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay the sum of £ of penalty [or modified penalty where there is power to modify] of £ , and also find the said J K liable in £ of expenses to the complainer, and ordain instant execution by arrestment, and also execution by poinding [and imprisonment where there is power to imprison]; grant warrant to officers of Court to arrest all debts and sums of money owing to the said J K, and [if time is allowed add in default of payment within days from this date] to poind his goods and effects, and to sell the same at the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding without further notice or warrant; [where the Act authorises imprisonment, add] and appoint a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within days from the expiration of the period hereby allowed for payment, under certification of imprisonment [if for a term, specify the term] in default of payment or recovery of the said sums with the expenses of diligence before the time allowed for such report.

[Signature of judges or judge]."

The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), enacts :—

Sec. 6. "In all proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts . . .

¹ Authorities cited by the complainer :—(1) In argument on his 2d plea :—Bradford v. Dawson, L. R., [1897] 1 Q. B. 307; Lang v. Walker, 1902, 4 Adam, 82, 5 F. (J.) 8 (distinguished); Murray v. M'Dougall, 1883, 5 Couper, 215, 10 R. (J.) 42; Gemmell v. Weir, 1897, 2 Adam, 227, 24 R. (J.) 23. (2) In argument on his 3d plea :—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 18 (3), and (6), Schedule K, 6; Street Betting Act, 1906, sec. 1 (1) (a); Todd v. Magowan, 1905, 4 Adam, 544, 7 F. (J.) 50; Simpson v. Board of Trade, 1892, 3 White, 167, 19 R. (J.) 66; Gardner v. Bremridge, 1901, 3 Adam, 309, 3 F. (J.) 46; Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, secs. 6 (b) and 8 (1).

May 13, 1908. conviction cannot follow, but it is not the law that wherever you find the word "or" you have an alternative charge.

Stenhouse v.
Dykes.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

I think that this case is very like that in which it was held that where a man was charged with trespass in pursuit of "game, or of deer, roe, wood-cocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies," a general conviction following on that charge was not bad. It was held that all these details were merely descriptive of the mode in which the crime might be carried out. It was not necessary to a conviction that the accused should have done any of these things. It was enough that he was there for the purpose of doing one or more of them. It is the same in the present case. If the evidence satisfies the Magistrate that the prisoner was loitering for purposes connected with betting, for all of them, or for any one or more of them, he may convict, although in the latter case, he cannot specify the particular purpose which the prisoner had in his mind.

But then it is said that imprisonment was not competent. That could not have been said if section 3 of the Street Betting Act had contained a repetition of the details in section 6 (b) of the Act of 1881. When you find in the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, a section which prescribes the period of imprisonment which shall correspond to a fine of a certain amount, and a later Act of Parliament provides that in default of payment of a fine the offender may be imprisoned in accordance with the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, I do not doubt that the Magistrate is entitled to go back to the Act of 1881, and pronounce sentence in terms of it.

LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur with what has been said by your Lordship regarding the contention of the complainer that this is a case of a general conviction on an alternative charge.

With regard to the penalties it was maintained that the warrant for imprisonment was wrong, and it was said that under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the conviction should have been in terms of Schedule K, number 6, instead of Schedule K, number 3, annexed to that Act. I think that the Magistrate was right in adopting Form K, number 3.

Subsection 3 of section 18 of the Act of 1864 provides :—"In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament under which the accused is or shall be liable to forfeit a penalty, and in default of payment thereof to be imprisoned for a period limited to a certain time, at the expiration of which he shall be entitled to liberation although the penalty has not been

(b) where a warrant of imprisonment is granted, whether in default of payment of a penalty or expenses, or for failure to find caution or security, or in default of recovery of sufficient goods by poinding and sale, when the amount adjudged to be paid or for which security is to be found . . . exceeds five pounds but does not exceed twenty pounds, the period of imprisonment shall not exceed . . . two months."

Sec. 8. "(1) Subject to the provisions of sec. 6, in all proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts where a warrant of poinding and sale is competent, a warrant of imprisonment in default of recovery of sufficient goods shall likewise be competent for a period not exceeding three months, and the Court shall specify the term of imprisonment in the warrant."

paid, the judgment of the Court shall be in the Form No. 3" in Schedule May 13, 1908.

K. It was said that this subsection did not apply because the Street Betting Act, 1906, section 1 (a), does not provide that on default of payment of a fine the accused should be imprisoned for a period limited to a certain time. But at the time when the Street Betting Act was passed the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, was in force. Stenhouse v. Dykes.
Lord Ardwall.

By section 3 of the Street Betting Act it is provided that in the event of an offender failing to make payment of a fine under section 1 (a) he shall be liable to imprisonment in accordance with the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. One of these Acts is the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881. In section 6 (b) of that Act we find that the period for which an offender is liable to imprisonment, where the penalty is £10, is limited to two months. In considering whether subsection 3 of section 18 of the 1864 Act applies to a penalty imposed under the Street Betting Act, I read that Act as incorporating section 6 (b) of the Act of 1881, and doing so there is no doubt that it does prescribe a period of imprisonment limited to a certain time, because by reading section 6 (b) we arrive at the period of imprisonment which it is lawful to give. In the present case the penalty imposed being £10, the period of imprisonment is limited to "a certain time," namely, to two months, and, this being so, it follows that Schedule K, No. 3, of the Act of 1864 was the proper form of conviction to adopt in the present case.

With regard to the application of subsection 6, section 18, of the 1864 Act, I think on reading it along with Schedule K, No. 6, that it does not apply to the present case, and that if the Magistrate had given judgment in the form of Schedule K, No. 6, he would have acted wrongly, because in the present case the Act of Parliament for the contravention of which the accused was liable to a penalty contains a special provision for the substitution of a term of imprisonment in default of payment.

THE COURT refused the bill.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—M. J. BROWN & Co., S.S.O.—Agents.

JAMES MITCHELL, Complainer.—Kemp.

JAMES MORRISON (Justice of Peace Court Procurator-Fiscal of Banffshire), Respondent.—D.-F. Campbell—A. M. Mackay.

No. 16.

May 13, 1908.

Review—Suspension—Exclusion of Suspension—Special Statutory Appeal—Public-House—Breach of Certificate—Third offence—Proof—Summary Procedure—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), secs. 53, 91, 102, and 103.—A publican who had been convicted of breach of certificate, "upon a complaint bearing that it was a third offence," brought a suspension upon the ground that after evidence for the prosecution and the defence had been led, the cases for the respective parties closed, and parties heard with regard to the particular breach alleged, and after the justices had found the accused guilty thereof, a witness was put in to prove two previous convictions against the accused, that this evidence was incompetently admitted, that no other evidence of the offence charged being a third offence had been led, and that such evidence should have been led, as this was a substantive part of the charge. Held that the procedure complained of amounted to nothing more at most than a "deviation in point of form from the statutory enactment," that consequently the only form of Mitchell v. Morrison.

May 13, 1908. review competent was an appeal under sec. 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, and that the suspension was incompetent.
 Mitchell v. Morrison. Opinions that the procedure followed by the Justices was competent and proper.

HIGH COURT. JAMES MITCHELL, hotelkeeper, Delnashaugh Hotel, Ballindalloch, in the county of Banff, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court at Banff upon a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of James Morison, solicitor, Banff, Procurator-fiscal of Court, which set forth that the accused "who holds a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors at his premises at Delnashaugh Hotel aforesaid, granted to him under the provisions of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, which, inter alia, provides that he shall not himself be in a state of intoxication on the premises, has contravened the terms and conditions of said certificate, in so far as upon Tuesday, the 3d day of September 1907, the said James Mitchell was in a state of intoxication on the said licensed premises occupied by him at Delnashaugh aforesaid, whereby, this being the third offence, he is liable to forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding £20, together with the expenses of conviction to be ascertained upon conviction, and in addition to said penalty the certificate granted to the said James Mitchell shall be declared to be forfeited, and to become void and null, all in terms of sections 53 and 91 of the said Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903."

There was no reference in the complaint to any particular previous convictions for breach of certificate against the accused.

The complaint was tried on 19th October 1907. The accused pleaded not guilty.

The Justices convicted the accused of the contravention charged, "and adjudged him to forfeit and pay £3 of modified penalty, with £1, 10s. of expenses, and" in respect this was "the third offence," declared "the certificate held by the" accused "to be forfeited and to become null and void."

Mitchell brought a bill of suspension.*

The minutes of procedure bore that after four witnesses had been examined in support of the complaint and two in exculpation,

* The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII., cap. 25), enacts:—

Sec. 102. "It shall be competent to any person conceiving himself aggrieved by any warrant, sentence, order, decree, judgment, or decision made or given by any sheriff, justice, or justices of the peace, or magistrate in any cause, prosecution, or complaint raised under the authority of this Act, for any offence punishable by fine or by imprisonment, to bring the case by appeal before the High Court of Justiciary. . . . Provided always that such appeal shall be competent only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the sheriff, justice, or justices of the peace, or magistrate as the case may be, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think have prevented substantial justice from having been done. . . ."

Sec. 103. "No warrant, sentence, order, decree, judgment, or decision made or given by any quarter sessions, sheriff, justice, or justices of the peace, or magistrate in any cause, prosecution, or complaint, or in any other matter under the authority of this Act, shall be subject to reduction, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, on any ground or for any reason whatever, other than by this Act provided."

* William Morrison, retired inspector of Police, Keith, produced May 13, 1908 extract convictions against respondent, of date 28th February 1905, and 31st October 1905. . . . The agent for the respondent objected to previous convictions being proved, after the charge found proven, without notice that such previous convictions were to be used against him. The Court repelled the objection." Mitchell v. Morrison.

The complainer averred that after the witnesses in support of the complaint had been examined the respondent (the procurator-fiscal) closed his case, and that after the witnesses in exculpation had been examined, "the respondent and the agent for the complainer were then heard on the case, after which the Justices, having retired to consider the matter, returned to the Court and found the complainer guilty of the offence charged." (Stat. 3) "After the complainer had been found guilty, the respondent put William Morrison, retired inspector of police, Keith . . . into the witness-box, and he on oath spoke to two previous convictions for similar offences as applicable to the complainer. The agent for the complainer objected to this form of procedure, and also to the evidence of ex-inspector Morrison being received, in respect that no notice had been given that these previous convictions were to be put in evidence against the complainer; but the Court allowed the evidence of ex-inspector Morrison, and thereafter the said Justices pronounced sentence upon the complainer," as narrated supra.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No evidence was competently led by the respondent to prove a third offence against the complainer, and the minutes of procedure disclose no previous convictions as having been produced or put in evidence as part of the case against him. (3) The Court incompetently admitted the evidence of the said William Morrison after both the respondent and complainer had closed their case and addressed the Court, and after the Court had found the complainer guilty.

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 13th May 1908.

The respondent objected to the competency of the suspension.¹

The complainer maintained that the suspension was competent:—The proceedings were fundamentally null,² or at least so grossly irregular as to justify suspension.³ The allegation that the breach of certificate charged was a third offence was a substantive part of the charge, which must be proved before the complainer could be convicted of the contravention charged.⁴

LORD ARDWALL.—I think this suspension must be refused as being incompetent, because the only question brought up is one which, if it is of any importance at all, could have been made the subject of an appeal under

¹ Authorities cited:—On competency—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 102 and 103; M'Kenzie v. M'Phee, 1889, 2 White, 188, 16 R. (J.) 53; Rattray v. White, 1891, 3 White, 89, 19 R. (J.) 23; Mackenzie v. Martin, 1891, 2 White, 589, 18 R. (J.) 16. On the merits—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 53, 54, and 91.

² Massey v. Lamb, 1906, 5 Adam, 59, 8 F. (J.) 88.

³ Bell v. M'Phee, 1883, 5 Couper, 312, 10 R. (J.) 78; MacArthur v. Campbell, 1896, 2 Adam, 151, 23 R. (J.) 81.

⁴ Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 53 and 54; Gordon v. Scott, 1891, 3 White, 251; Cochran v. Walker, 1900, 3 Adam, 165, 2 F. (J.) 52.

May 18, 1908. section 102 of the Licensing Act, 1903. The objection taken to this conviction and these proceedings is that William Morrison, a retired inspector of police, was put into the box, and produced an extract conviction after the evidence was closed, and after the particular offence of being found intoxicated on 3d September 1907 had been found proved. Now, the evidence for the prosecution relating to the offence of being found intoxicated on 3d September was duly led, the witnesses in exculpation had been heard, and after that the Justices considered the question whether the complainer should be found guilty of that offence, and came to the conclusion that he was guilty. After that was done, and before sentence was pronounced, the prosecutor led evidence of previous convictions, and William Morrison went into the box and proved two such convictions. It is said that that was incompetent, because the two previous convictions formed part of the substantive charge. Now, on the merits I should not have thought this objection well founded, and even if I thought the proceeding irregular, I should not have thought that it was such a deviation from the statutory enactments as prevented substantial justice being done. But if the objection is anything at all, it is an objection to the proceedings, founded on a deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments. That being so, I think it is clear that such objection could have been dealt with in an appeal under section 102. By section 103 every other mode of review is excluded. If this had been a case of defect of jurisdiction, or if the proceedings had been ex facie fundamentally null, a suspension might have been competent, but there is nothing of that kind set forth in the present bill of suspension, and, in my opinion, it must be refused.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that none of the matters which have been discussed here can be regarded as more than irregularities of procedure. That being so, it is clear that the only remedy competent to the complainer was an appeal under section 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903. Such appeal is competent only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression, or on “such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think have prevented substantial justice from having been done.” If the irregularities are not such as can support the appeal, then all review is excluded under section 103. I agree that the suspension must be refused.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. Here a complainer could have had the conviction set aside by the Court of Appeal if he could shew that it was due to corruption or malice and oppression, or such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as shall have prevented substantial justice from having been done. But we have always held that we have power, notwithstanding the exclusion of suspension, to suspend convictions if something is done so fundamentally contrary to principle that the conviction was fundamentally null.

Such, however, is not the case here. The whole proceedings have been conducted with care and reasonable regularity. I see nothing to the prejudice of the accused. The only thing done was not to bring forward the previous convictions till after the conviction. Under the Act of 1887 May 13, 1908. previous convictions could be brought forward after conviction. The jury ^{Mitchell v.} knows nothing of previous convictions. The peculiarity here is that if the ^{Morrison.} party does not object no witnesses are required to prove previous convictions. That they are brought forward at the end of the case cannot ^{Lord Justice-} prejudice the accused, but is rather in his favour, as they cannot then affect ^{Clerk.} the Court in considering the evidence. Such procedure is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Act of 1887, section 67. I accordingly think there is no ground for suspension.

THE COURT refused the bill.

SHARPE & YOUNG, W.S.—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellants.—Blackburn, K.C. No. 17.
—King.

JOHN ROPER, Respondent.

May 13, 1908.

Statutory Offences—Railway—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 96—Travelling without paying fare—Intent to avoid payment.—A workman, who had travelled by a workman's train, attempted to leave the station where he alighted without giving up a ticket (his intention being to defraud the railway company), but was prevented from doing so, and thereupon produced from his pocket and tendered a workman's ticket valid and available for the journey. Workmen's tickets are not dated, and can be used at any time. ^{Caledonian Railway Co. v. Roper.}

Held that the workman had not been guilty of travelling "without having previously paid his fare and with intent to avoid payment thereof" in the sense of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 96.

JOHN ROPER, 2 Gladstone Place, Dalmuir, was charged in the ^{HIGH COURT.} Sheriff Court at Dumbarton upon a complaint under the Summary ^{Lord Justice-} Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, at the instance of the ^{Clerk.} Caledonian Railway Company, which set forth that the accused on ^{Lord Low.} 17th December 1907 "did travel on the complainers' railway from ^{Lord Ardwall.} Old Kilpatrick Station to Alexandria Station in the county of Dumbarton," by a certain train specified, "without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, contrary to the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), section 96."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led for the prosecution.

The Sheriff-substitute (Blair) in respect of the evidence adduced dismissed the complaint.

The Caledonian Railway Company appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Sheriff-substitute stated:—

"I found the following facts proved—(1) That the respondent, John Roper, travelled by said train that morning from Old Kilpatrick Station to Alexandria Station. (2) That said train is a workman's train. (3) That workman's tickets are issued to workmen, available by this and other trains, in lots of six at a price of one shilling per lot, each ticket being available for a return journey between Old Kilpatrick and Alexandria Stations. (4) That these workmen's tickets

May 13, 1908. are not dated, and can be used at any time. (5) That on the morning in question the respondent, on leaving the train at Alexandria Station, instead of leaving the station by the proper exit, where the ticket collector was stationed, attempted to pass down the embankment into the street. (6) That in doing so he intended to defraud the Company by not giving up his ticket. (7) That the respondent, John Roper, while attempting to leave the station premises by means of the embankment, was stopped by the witnesses Simpson and Scott, who had been placed there for the purpose. (8) That the respondent's name and address was taken by these witnesses, and that he was thereafter conducted to the proper exit, where the ticket collector was stationed. (9) That the respondent there and then produced from his pocket a workman's ticket valid and available for the journey he had made, and offered it to the collector. (10) That the collector refused, on the instructions of the witnesses Simpson and Scott, to take the said ticket from the respondent.

Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Roper.

"In these circumstances I dismissed the charge against the respondent on the ground that the statutory complaint libelled that the respondent had not previously paid his fare, when in fact he held a ticket valid for the journey he had made.

"At the same time I was satisfied that the respondent intended to defraud the Company, and to use the ticket which he had in his possession for a future journey."

The question of law was:—"Was the Sheriff-substitute, in view of his finding in fact that the respondent intended to defraud the Company, although he held a ticket valid for the journey he had made, right in dismissing the complaint?" *

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 13th May 1908.

There was no appearance for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I cannot see any ground for holding that the Sheriff has erred. If a passenger proceed to travel by a railway without having paid his fare, and intending to avoid paying his fare, he is liable, at common law and under the Railway Acts, to be punished. But I cannot see how a man can be said to have travelled without a ticket when he had a ticket actually in his possession. No doubt he was subject to the obligation to deliver the ticket up at the end of his journey, and in order to do so he must leave the station at the proper place provided for that purpose. Here he attempts to leave the station without giving up his ticket. That is a distinct fraud, for which he could have been charged in the ordinary Police Court, and the Company could have had him summoned to that Court. If he had started without a ticket, and had never intended to pay, or if he had given away his ticket to someone else, the case would have been totally different. Here he had a ticket and failed to give it up, and was not in the position of travelling without a ticket.

* The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), enacts:—

Sec. 96. "If any person travel or attempt to travel in any carriage of the company . . . without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof . . . every such person shall, for every such offence, forfeit to the company a sum not exceeding forty shillings."

LORD LOW and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

May 13, 1908.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Roper.

HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S., Agents.

GEORGE RATCLIFFE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Carmont.
JAMES FARQUHARSON, Defender (Respondent).—Riach.

No. 18.

May 14, 1908.

Sheriff—Small-Debt Court—Sist—Decree in absence or in foro by default—Litiscontestation—Small-Debts (Scotland) Act, 1837 (1 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 16.—In a Sheriff Court small-debt case both parties appeared at the first diet, when, after a statement of the defence and some discussion thereon, the case was continued for proof. At the adjourned diet the defender failed to appear, and decree was pronounced against him. He thereafter applied for and obtained a sist under section 16 of the Small-Debts (Scotland) Act, 1837, and was ultimately assoilzied. The pursuer appealed upon the ground that the sist was incompetent, the decree having been a decree in foro after litiscontestation, and not a decree in absence.

Ratcliffe v.
Farquharson.

Held that the decree was a decree in absence, that the sist was consequently competent, and appeal dismissed.

Oliver v. Simpson, 2 Adam, 601, 1 F. (J.) 12, followed.

Observations on the use of the expression litiscontestation with regard to procedure in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court.

ON 24th September 1907 George Ratcliffe, Medicated Lozenge Works, Leeds, brought a small-debt action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against James Farquharson, M.D., Coatbridge, in which he concluded for payment of £2, 19s. 1d.

HIGH COURT
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

The Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) having assoilzied the defender, the pursuer appealed.

The appellant stated :—"On the case being called in Court on 1st October the respondent pled in defence of the claim, through an agent, that the account was prescribed, that the debt had not been incurred, and if it had been incurred, the price thereof had since been paid. A discussion took place on the legal points raised, and thereafter the Sheriff indicated that proof would be necessary before finally deciding the case, and for that purpose continued the case until the 15th October 1907. When the case was called on the 15th October 1907 the appellant was ready to proceed with the proof, but no appearance was made for the respondent, and decree passed against him for the sum sued for, with expenses. On the 16th day of said month the respondent applied for and obtained a summons sisting the case for rehearing. Said sist was called in Court on 29th October 1907, and was continued until 5th November 1907, and on that date continued further until 19th November 1907. On 29th October 1907 the appellant intimated to the respondent's agents, in writing, that he pled that the proceedings taken by the respondent under the sist were incompetent and irregular, in view of the discussion which had taken place at the bar on 1st October 1907, and that litiscontestation had therefore taken place. The appellant also pled that no actings of either party in the cause could, after 1st October 1907, make any proceedings of the nature of a sist now competent, these proceedings being ex facie incompetent and irregular. . . . The presiding Sheriff (Glegg), after hearing parties' agents, repelled the

May 14, 1908. always more or less dangerous to qualify purely statutory procedure by analogies drawn from common law. Looking to the statute, my opinion is that the only question on which the present case turns is whether the decree was pronounced in the presence or absence of the parties, and if it was pronounced in the absence of either party, it is a decree in absence, and a sist may be granted under section 16 of the Small-Debt Act. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal ought to be refused.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

BALFOUR & MANSON, S.S.C.—DAVID DOUGAL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 19. WILLIAM H. MAIR AND ANOTHER (John Mair's Trustees) AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Appellants).—Mair.
May 8, 1908. WILLIAM MILLER, Defender (Respondent).—Paton.

Mair's
Trustees v.
Miller.

Sheriff—Small-Debt Court—Appeal—Competency—Deviation from statutory form—Counter Claim—Small-Debts (Scotland) Act, 1837 (1 Vict. cap. 41), secs. 11, 31.—In a small-debt action for payment of £14 as house rent due under a written lease, the Sheriff, after a proof, gave decree for £5.

The pursuer appealed. Appeal sustained on the ground of incompetency and deviation from statutory form, in respect that as the decree was for a sum which had no relation to what was sued for, it was incompetent; or, otherwise, that if, as explained by the defender, the Sheriff had deducted from the sum sued for a sum in name of damages for breach of contract on the part of the landlord in failing to do his best to re-let the house, such a claim was a counter claim, of which the defender was bound to give notice, as required by section 11 of the Small-Debts Act, 1837, and that as he had failed to do so the Sheriff was not entitled to consider it.

Circuit Court
at Glasgow.
Lord Ardwall.
Lord Guthrie.

WILLIAM H. MAIR and John Mair, both residing in Glasgow, trustees of the late John Mair, and Mungo Robertson, 21 Rutland Crescent, Glasgow, factor for the said trustees, raised an action in the Small-Debt Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against William Millar, 5 Harvey Street, Govan, for a sum of £14, 16s. 3d., being three quarters' rent of a dwelling-house at 25 Rutland Crescent, Glasgow, let by them to the defender on a yearly let from Whitsunday 1907 to Whitsunday 1908, and due and payable at the terms of Lammas and Martinmas 1907 and Candlemas 1908, at the rate of £4, 18s. 9d. per quarter.

The Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) decerned in favour of the pursuers for the sum of £5. The pursuers thereupon appealed to the Circuit Court at Glasgow.

The note of appeal set forth that "on the case being called in Court before Mr Sheriff-substitute Boyd, the said Mungo Robertson appeared for the appellants, and the respondent appeared personally with his law-agent, and evidence was given by the said Mungo Robertson and the respondent, and it was proved and admitted that the house was duly let to the respondent, and that the three quarters' rent sued for was unpaid. The Sheriff-substitute, however, indicated that in view of the house not having been occupied by the respondent, although taken by him, he would not grant decree for the sum sued for, and continued the case to give the parties an opportunity of making some arrangement. The case was accordingly continued till the 2d day of March, but not being then reached, was again continued till the 17th day of March 1908 in chambers, when there appeared the agents for the parties, and it was intimated by the appellants that they refused May 8, 1908. to make any arrangement such as had been suggested, and desired decree for the amount of rent admittedly unpaid, and the learned Sheriff-substitute, after hearing parties' agents, indicated that he was not satisfied that the appellants had done all they could to re-let the house, and accordingly gave decree for £5 only, without expenses." The grounds of appeal were two, viz.:—" (First) There has been malice and oppression in terms of the Small-Debt Act of 1837, sec. 31, on the part of the learned Sheriff-substitute in not giving judgment with expenses for rent due and unpaid under an admitted lease; that he was not concerned with any consideration of whether it were a hardship to the respondent that judgment should be asked as craved; that the rent being admittedly unpaid his only course was to grant decree for the amount with expenses. (Second) That in granting decree in favour of the appellants for a sum apparently in name of damages instead of for the claim made by them in name of rent, the learned Sheriff-substitute deviated from the statutory enactments, and has accordingly prevented substantial justice from being done to the appellants."

The case was heard at the Circuit Court at Glasgow on 8th May 1908.

Argued for the appellants;—The rent sued for being due under a probative lease, which was admitted, decree should have been given for the full sum sued for, with expenses. The Sheriff-substitute must either have treated the case as one, not for rent, but for damages, or made a deduction in respect of an alleged breach of agreement as to re-letting the house. If he had done the first, the judgment was incompetent;¹ if he had done the second, the appeal should be sustained on the ground of deviation from statutory form.

Argued for the respondent;—The appeal was incompetent, because the grounds did not amount to malice and oppression, or to deviation from statutory form. The decree did not bear to be for damages, and must be taken to be for rent. If decree was given for a smaller amount of rent than was sued for, that was not oppression.² Refusal of expenses was always in the discretion of the Court, and did not form a ground of appeal.³ The Sheriff-substitute had obviously applied his mind to the case, and decided it on its merits, and the soundness of his decision was not within the jurisdiction of the Court of Justiciary.⁴ If the Sheriff-substitute had erred, it was an error in law, and that was not a ground of appeal.

LORD ARDWALL.—I think this appeal ought to be sustained on the ground of incompetency and deviation from statutory form in the Court below. This is an action for rent, and in the first place decree is not given for the rent sued for, but decree is given for the sum of £5, which can be nothing else than damages, how arrived at does not appear, but the sum has no relation of any kind or description to what is sued for, the action being one solely for rent due under a formal stamped missive. That being so, I think

¹ Beale & M'Tavish v. Singer Manufacturing Co., Nov. 17, 1905, 8 F. (J.) 29, 4 Adam, 673.

² Wilson v. Scott, Nov. 21, 1890, 18 R. 233.

³ Renfrew v. Hall, Nov. 26, 1901, 4 F. (J.) 27, 3 Adam, 517.

⁴ Sprott v. Portpatrick and Wigtownshire Joint Committee, May 18, 1898, 25 R. (J.) 71.

May 8, 1908. Mair's Trustees v. Miller. the judgment is incompetent, because it decerns for something totally different in nature and amount from that which is sued for. I think that is quite sufficient for the decision of the case; but it is said for the respondent that the Sheriff-substitute having applied his mind to the question Lord Ardwall. held that there was an agreement between the parties that the appellants here should do their best to let the house, and that the Sheriff was convinced that agreement had not been implemented by the appellants, and it is explained that he arrived at the £5 by deducting from the rent a sum as damages for breach of agreement. Now, I can only say that if that is what the Sheriff did it was incompetent, and constituted a deviation from statutory form, because any such claim for damages should have been set forth in the proceedings as prescribed by section 11 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, as a counter claim. I therefore think that there being no counter claim, no other course was open to the Sheriff-substitute but either to throw out the summons altogether, or else to grant decree for the sum sued for.

I accordingly propose that we sustain the appeal, recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and remit to him to grant decree for the sum sued for with expenses.

LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, remitted to him to grant decree for the sum sued for with expenses, and found the appellants entitled to expenses, modified to five guineas.

BROWN, MAIR, GEMMILL, & HISLOP, Writers, Glasgow—BOYD, AULD, & MACKENZIE, Writers, Glasgow—Agents.

No. 20.

NORMAN MACLEOD ALLAN, Appellant.—D.-F. Campbell—D. P. Fleming.

June 18, 1908.

GEORGE NEILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of the Central Police Court, Glasgow), Respondent.—T. B. Morison, K.C.—A. Crawford.

Allan v. Neilson.

Statutory Offences—Breach of Regulations—"Public Show"—Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.), sec. 7.—A saloon or arcade, which opened directly off a public street, contained a number of automatic machines operated by placing a penny in the slot. Most of the machines exhibited pictures or produced music by phonographic records; a few told fortunes, gave electric shocks, or recorded weight or strength. The doors were always open during business hours, and admission was free.

Held that the entertainment was a "public show" within the meaning of section 7 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

NORMAN MACLEOD ALLAN, 43 Kier Street, Pollokshields, Glasgow, was charged in the Central Police Court at Glasgow, on a complaint setting forth that "he did, on Sunday, the fifth day of January 1908, in premises on the ground floor at 28 Argyle Street, Glasgow, open and use for exhibition to, and entertainment of, a large number of persons then admitted thereto, a public show or entertainment called an Automatic Vaudeville, and consisting of automatic peep-shows, moving figures, phonographs, fortune-telling machines, and other apparatus of entertainment of the like kind, in contravention of the regulations and prohibitions lawfully made by the Magistrates' Committee of the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, in and annexed to the permission June 18, 1908. granted by them to him on the 30th day of July 1907, for said Automatic Vaudeville, particularly No. 1 of said regulations and prohibitions, being an offence contrary to the Glasgow Police Acts, particularly the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 7, whereby the accused is liable to a penalty." *

—
Allan v.
Neilson.

On that complaint he was tried before a magistrate and found guilty of the offence charged.

He obtained a case, which set forth the following facts, inter alia, as proved:—

"The premises libelled in the complaint occupied by the appellant are situated on the ground floor at 28 Argyle Street, Glasgow, and consist of a saloon or arcade opening directly off Argyle Street. The folding-doors, 20 feet broad, are shut only when the premises are closed. The premises are used by the appellant for keeping a number of automatic machines, exhibiting pictures, and reproducing music by phonographic records on the penny-in-the-slot principle as hereinafter more particularly detailed. Admission to the premises is free.

"On 20th July 1907 the appellant applied to the Magistrates' Committee of the Corporation of the City of Glasgow for permission to open and set up a public show or other place of entertainment on the premises libelled. In this application the said premises were described as 'An automatic Vaudeville or Arcade exhibiting coin-freed and entertainment machines, such as phonographs, &c.' After due inquiry the Magistrates' Committee, on 30th July 1907, granted said permission to the appellant under the regulations and prohibitions which are annexed thereto and printed on the back of

* The Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.), enacts:—

Sec. 7. "No public show of any description whatever, whether in open ground, or in any house, or building, or caravan, or tent, and no swings, switchback railways or hobby-horses, and no shooting gallery, singing or dancing-saloon, or bowling or nine-pin alley, and no place for playing skittles (all which are hereinafter referred to as public shows or other places of entertainment), shall be opened or set up without the permission of the Magistrates' Committee; and the Magistrates' Committee may regulate, restrain, remove, or prohibit all such shows or other places of entertainment, and make regulations and prohibitions for that purpose, and if any person shall open or set up, or be concerned in opening or setting up, any such public show or place of entertainment without the permission of the Magistrates' Committee, or shall contravene any such regulation or prohibition, every such person shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding Five pounds, and also to a daily penalty of Five pounds."

Sec. 9. "The Magistrates' Committee may from time to time make bye-laws and regulations for the safety and comfort of the public, and for maintaining order in theatres or other places of amusement, public shows, or other places of entertainment, and billiard-rooms or bagatelle-rooms, for which the Magistrates' Committee are empowered to grant licences under the preceding sections of this Act, and they may provide in such bye-laws for the safety and comfort of the public, for the suppression of disorderly conduct, for the prevention or regulation of smoking, for regulating the times at and during which the same may severally remain open, and for prohibiting the opening thereof on Sundays; and any person contravening any of those bye-laws and regulations shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds."

June 18, 1908. said permission. The first of these regulations and prohibitions is—‘That the said Exhibition shall not be opened or used on Sundays.’

—
Allan v.
Neilson.

“Some months after this the appellant formed the opinion that his said premises did not require a licence or permission under the Act owing to their not being a public show, and that he was not therefore bound to obey the regulations and prohibitions referred to. On the date libelled, Sunday 5th January 1908, on being visited by officers of the Glasgow police, who gave evidence in Court, the premises referred to were found open, and a large number of persons frequenting the same. On that day there were in the premises:—

“54 picture machines, some of which are of the kind known as mutoscopes, and others of the moveable stereoscopic pattern.

“50 phonographs.

“10 combined phonographs and picture machines.

“3 fortune-telling machines.

“2 electric batteries.

“3 strength-testing machines.

“1 weighing machine.

“Each of these was put in use by the insertion of a coin in the slot, and the public or persons present were using one or more of the same. In the mutoscopes there were shewn animated pictures displaying incidents in action, and in each of the other picture machines several fixed stereoscopic pictures were shewn in succession. In all the picture machines the picture is viewed through a peep-hole in which there is set a magnifying lens. In the phonographs the sounds reproduced included songs, recitations, and pieces of instrumental music. The pictures exhibited were only visible to, and the phonographs heard by, the individual customers in each case. On all the phonographs bills or advertisements were fixed announcing that duplicates of the records could be purchased from the cashier if required. None of these were sold on the date libelled. On previous dates a number had been sold. They are kept on the basement flat of the premises. Appellant himself stated that his drawings substantially consisted of the coins put in the slots, but that he hoped the business of selling records would increase and ultimately become the leading source of revenue.”

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) Was the complaint relevant? (2) Did the automatic machines, as used by the appellant, constitute the said Automatic Vaudeville a public show within the meaning of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 7?”

Argued for the appellant;—The entertainment was not a “public show.” A “public show,” in the ordinary signification of the term, meant an exhibition which the public went into and saw collectively, having first paid their entry money at the door. Here, looking to the character of many of the machines, it was difficult to see how there was a “show” at all, but at anyrate it was not “public,” because each individual paid a penny for a private view of a particular picture, or a private performance of a particular tune. The place, accordingly, was a shop where for a penny one could purchase the particular form of entertainment desired. Further, the expression “public show” in section 7 must be read, according to the ejusdem generis rule, as qualified or limited by the examples given, and from them it was quite apparent that the entertainment in question did not fall within the section.¹ In any event, the condition prohibiting Sunday opening was ultra vires. Such a condition could only be imposed by bye-law under section 9,² and subject to the various provisions as to bye-laws regarding ratification, &c., imposed by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866,³ and incorporated with the Act of 1892. Allan v. Neilson.

Argued for the respondent;—The entertainment was a “public show” within the meaning of section 7.⁴ The public were admitted, paid money, and saw, heard, or got something in return. The fact that the money was not taken at the door, but was put into machines, was immaterial. The condition as to Sunday closing was not ultra vires. The Magistrates had the right to make such a regulation under section 7. Probably they might have attained the same end by passing a bye-law under section 9, but it was not obligatory upon them to do so. A bye-law under section 9 was appropriate in the case of permanent institutions such as theatres and music halls, but not in the case of a temporary show.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The alleged show in this case consists of premises in a public street, the front wall of the premises on the street level having been entirely taken out, so that the entrance consists of the whole width of the building. Inside there are a number of cabinets in which are pictures, also phonographs, either with or without direct communication with the pictures. There are also fortune-telling machines, electric machines, strength-testing machines, and a weighing machine. Admission to the place is free, and the gain to be made is by the pennies which visitors may put in the slots of the machines, in order to cause them to work. In all the picture cabinets the pictures are seen through lenses set in front of the case. The proprietors have placards on the premises that duplicates of the phonograph records can be purchased.

Now, it is plain that the place is one to which the public are invited to come, in the hope that they will bring a profit to the proprietor, by the money which they will expend in order to see the exhibits, and hear the phonograph music. His expectation is to make money by their being tempted to put their pennies into the slots, and so to get entertainment from him. It is quite true that if members of the public do not feel tempted after they get in to pay their pence to get entertainment, they can leave without any payment being exacted. If an entrance fee was exacted it could not be disputed that the proprietor would be carrying on a show. But he provides for those who choose to pay a show in his premises, which are opened for no other purpose than to give show entertainment to those who will pay for it. It is not like a shopkeeper holding a bazaar in his premises at Christmas time. That is an adjunct of the ordinary shop business of selling to buyers, and is for the purpose of stimulating sales. This place is open solely to induce people to pay for entertainment to eye and ear. Any person who came in and stayed there without taking any

¹ Walker v. Lamb, Feb. 16, 1892, 3 White, 194, 19 R. (J.) 50; Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes (4th ed.), p. 494.

² Rossi v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Nov. 21, 1904, 7 F. (H. L.) 85.

³ 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii., secs. 405 to 413.

⁴ Patrick v. Wood, Nov. 15, 1905, 4 Adam, 648, 8 F. (J.) 4.

June 18, 1908. entertainment could be required to leave. They were free to enter, but only free to occupy if they took entertainment and paid for it. Otherwise they had no right to remain. I do not think that the question is at all affected by the fact that those who are pleased with any of the entertainments can purchase duplicates of the records from which the entertainment was got. In many shows the drawings may be increased by sales of books of words, or souvenirs, or portraits of performers. But that is an adjunct of the entertainment, and does not affect the question whether the place is carried on as a show or place of entertainment.

Allan v.
Neilson.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

In these circumstances the Magistrate held as matter of fact that the appellant's premises are carried on as a place of show or public entertainment, and must obtain a licence, and conform to the regulations prescribed by the licence, and that the appellant is liable to a penalty for carrying it on without a licence. I am unable to see that the decision can be impugned upon any legal ground. The place is public. It is used to supply entertainment for payment to all members of the public who choose to come there and make payments. That the entertainments are obtained by putting pennies in slots does not seem to me to make it a wrong decision in law to declare the place to be a place of "public entertainment." If the owner himself took the pence it would undoubtedly be a show. That the pence are deposited so as to set the machine to work cannot make any difference.

I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD LOW.—I have had the advantage of reading and considering your Lordship's opinion, and I entirely concur.

LORD ARDWALL.—I have felt some difficulty about this case, but on consideration I am of opinion that both the questions put should be answered in the affirmative. I think, on the whole, that the appellant's exhibition falls within the category of a "public show" within the meaning of section 7 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892. It is of some importance to notice that the appellant himself formerly considered that his exhibition fell within the description of a "public show," that it certainly partakes more of the character of a "show" than of a shop, and that the name by which the appellant designated it in his application for a licence on 24th July 1907, viz., "an Automatic Vaudeville," is more appropriate to a show than to a shop, while the appellant's advertisement card bears the warning, which is common to places where "public shows" are going on, "beware of pickpockets." Last of all, I may observe that in a case of this description great weight must always be given to the opinion of the local magistrate, who must be presumed to have knowledge and information regarding the nature of the exhibition which are not available to this Court. And on that account I should not think of disturbing his decision except for much stronger reasons than any that have been presented to us by the appellant in this case. I therefore concur in the course proposed by your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT answered the questions of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

ANDREW H. HOGG, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM SWEENIE AND OTHERS, Complainers.—MacRobert.
 GEORGE HART (Procurator-Fiscal, Paisley), Respondent.—
Sol.-Gen. Ure—A. M. Anderson, A.-D.

No. 21.

June 18, 1908.

Review—Suspension—Sentence—Illegal Sentence—Detention in Reformatory—Restriction of Sentence—Competency—Reformatory Schools Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 1.—Three boys, all fifteen years of age, were each sentenced to be detained for four years in a reformatory, the effect of this sentence being that the period of detention would not expire until after the time at which the offenders would attain the age of nineteen years, which is contrary to sec. 1 of the Reformatory Schools Act, 1893. The offenders having brought a suspension, counsel for the Crown did not oppose the quashing of the sentence. Sweeney v. Hart.

The Court quashed the conviction and sentence as ultra vires and illegal.

Observations on the distinction between a sentence of imprisonment and a sentence of detention in a reformatory school.

Observed that there might be circumstances in which the Court would, instead of quashing a sentence of detention, reduce the period of detention so as to make it conform to the statute.

On 23d March 1908 William Sweeney, Daniel Fulton, and Daniel Hampsey were charged in the Sheriff Court at Paisley at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal with the crime of theft, aggravated by previous conviction. They pleaded guilty. The Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) on 23d March 1908, in respect of their judicial confession, found them guilty of the crime charged, aggravated as charged, and further in respect that they were all “under the age of sixteen years, and” appeared “to the Court to be not less than twelve years of age.” Sweeney “having been born, so far as has been ascertained, on the 21st day of June 1892,” Fulton “having been born, so far as has been ascertained, on the 8th day of August 1892,” and Hampsey “having been born, so far as has been ascertained, on the 20th day of June 1892, in pursuance of the Reformatory Schools Acts, 1866 and 1893,” * sentenced Sweeney and Fulton “to be sent to the Kibble Reformatory School for Boys, Paisley, . . . and to be there detained for the period of four years each, commencing from 23d March 1908,” and sentenced Hampsey “to be sent to the Roman Catholic Reformatory School for Boys, Parkhead, Glasgow, . . . and to be there detained for the period of four years . . . commencing from” 23d March 1908. HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

Sweeney, Fulton, and Hampsey, with the special advice and consent of their respective fathers, as their curators and administrators-in-law, brought a bill of suspension and liberation.

The complainers averred that their dates of birth were as stated in

* The Reformatory Schools Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 48), enacts:—

Sec. 1. “Where a youthful offender, who in the opinion of the Court before whom he is charged is less than sixteen years of age, is convicted . . . and either (a) appears to the Court to be not less than twelve years of age; or (b) is proved to have been previously convicted of an offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, the Court may, in addition to or in lieu of sentencing him according to law to any punishment, order that he be sent to a certified reformatory school, and be there detained for a period of not less than three and not more than five years, so, however, that the period is such as will in the opinion of the Court expire at or before the time at which the offender will attain the age of nineteen years.”

June 18, 1908. the sentences above narrated; set forth section 1 of the Reformatory Schools Act, 1893; and further averred as follows:—(Stat. 4) “. . . The said warrants or sentences complained of bear to have been pronounced and were pronounced in pursuance of the section quoted.” (Stat. 5) “The sentences of the complainers will not have expired at or before the time at which they will respectively attain the age of nineteen years. The ages of the complainers were known to the Sheriff-substitute, and this appears in gremio of the warrants or sentences complained of. The said warrants or sentences are accordingly ultra vires and illegal.”

Sweeney v.
Hart.

The complainers pleaded;—The said warrants or sentences complained of being ultra vires and illegal . . . ought to be suspended as craved, with expenses.

Argued for the complainers;—The sentence was plainly illegal and contrary to the statute.¹ The only course open to the Court was to quash it. The Court could not competently amend or restrict the sentence so as to make it legal.²

Counsel for the Crown appeared, but stated that they did not oppose the complainers' motion for quashing the conviction and sentence.

At advising on 18th June 1908,—

LORD LOW.—It is a well-settled rule that where a sentence of imprisonment is for an illegal period it must be quashed, and cannot be modified by limiting it to a period which the law allows. In this case, although the boys who seek to have the sentence which has been passed upon them suspended have not been sentenced to imprisonment in the ordinary sense, they have been sentenced to be detained in a reformatory school for a period of years, and it was argued that there was no substantial difference between such a sentence and an ordinary sentence of imprisonment, the determining element of deprivation of personal liberty being equally present in both cases.

I am not prepared altogether to adopt that view. Reformatory schools have been established not only or mainly as a method of punishment, but for the better care and reformation of youthful offenders. That being so, I think that it would be very unfortunate if this Court could not correct a mere error of calculation in regard to the period for which a youthful offender could lawfully be sentenced to detention in a reformatory school. But assuming that the Court has the power to modify such a sentence so as to bring it within the limits allowed by law, I think that this power should not be lightly exercised, but should be confined to cases in which the Court is satisfied that it is in the public interests, and still more in the interests of the offenders, that the sentence should be carried out so far as the law allows. In this case we know nothing except that an illegal sentence has been pronounced. Counsel for the Crown were present at the hearing of the case, but they did not intervene in the discussion, but intimated that they were instructed not to oppose the application. I think that we must assume that the Crown authorities had good grounds for adopting that June 18, 1908. course, and accordingly I am of opinion that in this case the Court should ^{Sweeney v.} treat the sentence as if it were an ordinary sentence imposing an unautho-^{Hart.} rised penalty, and should quash it.

¹ Reformatory Schools Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 1.

² Dingwall v. Davidson, 1896, 2 Adam, 80, 23 R. (J.) 31; Moffat v. Shaw, 1896, 2 Adam, 57, 23 R. (J.) 18; Macleod v. Mackenzie, 1901, 3 Adam, 507, 4 F. (J.) 13; Macbeath v. Fraser, 1886, 1 White, 286, 14 R. (J.) 16; Stewart v. M'Niven, 1891, 2 White, 627, 18 R. (J.) 36; Bonthron v. Renton, 1886, 1 White, 279.

LORD ARDWALL and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT suspended the conviction and order of detention complained of simpliciter, and ordained the complainers to be instantly liberated.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—W. S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

MAXWELL TELFORD, Appellant.—Cooper, K.C.—Lippe.

No. 22.

PETER FYFE, Complainer (under Sale of Foods and Drugs Acts), Respondent.—Morison, A.-D.—M. P. Fraser—Crawford.

July 16, 1908.

Public Health—Food and Drugs—Summary Procedure—Conviction—Competency—Delivery of milk in several cans—Deficiency of quality in each can—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), secs. 6, 13—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 3.—Samples having been taken from fourteen out of sixteen cans of milk in course of delivery in one consignment, and all the samples having been found deficient in quality, the consignor was charged with and convicted of fourteen offences under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Held that, there having been only one delivery, it was incompetent to charge and convict of more than one offence.

Telford v.
Fyfe.

Conviction—Competency—Form—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 18, Schedule K, No. 6, sec. 34.—A conviction in form No. 6 of Schedule K of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, granted warrant to arrest all debts and sums of money owing to the accused, and to poind his goods and sell the same, and appointed a return of such poinding and sale to be made “within eight days from the expiration of the period hereby allowed for payment.” No period was allowed for payment, the interlocutor ordaining instant execution.

Opinion that the conviction was not incompetent as being impossible of execution.

Public Health—Food and Drugs—Milk in course of delivery—Fair sample—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 3.—A consignment of milk was delivered in sixteen cans which were cylindrical in shape and about two feet deep. Each can was taken into a store-room by the consignor’s servant, where it was opened by him. An inspector of nuisances then agitated the milk in the can with a wooden spoon about a foot in length, and a sample was taken by dipping a measure into the milk just under the surface and removing about fourteen ounces. Samples were thus taken from fourteen of the cans. The milk in the cans was on delivery poured into a large vat in the storeroom.

Opinion that the method of sampling was not unfair or improper, and that it afforded a fair test of the contents of each can; and, further, that it would have been incompetent to take a sample after delivery into the vat, the milk being then no longer in course of delivery.

A COMPLAINT under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, brought in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow at the instance of the respondent, Peter Fyfe, set forth:—

High Court.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

“That the complainer has been appointed by the Corporation of the City of Glasgow (Police Department), being the Local Authority

Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

July 16, 1908. for Glasgow under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, to enforce the said Acts.

Telford v.
Fyfe.

“ That the complainer caused the analysis to be made, of which the certificates are hereto annexed, and from which it appears that the following offences have been committed against the said Acts :—

“ (1) That Maxwell Telford, dairyman, Nos. 87 and 89 Crown Street, Glasgow, in pursuance of a contract of sale whereby the said Maxwell Telford contracted to sell, inter alia, sweet milk, pure, new, as milked from the cow, and without addition of water, preservative, or any foreign substance, the sweet milk to contain not less than 3% (three per cent) of butter fat, to the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow and the Glasgow Lunacy District Board, which contract of sale was constituted by a tender made by the respondent on or about 23d March 1907 to said Parish Council and Lunacy Board, and duly accepted by them, did, on the 10th day of February 1908, forward as sweet milk, under said contract, 10 gallons of milk, in a 10-gallon tin, to the Stobhill Hospital, Springburn, Glasgow: That William Denovan, ordinary sanitary inspector or police-constable, Glasgow, did, on behalf of the complainer, and under the direction of the said Local Authority, procure on said date at said Stobhill Hospital, Springburn aforesaid, being the place of delivery of said 10 gallons of milk, and in course of the delivery of the same, a sample (No. 37) of the said milk for the purposes of the said Acts: That the said William Denovan, suspecting said milk to have been sold contrary to the provisions of the said Acts, did, on the instructions and behalf of the complainer, submit said sample to be analysed: And that said sample has, on analysis as prescribed by the said Acts, been found not to be of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, in respect that the said contract demanded pure, new, sweet milk, and that said sample was not genuine pure, new, sweet milk, but was deficient in its natural fat to the extent of 7 per cent or thereby.” [The complaint libelled thirteen other charges in reference to thirteen other tins in similar terms, and proceeded] “ contrary to the sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, particularly the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6,* and the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, section 3,† and the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901,

* The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, enacts :—

Sec. 6. “ No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds. . . . ”

Sec. 13. “ Any . . . inspector of nuisances . . . under the direction and at the cost of the Local Authority appointing such . . . inspector . . . or charged with the execution of this Act, may procure any sample of food or drugs, and if he suspect the same to have been sold to him contrary to any provision of this Act, shall submit the same to be analysed by the analyst of the district or place for which he acts . . . and such analyst . . . shall analyse the same. . . . ”

† The Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, enacts :—

Sec. 3. “ Any . . . inspector of nuisances . . . may procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee, in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee of such milk; and such . . . inspector . . . if he suspect the same to have been sold contrary to any of the provisions of the principal Act, shall submit the same to be analysed, and the same section 1, to the same effect as if the said respondent had, place and date above libelled, sold said samples, and as if the same had been purchased by the said William Denovan for the complainer, to his prejudice: Whereby the said Maxwell Telford, for each of said fourteen offences, being first offences, is liable to pay a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds. May it therefore please your Lordship to cite the said Maxwell Telford to appear before you to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to convict him of each of the foresaid offences, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Acts.”

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) convicted him of each of the offences charged, and pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—“Glasgow, 4th May 1908.—The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, convicts the said Maxwell Telford of each of the offences charged, and therefore adjudges him to forfeit and pay the sum of £28, being £2 of penalty for each offence, and ordains instant execution by arrestment, and also execution by poinding: Grants warrant to officers of Court to arrest all debts and sums of money owing to the said Maxwell Telford, and to poind his goods and effects, and to sell the same at the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding, without further notice or warrant, and appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within eight days from the expiration of the period hereby allowed for payment, under certification of imprisonment for ten days in default of payment or recovery of the said sum, with the expenses of diligence, before the time allowed for such report; and appoints the Clerk of Court in the event of said penalty being paid to him to account for and pay the same to the treasurer of the police assessment of the burgh of Glasgow.”

Maxwell Telford appealed by stated case, in which the facts found at the trial and the Sheriff-substitute's findings thereon were set forth as follows:—

“By contract, dated 10th April 1907, being No. 1 of process, the appellant undertook to supply the Parish Council of Glasgow and the Glasgow Lunacy District Board for Stobhill Hospital, with ‘sweet milk, pure, new, as milked from the cow, and without addition of water, preservative, or any foreign substance,’ for the year from 16th May 1907 to 1908, ‘deliveries to be made daily in such quantities as may be required at the different institutions, not later than 7 A.M. The sweet milk to contain not less than 3% (three per cent) of butter fat.’ The amount required for each day was ordered the day previous.

“On Monday, 10th February 1908, the appellant's servant in supplying such an order arrived with 16 ten-gallon tins of milk at the hospital about 6.40 A.M. He was requested to wait until the arrival of the Food and Drugs Inspectors, who came about 6.50 A.M. On their arrival each tin was lifted by the appellant's lorryman into the store, where it was opened by him. One of the inspectors then agitated the milk in the can by stirring it with a wooden spoon of about a foot in length, the can itself being about two feet in depth shall be analysed, and proceedings shall be taken and penalties on conviction be enforced in like manner in all respects as if such . . . inspector . . . had purchased the same from the seller or consignor under section 13 of the principal Act.”

July 16, 1908.

Telford v.
Fyfe.

and cylindrical. The precise nature of the stirring and its duration were not established. The other inspector then dipped a handless tin measure of 4 to 6 inches in depth into the milk until just under the surface, and removed about 14 oz. of milk. This was divided into three parts as required by the Act, and the analysis of the samples shew that in the case of the fourteen tins on which proceedings were taken the deficiencies in natural fat were:—No. 67, 7 per cent; No. 65, 7 per cent; No. 63, 5 per cent; No. 61, 8 per cent; No. 59, 15 per cent; No. 57, 5 per cent; No. 51, 10 per cent; No. 49, 5 per cent; No. 47, 5 per cent; No. 45, 7 per cent; No. 43, 5 per cent; No. 41, 5 per cent; No. 39, 6 per cent; No. 37, 7 per cent.

“According to the usual practice of the appellant’s business the milk from which the supply in question should have been taken was supplied to him from some twenty-three different farmers. The milk came to Telford, the appellant, with a line like No. 1 of appellant’s productions. This milk arriving at appellant’s premises on Saturday was poured into large vats there. On Sunday forenoon it was pasteurised, cooled to about 45 degrees, and then poured into the tins for the hospital. On Monday it was driven some two or three miles through the streets of Glasgow to the hospital.

“The appellant when pressed for supplies of sweet milk, as he was at this season, sometimes made it up by mixing separated milk and cream, but he gave orders that the milk for the hospital was not to be obtained in this way, but only from the supplies as sent in by the farmers. No evidence was led, apart from the said general practice, as to how the milk in question had been handled, or from whom it was obtained.

“The usual method of giving delivery was that the appellant’s lorryman emptied the cans into one large vat in the storeroom at the Stobhill Hospital.

“After the milk was poured into the cans on Sunday the cream would rise to the top, but this tendency would be retarded to some extent by the previous pasteurisation. The driving through the streets would tend to redistribute the cream through the milk, while the stoppage at the hospital would allow it to a small extent again to rise. On the whole, however, the treatment the milk received prior to the time that it was stirred by the inspector would result in a marked accumulation of cream at the top.

“Stirring the milk in the can with a stick would drive the cream from the centre to the sides of the can, and if a dipper were inserted in the centre of the vortex immediately after a regular and prolonged stirring, it would abstract milk less rich in cream than it would have done if no stirring had taken place. I held that it was not shewn that the stirring to which the milk was subjected reduced the part from which the sample was taken to a condition more devoid of fat than if the fat in the tin had been equally distributed throughout the whole contents of the tin. I therefore held that the method of sampling adopted was not unfair or prejudicial to the appellant.”

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) Was a proper method of sampling adopted, so as to ensure a fair sample of the contents of each can? (2) The milk in course of delivery on the date in question being contained in sixteen cans, was the respondent entitled to take a sample from each can, so as to competently sue for a separate penalty in respect of individual cans? (3) Should the whole bulk of the consignment of 10th April have been sampled after delivery into the vat at the storeroom in Stobhill Hospital? (4) July 16, 1908.

Was the form of conviction competent?"

Argued for appellant;—(1) The method adopted for sampling the milk was unfair. There was only one consignment, and any sample taken ought to have been a sample of the whole consignment. No sample was taken from two of the cans. There might be a deficiency of butter fat in some cans in a consignment, and no deficiency in the whole consignment.¹ In order to get a fair sample of the consignment, it was necessary to sample the whole and to sample it as a whole. To stir with a stick and take some milk out of some cans without mixing the milk in the cans and without mixing the samples was unfair. There ought to have been one sample, and it ought to have been taken from the whole milk after it was mixed in the vat. A fair sample was not even taken from each can, because only the milk at the top of each can was agitated. (2) It was incompetent to charge fourteen offences in respect of one delivery of milk. The statute only required that the delivery should be in accordance with contract, but there could be only one offence in respect of one delivery. The case of Fecitt v. Walsh,² which the Sheriff-substitute had followed, was wrong, and was not binding on him. It was based on an inaccurate analogy between the procurement of a sample by an inspector of nuisances and a purchase under section 13 of the 1875 Act. The decision ignored the terms of the contract under which delivery was made. It was not a contract for delivery of so many cans, but of a certain quantity of milk. (3) The conviction was bad, because it was not in proper form. It appointed something to be done within eight days from the expiration of a period allowed, and no period had been allowed. This was not mere surplusage, and it was not such a defect in form as might, under section 34 of the Summary Procedure Act, be disregarded. It was intrinsically bad, because it could not be worked out.

Telford v.
Fyfe.

Argued for respondent;—(1) The method of sampling adopted was fair and reasonable. A fair sample was taken from fourteen cans, and each was found to be deficient. To mix these samples would not have cured the deficiency. No question could now be raised as to the method of taking the sample, because the fairness or unfairness of the method adopted was a question of fact for the Sheriff-substitute. He had found that the method adopted was in fact a fair method. The method suggested by the appellant, to take a sample from the vat after the whole had been poured into it, could not have been followed, because the milk would no longer have been in course of delivery.³ The point in *Crawford v. Harding*⁴ was that when the samples of milk from all the receptacles had been mixed, there was no deficiency in quality. (2) The Sheriff-substitute was right in following Fecitt v. Walsh.² The scheme of the statutes was to enable the inspector to take a sample from any receptacle in which the milk was being delivered, and to prosecute in respect of that sample. Section 3 of the 1879 Act used the words "any sample of any milk." It was in respect of the deficiency in the sample that the prosecution was brought. If fourteen samples were separately and fairly taken,

¹ Crawford v. Harding, Nov. 20, 1906, 1907, S. C. (J.) 11, 5 Adam, 184.

² L. R., [1891] 2 Q. B. 304.

³ Semple v. Dunbar, July 20, 1904, 6 F. (J.) 65, 4 Adam, 399.

⁴ Nov. 20, 1906, 1907 S. C. (J.) 11, 5 Adam, 184.

July 16, 1908

Telford v.
Fyfe.

each from different milk, it was competent to libel fourteen offences. The terms of the contract were of no moment; the offence did not depend on the contract. By the statutes each procurement of a sample by the inspector was made equivalent to a purchase, and he might prosecute for each as for each purchase. In *Semple v. Dunbar*¹ different samples were taken, but there was only one offence charged, because only one sample was deficient. The offence related to the deficient sample as to a purchase which was not of the proper quality. It was, at anyrate, desirable that statutes which applied to the United Kingdom should be similarly construed in the several countries.² (3) Section 34 of the Summary Procedure Act* enacted that no conviction was to be quashed for want of form, and that section applied here. At the most it was a case of want of form. There was not even a surplusage of words, because the conviction had to be read as if the word "instantly" occurred after "adjudges him to forfeit and pay." That word was implied, and, if that were so, the reference to the time allowed was not inaccurate, and did not render the conviction incapable of execution.

LORD ARDWALL.—With regard to question 1, I am of opinion that on the facts stated the method of sampling adopted was, so far as circumstances permitted, not an unfair or improper method of sampling, and practically afforded a fair sample of the contents of each can. But I think that seeing the sale was of the whole 160 gallons of milk, the samples ought to have been mixed before being analysed.

With regard to question 3, I was at the discussion much impressed by the argument in favour of answering it in the affirmative, but having regard to the terms of section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, I have come to the opinion that it would not be competent to adopt the method of sampling there set forth, and that for the reason that the only power conferred on the inspector, or other person charged with the execution of the Act, is that he "may procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee of such milk." Now, it appears to me that after the consignment of milk had been delivered into the vats it was too late for the inspector to exercise his powers, because the milk was no longer in course of delivery, but had been delivered, and that into a receptacle belonging to the purchaser, for the condition of which the seller could not be held responsible. But this technical difficulty might possibly have been got over by the inspector taking possession of the cans, pouring them into a vat obtained by him for the purpose at the hospital, and taking his sample out of the whole bulk of the milk.

The important question in this case is raised by the second question of law, and upon that question I am of opinion that while the respondent was entitled to take a sample from each can, yet it was not competent for him to sue for a separate penalty in respect of each individual can. The sale and

¹ July 20, 1904, 6 F. (J.) 65, 4 Adam, 399.

² Morton v. Fyfe, Nov. 2, 1896, 24 R. (J.) 9, 2 Adam, 174.

* The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, enacts:—

Sec. 34. "No conviction . . . in pursuance of this Act shall be quashed for want of form. . . ."

delivery of the whole of the milk in question on the day libelled was one July 16, 1908. transaction and one act, and in my opinion it was wholly incompetent to sue for a separate penalty in respect of each and any portion of the milk so sold. Such a proceeding might be carried on indefinitely according to the size and number of the vessels in which any sale of milk in bulk happened to be contained, and what was really one act of infringement of the Food and Drugs Act would by this means be converted into as many acts as there were vessels, which seems to me to be absurd.

Telford v.

Fyfe.

Lord Ardwall.

With all respect to the learned Judges who decided the case of Fecitt v. Walsh,¹ I cannot concur in the decision they gave. The fallacy, I think, is apparent from the opinion of Mr Justice Day, for he says—"Acting under the provisions of the Acts of 1875 and 1879, a constable procured, as there provided, several samples of milk. In each case of procurement he acted as purchaser, and the appellant as seller." Proceeding upon this he holds that there might be a prosecution in respect of each sample taken. I consider that this is not a sound interpretation of the Acts, and arises from mixing up section 3 of the 1879 Act with section 13 of the 1875 Act. Under section 13 it is provided that an inspector "may procure any sample of food or drugs, and if he suspects the same to have been sold to him contrary to any provision of this Act" shall take the proceedings thereafter narrated.

It is quite clear that this applies to purchases made by inspectors for the purpose of procuring samples of foods or drugs. But section 3 of the Act of 1879 is in wholly different terms. Not a word is said about selling to or buying by an inspector. On the contrary, it only authorises him to procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser, who plainly is not the inspector himself, and although it provides that proceedings shall be taken and penalties enforced in like manner as if the inspector had purchased the sample himself, yet that does not assimilate his taking as many samples as he might think necessary to the case of a number of purchases made by him from ordinary retail sellers of foods. It is noticeable that apparently the Act contemplates not many samples, but one sample of milk in a case of this description.

Accordingly I am of opinion that though, perhaps, for the sake of testing the milk it might be lawful for an inspector to take several samples, yet the wording of section 3 of the Act plainly shews that it never contemplated the delivery of adulterated milk at the same time and place and under the same contract as anything else than one and not many offences against the statute. To hold anything else would be to put it in the power of any inspector to multiply unnecessarily and unjustly prosecutions for what was one and the same act.

I am accordingly of opinion that we should answer this question as I have suggested, and quash the conviction.

With regard to the fourth question on which we heard a discussion, I am of opinion that the form of conviction being taken from the Schedule of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, although it contains some surplus-

¹ [1891] 2 Q. B. 304.

July 16, 1908. age, is protected in so far as it does so by the provisions of section 34 of the same Act.
 Telford v. Fyfe.

LORD LOW.—I concur.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree, and only desire to add one word, as the judgment proposed is not in accordance with a decision in England which was quoted to us. I fully recognise the general principle that it is desirable that the interpretation of an Act of Parliament applying to the whole kingdom should, where possible, be uniform, and that principle should not be departed from unless the case be strong for doing so. In this case the grounds for declining to accept as a ruling decision the case quoted to us are irresistible. The judgment of Mr Justice Day seems to me to be quite erroneous, on the grounds stated by Lord Ardwall.

THE COURT answered the second question in the negative, and the fourth in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the remaining questions.

ERSKINE DODS & RHIND, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 23.

HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—

W. Thomson, A.-D.—Lyon Mackenzie.

July 16, 1908.

BENJAMIN JACOB, Respondent.—Hunter, K.C.—R. S. Horne.

H. M. Advocate v. Jacob.

Trade Marks—Trade Description—"Scotch Tweed, All Wool"—Applying Description—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), secs. 2 (2), 3 (1), 5 (1) (d).—The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, enacts—Sec. 2 (1). "Every person who (a) forges a trade-mark; (b) falsely applies to goods any trade-mark . . . (d) applies any false trade description to goods . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, and unless he proves" no intent to defraud "be guilty of an offence . . ."

Sec. 2 (2). "Every person who sells, or exposes for or has in his possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things to which any forged trade-mark or false trade description is applied, or to which any trade-mark or mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark as to be calculated to deceive is falsely applied, as the case may be, shall, unless he proves" that he acted innocently, "be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Sec. 3 (1). "The expression 'trade description' means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect . . . (d) as to the material of which any goods are composed . . ."

Sec. 5 (1). "A person shall be deemed to apply a . . . trade description to goods who . . . (d) uses a trade description in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connection with which it is used are designated or described by that . . . trade description."

A tailor, having received a letter from a person who stated that he wanted "a suit of Scotch tweeds," and asked for "patterns of good stuff—all wool," sent certain patterns of cloth, some of which were Scotch tweed all wool and some of which were not, enclosed in a letter, which stated—"Enclosed please find patterns as desired." The customer chose two patterns, and from the cloth chosen, to which they referred, the tailor made him a suit of clothes. The cloth did not conform to the description "Scotch Tweed, All Wool," as defined by the trade.

Held that, even assuming that sec. 2 (2) applies to a false trade description not affixed to the goods by a stamp or label, no false description had been "applied" by the seller in this case.

Question whether the application of sec. 2 (2) is not limited to cases where a person sells, or exposes for or has in his possession for sale, goods on which a false description is stamped or attached by label. July 16, 1908.

See H. M. Advocate v. Suits, Limited, S. C., 1908, p. 1163.

H. M. Advocate v. Jacob.

A COMPLAINT at the instance of the Lord Advocate on behalf of the Board of Trade set forth:—"That Benjamin Jacob, trading under the firm of The Great London Clothiers Company, 11 Trongate, Glasgow, did, between 17th November and 19th December 1907, in his warehouse at 11 Trongate, Glasgow, sell to Thomas Steven, clerk, 39 Fort Street, Ayr, a suit of clothes to which the false trade description 'Scotch Tweeds, All Wool' was applied, contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887,* and particularly section 2, subsection (2), whereby the said Benjamin Jacob, trading as The Great London Clothiers Company, is guilty of an offence against said Act."

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Low.
Lord Ardwall.

At the trial on the complaint in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow Benjamin Jacob pleaded not guilty. Proof was led, and thereafter the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) assolzied him from the complaint. The Lord Advocate appealed, and a case was stated.

* The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, enacts:—

Sec. 2 (1). "Every person who

"(a) forges a trade-mark;

"(b) falsely applies to goods any trade-mark; . . .

"(d) applies any false trade description to goods . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, and unless he proves" no intent to defraud, "be guilty of an offence . . ."

Sec. 2 (2). "Every person who sells, or exposes for or has in his possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things to which any forged trade-mark or false trade description is applied, or to which any trade-mark or mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark as to be calculated to deceive is falsely applied, as the case may be, shall, unless he proves—

"(a) that having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this Act, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark, mark, or trade description;

"(b) that on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things; or

"(c) that otherwise he had acted innocently;

be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Sec. 3 (1). "The expression 'trade description' means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect,

"(d) as to the material of which any goods are composed, and the use of any figure, word, or mark, which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act.

"The expression 'false trade description' means a trade description which is false in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied.

"The expression 'goods' means anything which is the subject of trade, manufacture, or merchandise."

Sec. 5 (1). "A person shall be deemed to apply a . . . trade description to goods who

"(d) uses a . . . trade description in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connection with which it is used are designated or described by that . . . trade description."

July 16, 1908. The stated case set forth that at the proof the following facts were established:—

H. M. Advocate v. Jacob.

"The communications between the parties were conducted entirely by writing. Throughout the whole proceedings Steven was acting at the instigation and under the direction of the Procurator-fiscal at Ayr. The respondent knew nothing of the matter personally, the transaction on his side being conducted by his servants.

"On 18th November 1907 Steven wrote to respondent:—'I want a suit of Scotch tweeds, and have been referred to you. I suppose you can give me directions for self-measurement, so that I would not require to go into Glasgow. Would you please send me patterns of good stuff—all wool—as I wish a suit that will wear well. If I order a suit I will pay cash on delivery. P.S.—Please state prices.'

"On 20th November 1907 respondent replied:—'Enclosed please find patterns as desired. Trusting some of them will suit.' These enclosures consisted partly of patterns which were Scotch tweed all wool, and partly of pieces which were not. There were no markings on the patterns except the prices.

"On 27th November 1907 Steven replied:—'I duly received yours of 20th, sending patterns of Scotch tweed as asked for in my letter of 18th.

"'I have fixed on the two patterns enclosed. I want jacket and vest of one pattern and trousers of the other.

"'Enclosed measurement form filled up. Please send suit soon.'

"The patterns selected were those which, upon examination, appeared to Steven and his advisers not to be Scotch tweed all wool. The suit afterwards supplied was made out of a cloth of which the patterns sent were portions, the jacket and vest being made out of one kind and the trousers of another.

"On 5th December 1907 respondent wrote:—'We have put your suit in hands, and expect to have it finished by the end of this week. We will forward it on to you on receipt of postal order for the amount.'

"On 6th December 1907 Steven wrote:—'I have yours of 5th. If you send me now an account for the suit I will remit the amount.'

"On 9th December respondent sent this account:—'Suit to order, £2, 7s. 6d.'

"On 10th December Steven wrote:—'I enclose post-office order for £2, 7s. 6d. in payment of suit. Please send on suit with receipted account.'

"The suit was sent, and on 18th December 1907 Steven wrote:—'The suit I ordered from you has come to hand. You have, however, omitted to send me a receipt for the price. I therefore enclose a form of receipt, which please sign and return.'

"The enclosed form was:—'Received from Mr Thomas Steven, Fort Street, Ayr, Two pounds 7/6 in payment of suit of all wool Scotch Tweeds supplied.'

" Penny

" Stamp.

"On 19th December 1907 the respondent wrote:—'Enclosed please find a receipt as desired. Trust that this suit was all right for you.' The receipt granted bore:—'Suit to order, £2, 7s. 6d. By cash, £2, 7s. 6d.' The form sent by Steven was returned in the same letter unsigned.

"The expression 'Scotch Tweed,' as defined by the trade, requires that the material of which it is composed should be spun and woven in Scotland, and be all wool. This does not exclude a small proportion, about 2 per cent, of silk or mercerised cotton, introduced for decorative purposes. The expression 'all wool' is used in the trade to describe an article composed wholly of wool, subject to the same exception as to the presence of a small proportion of foreign matter.

July 16, 1908.
H. M. Advocate v. Jacob.

"The jacket, vest, and trousers supplied to Steven were made of material consisting of cotton to the extent respectively of 21·14 per cent, 21·20 per cent, and 16·66 per cent. The cotton was not introduced for decorative purposes, but made up part of the fabric."

The case stated that the Sheriff-substitute found on the above facts "that (1) 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' was a trade description; (2) the suit supplied was not Scotch tweed all wool; (3) it was not proved that the respondent sold to Steven a suit to which the trade description 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' was applied within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, section 2, subsection (2)."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were, inter alia, as follows:—"(1) Did the respondent sell to Steven a suit to which the trade description 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' was applied within the meaning of and contrary to section 2, subsection (2), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887? (2) Was the trade description 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' applied to the suit sold by the respondent to Steven, within the meaning of section 2, subsection (2), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887?"

Argued for the appellant;—The facts found were sufficient for a conviction, and the Sheriff-substitute was bound on these facts to convict. The accused had applied a false trade description, and had sold goods to which a false trade description was applied. He was asked for patterns of Scotch tweed all wool, and he supplied patterns "as desired." He sold a suit made of cloth to which he had applied a false trade description. The words "as desired" were the important words; they were an averment that the cloth was what had been asked for, viz., Scotch Tweed—All Wool. What was meant by applying a false trade description was in this case defined by section 5 (1) (d). If it were said that the trade description was applied by Steven, that application was indorsed by the accused in the words "as desired," and in any case he used the trade description as described in section 5 (1) (d). All the requisites for conviction were present.¹ It was not necessary that the application should be in writing; but, if necessary, it was in writing here. Physical attachment to the goods was not required.² There was nothing in section 2, subsection (2), to limit its application to cases where the trade description was attached to or stamped on the goods; and such a contention received no countenance from the English cases quoted. The accused had not acted innocently in the sense of the statute.³

Argued for the respondent;—The complaint was brought under a wrong subsection. Section 2 (1) referred to a person himself applying a false trade description to goods. Section 2 (2) referred to a person selling goods to which someone else had applied a false trade descrip-

¹ Burns v. Turner, Dec. 17, 1897, 25 R. (J.) 38, 2 Adam, 450.

² Cameron v. Wiggins, L. R., [1901] 1 Q. B. 1; Coppen v. Moore (No. 1), L. R., [1898] 2 Q. B. 300; Turnbull v. H. M. Advocate, March 20, 1908, supra, p. 47, 5 Adam, 498; Budd v. Lucas, L. R., [1891] 1 Q. B. 408; Fowler v. Cripps, L. R., [1906] 1 K. B. 16.

³ Christie, Manson, & Woods v. Cooper, L. R., [1900] 2 Q. B. 522.

July 16, 1908. H. M. Advocate v. Jacob. tion. And section 5 (1) (d) had no application to the present case, because that subsection referred only to cases where the accused used a trade description affixed to the goods. In the present case the accused had not applied any trade description to the goods at all. If there had been an application of a trade description it had been by Steven; but there had been no application even by him. He merely sent a letter which was ambiguous in its terms. It did not clearly and unambiguously specify goods falling under the trade description of Scotch Tweed All Wool. The letter sent in reply did not profess to supply goods only of that description. Further, in the case of a "trap" order such as this the Court would scrutinise the purchaser's actings with great care, and would not convict unless the accused had himself applied a false trade description in circumstances which rendered his guilt manifest.¹ The refusal of the accused to sign the receipt which Steven had sent to him amounted to an assertion on his part that the tweed was not of the description stated therein. In previous cases there had always been a trade description in writing by the accused, but that was wanting in this case. Writing was essential to a conviction under this subsection, and it must be unequivocally referable to the goods in question.²

LORD LOW.—The complaint against the appellant is that he sold to one Thomas Steven "a suit of clothes to which the false trade description 'Scotch Tweed, All Wool' was applied, contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and particularly section 2, subsection (2)."

Section 2 (2) of the Act provides that every person who sells any goods to which a false trade description is applied shall be guilty of an offence against the Act, and by section 5 (1) it is provided that a person shall be deemed to apply a trade description to goods who (d) uses a trade description in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connection with which it is used are described by that trade description.

It was argued with much force that the latter enactment is not applicable to cases falling under section 2 (2). My impression is that that argument is not well founded, but I do not think that it is necessary to express any decided opinion on the point, because the Sheriff-substitute rightly assoilzied the respondent, even assuming that a false trade description may be applied to goods within the meaning of section 2 (2) if it be used in connection with those goods in a manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods are described by that trade description.

In the first place, as matter of fact, there was no trade description of any kind used by the respondent or any of his servants in regard to the suit of clothes, which was the only thing which was sold to Steven. But it is said that a false trade description—Scotch Tweed, all wool—was impliedly used in connection with the material of which the suit was made. What happened was this:—Steven wrote to the respondent saying that he wanted a suit of Scotch tweeds, and had been referred to the respondent. He then asked for directions for self-measurement, so that he would not require July 16, 1908. to go to Glasgow, and then he continued,—“Would you please send me patterns of good stuff—all wool—as I wish a suit that will wear well.”

¹ Carr & Sons v. Crisp & Co., Limited, July 17, 1902, 19 Rep. Pat. Cas. 497; Ripley v. Griffiths, Nov. 4, 1902, 19 Rep. Pat. Cas. 590; H. P. Truefitt, Limited, v. Ednie, Feb. 13, 1903, 2 Pat. Cas. 321.

² Coppen v. Moore (No. 1) cit. supra; Langley v. Bombay Tea Co., L. R., [1908] 2 K. B. 460.

H. M. Advocate v. Jacob.

In reference to that letter someone in the respondent's employment sent to Steven a number of patterns of tweeds, some of them being “Scotch Tweed, all wool,” and some of them being goods which did not answer to that description, because they contained a considerable percentage of silk or mercerised cotton. Along with the patterns a note was sent in these terms:—“Enclosed please find patterns as desired. Trusting some of them will suit.”

Lord Low.

Now I think that Steven's letter, if carefully read, shewed clearly enough that what he wanted was a suit made of “Scotch Tweed, all wool,” and that what he asked to be sent to him were patterns of cloth of that description and no other. Further, I think that the note sent with the patterns—“please find patterns as desired”—may be read as meaning that the patterns asked for, and no other, were sent.

At the same time, Steven's letter did not state categorically that “Scotch Tweed, all wool” and nothing else, was the material of which the suit must be made, because “Scotch Tweed” is first mentioned, and then in a subsequent part of the letter the words “all wool” are introduced incidentally in a sentence in which the writer says that he wants good stuff, and a suit that will wear well. Now, when in answer to such a letter, a shop assistant sent not only patterns of “Scotch Tweed, all wool,” but also (for the purpose, it may be supposed, of giving Steven a greater variety to choose from) patterns of cloth which did not precisely answer that description, I do not think that in a question whether or not a statutory offence, involving large penalties, was committed, it can be held to be proved that the shop assistant applied to all the patterns sent the description “Scotch Tweed, all wool,” merely because he did not explain that some of them were not all wool, and simply said that he sent patterns as desired.

I am therefore of opinion that the appellant failed to prove his case, and that the Sheriff-substitute rightly assoilzied the respondent.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree with Lord Low with this difference, that I desire to reserve my opinion whether this complaint has been competently brought under section 2, subsection 2, of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. I think there is a great deal to be said for the contention that that subsection only deals with goods to which a trade description is applied in the primary sense of that term, viz., by being stamped on the goods, or affixed thereto by a label, because I notice that the subsection deals, inter alia, with goods in possession of the person, and the exceptions provided seem to me to refer to goods marked or labelled with a false trade description by some person other than the accused. I am disposed to think that this complaint should have been brought under section 2, subsection 1 (d), of the said Act, taken along with section 5, subsection 1 (d), of the same Act.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions in the negative.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1907-1908.

WINTER SESSION.

JOHN M'GREGOR, Petitioner.—A. A. Fraser. No. 1.
THE BALLACHULISH SLATE QUARRIES COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER, —
Respondents.—J. A. T. Robertson. Oct. 16, 1907.

Expenses—Taxation—Party and Party or Agent and Client—Company— M'Gregor v.
Liquidation—Petitioning Creditor's Expenses—"Expenses as taxed."—In a Ballachulish petition at the instance of a creditor for the compulsory winding-up of a Slate Quarries limited company, answers were lodged by the company, together with a Co., Limited.
note stating that the shareholders had resolved upon a voluntary winding-up, and had appointed a liquidator, and asking that the liquidation be continued under the supervision of the Court. The Court refused the petition for compulsory winding-up, pronounced a supervision order, and found the petitioner and the respondents entitled "to their expenses as these may be taxed by the Auditor."

Held, on the motion for approval of the Auditor's report, that under the above finding the petitioning creditor was entitled to have his expenses taxed as between agent and client.

On 13th August 1907 a petition was presented at the instance of 1st Division.
John M'Gregor, colliery agent, Dunblane, for the winding-up by the Court of the Ballachulish Slate Quarries Company, Limited, the petitioner stating that he was a creditor of the Company.

On 17th August answers were lodged by the Company and the liquidator appointed by the shareholders, in which it was stated that at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders held on 13th August it was resolved that the Company be wound up voluntarily, and a liquidator was appointed.

On the same date on which the answers were lodged, a note in the petition was lodged by the Company and the liquidator craving to have the voluntary winding-up of the Company continued subject to the supervision of the Court. They also presented a petition to the same effect. Answers to this note were lodged by the petitioning creditor on 23d August.

On 29th August parties were heard before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Kinnear), who, in M'Gregor's petition, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the petition and answers, together with the note and answers, orders that the voluntary winding-up of the Ballachulish Slate Quarries Company, Limited, resolved on at an extraordinary general meeting held on 13th August 1907, be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court, in

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1907-1908.

WINTER SESSION.

JOHN M'GREGOR, Petitioner.—A. A. Fraser.
THE BALLACHULISH SLATE QUARRIES COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—J. A. T. Robertson.
No. 1.
Oct. 16, 1907.

Expenses—Taxation—Party and Party or Agent and Client—Company— M'Gregor v. Ballachulish
Liquidation—Petitioning Creditor's Expenses—"Expenses as taxed."—In a Ballachulish
petition at the instance of a creditor for the compulsory winding-up of a Slate Quarries limited company, answers were lodged by the company, together with a Co., Limited.
note stating that the shareholders had resolved upon a voluntary winding-up, and had appointed a liquidator, and asking that the liquidation be continued under the supervision of the Court. The Court refused the petition for compulsory winding-up, pronounced a supervision order, and found the petitioner and the respondents entitled "to their expenses as these may be taxed by the Auditor."

Held, on the motion for approval of the Auditor's report, that under the above finding the petitioning creditor was entitled to have his expenses taxed as between agent and client.

ON 13th August 1907 a petition was presented at the instance of 1ST DIVISION.
John M'Gregor, colliery agent, Dunblane, for the winding-up by the Court of the Ballachulish Slate Quarries Company, Limited, the petitioner stating that he was a creditor of the Company.

On 17th August answers were lodged by the Company and the liquidator appointed by the shareholders, in which it was stated that at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders held on 13th August it was resolved that the Company be wound up voluntarily, and a liquidator was appointed.

On the same date on which the answers were lodged, a note in the petition was lodged by the Company and the liquidator craving to have the voluntary winding-up of the Company continued subject to the supervision of the Court. They also presented a petition to the same effect. Answers to this note were lodged by the petitioning creditor on 23d August.

On 29th August parties were heard before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Kinnear), who, in M'Gregor's petition, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the petition and answers, together with the note and answers, orders that the voluntary winding-up of the Ballachulish Slate Quarries Company, Limited, resolved on at an extraordinary general meeting held on 13th August 1907, be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court, in

Oct. 16, 1907. terms of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, as craved in said note, No. 9 of process: Refuses the prayer of the petition; and decerns: Finds the petitioner and the respondents entitled to their expenses as these may be taxed by the Auditor, to whom remits for taxation, and directs these expenses to be expenses in the liquidation."

M'Gregor v.
Ballachulish
Slate Quarries
Co., Limited.

The Lord Ordinary found it unnecessary to dispose of the Company's petition.

On the motion for approval of the Auditor's report on the petitioner's account of expenses, the respondents objected to the report in respect that the Auditor had taxed the petitioner's account as between agent and client, instead of as between party and party, and they specified the items which they maintained should have been disallowed.

Argued for the respondents;—When the Court intended that a party should get his expenses taxed as between agent and client, the interlocutor always contained an express statement to that effect.¹ In the present instance, as the interlocutor of 29th August contained no such statement, the petitioner was only entitled to his expenses taxed as between party and party.

Counsel for the petitioner was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the general case an award of expenses in such terms as the present would certainly mean that the scale of taxation was to be as between party and party. But I am informed by the Clerks of Court that in such cases as this the universal practice is to allow parties their expenses taxed as between agent and client. We shall communicate with the Auditor before giving our decision.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case in which a petition was presented for the compulsory winding-up of the Ballachulish Slate Quarries Company, Limited. Upon the same day as that petition was presented a meeting was held at which an extraordinary resolution was passed by which the Company was to be wound up voluntarily and a liquidator appointed, and the liquidator was directed to present a petition for the continuation of the voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the Court. These two petitions with cross answers which were lodged came to depend before Lord Kinnear, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, and his Lordship, after hearing parties, pronounced an order in the compulsory winding-up petition for the continuation of the voluntary winding-up subject to the supervision of the Court, refused the prayer, and found the petitioner and the liquidator entitled to expenses out of the estate.

That is a perfectly ordinary proceeding and the usual interlocutor, and the reason of it is of course plain enough, that even although the Court in its discretion may hold that the better form of winding-up is not a compulsory winding-up, but a winding-up under the supervision of the Court, the Court is still entitled, indeed bound in proper cases, to give the petitioner who comes into Court with a petition for compulsory winding-up his expenses, as having brought the matter into Court, the view being that the whole parties concerned have the benefit of his initial proceedings in the Oct. 16, 1907.

¹ Pattisons, Limited, v. Kinnear, Feb. 4, 1899, 1 F. 551, at p. 559; Elsmie & Son v. The Tomatin Spey District Distillery, Limited, Jan. 30, 1906, 8 F. 434, at p. 438.

liquidation which is then instituted.

Now, the expenses were taxed, and they were taxed by the Auditor upon the scale of agent and client, and the present question has arisen upon the objection taken by the liquidator that, inasmuch as the interlocutor does not in terms mention agent and client, the expenses ought to be taxed as between party and party. As to the general rule in ordinary actions upon this matter there can be no doubt. "Expenses" without any more being said means taxation upon the scale of party against party, and anyone who wishes taxation on another scale must take care that it is mentioned in the interlocutor. As to that there is no doubt. But upon inquiry there seems to be as little doubt as to the rule in the present case. The finding of expenses here really means taxation as between agent and client, because there is in the proper sense of the word no question of party against party. The petitioner here was not found entitled to expenses because he had been in any sense successful against his only opponent the liquidator. As a matter of fact so far from being successful he was really unsuccessful, because while he contended that the order should be for compulsory winding-up, the liquidator contended, and with success, that it should be a supervision order. He was not found entitled to expenses as having been the victor in a litigation against another party. He was found entitled to expenses because it was his petition that initiated the whole matter and really formed the true basis of the liquidation.

M'Gregor v.
Ballachulish
Slate Quarries
Co., Limited.
—
Ld. President.

Now, in this case the truth is there is no question of party against party to whom the rule is to apply. Accordingly I think the Auditor here has done according to the ordinary practice, and according to the right practice, in allowing this petitioner the expenses he has incurred so far as reasonable,—that is, his expenses taxed as between agent and client.

LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, and LORD PEARSON concurred.

THE COURT repelled the objection, &c.

WILLIAM CALDER, Solicitor—INGLIS, ORR, & BRUCE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN MACKENZIE BOW AND OTHERS (Ranken's Trustees),
First Parties.—Chree.

No. 2.

THOMAS RANKEN, Second Party.—Lyon Mackenzie.

Oct. 17, 1907.

ROBERT LIMOND RANKEN AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Cochran Patrick.

Ranken's
Trustees v.
Ranken.

Succession—Fee and Liferent—Mines and Minerals—Rent of mineral field opened after testator's death—Accumulations—Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Gen. III. cap. 98).—The proprietor of the estate of W., who died in 1848, by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to divide the annual income of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, among certain of his relatives, and their issue in succession, with further substitutions, and on the death of all these beneficiaries to convey the fee of his whole estates to the person who should then be the heir-male of his, the testator's, father.

The estate of W. contained coal, which down to the date of the testator's death had never been worked, and his trust-disposition and settlement did not contain any reference to coal.

Oct. 17, 1907. In 1907 the trustees let the coal in W. for a fixed rent or lordships. The mineral tenants did not at first begin operations for opening up the coal-field, and in consequence they paid the fixed rent to the trustees.

Ranken's Trustees v. Ranken.

In a special case, held (1) that the fixed rent or lordships, whether the coal was being worked or not, represented part of the corpus of the estate, and being thus capital and not income, did not fall to be paid to the beneficiaries in right of the income; (2) that for the same reason the Thellusson Act did not apply; and (3) that the fixed rent or lordships fell to be retained by the trustees for behoof of the person ultimately found to be entitled to a conveyance of the fee of the estate.

Campbell v. Campbell's Trustees, 10 R. (H. L.) 65, followed.

2D DIVISION. JAMES RANKEN, of Glenlogan and Whitehill, Ayrshire, died in 1848, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th December 1845, by which he conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and, inter alia, directed them to "divide the clear annual income of my whole estate before conveyed into ten equal shares, and that half-yearly as the same shall be realised" among certain of his brothers and sisters and their issue in succession, with further substitutions as therein specified, "and on the failure by death of all the parties to whom I have directed a share or shares of the income of my property to be paid, I direct my trustees to convey and pay over the fee of my whole property, heritable and moveable, to the person who shall on that event taking place be heir-male of George Ranken, of Whitehill, my father, and to his heirs and assignees whomsoever."

In March 1907 a special case was presented by (1) the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement, first parties; (2) Thomas Ranken, second party, who (as the case bore) "is at present heir-male of the said George Ranken of Whitehill. He is also heir-at-law of the testator. He is also . . . at present in receipt of certain shares of the income of the testator's estate"; and (3) Robert Limond Ranken and others, third parties, "the persons by whom the remaining shares of income are at present enjoyed."

The case set forth:—

"4. The trust-estate under the management of the first parties consists of two landed properties—Glenlogan and Whitehill—which are situated about fifteen miles apart. Both of these estates contain coal of considerable value. At the date of the testator's death the coal in the estate of Glenlogan was being worked, and it has continued to be worked ever since. The coal in the estate of Whitehill had not been worked or let before the testator's death. It was recently let by the first parties for a fixed rent of £200 or royalties, and the said fixed rent is now being paid to the first parties. The said coal has not yet been worked by the tenants. They are also tenants of an adjoining property, upon which they have a pit, through which they propose to work the coal in Whitehill. It is not expected, however, that they will begin to work said coal for a considerable time to come.

"5. In these circumstances a question has arisen as to the disposal of the mineral rents and lordships of Whitehill. The parties of the first and second part maintain that as the minerals of Whitehill had never been worked prior to the death of the testator, and as his trust-disposition and settlement contains no direction to work them, the rents and lordships payable therefor do not fall to be paid over to the parties entitled to the income. The parties of the first part maintain further that said rents and lordships, being the proceeds of the corpus of the estate, are in their nature capital, and fall to be retained by them with a view to being paid over to the person ultimately entitled to conveyance of the estate. The party of the second part further maintains that said shares of income derived from the rents and lordships payable in respect of the minerals of Whitehill are not disposed of by the testator in the circumstances which have occurred, and have fallen into intestacy, and that he, as heir-at-law of the testator for the time being, is meantime entitled thereto. The parties of the third part maintain that said mineral rents and lordships are income of the estate, and fall to be divided and paid over to them and the second party accordingly. Separatim, they contend that so long as the coal in Whitehill remains unworked they are entitled to the fixed rent paid by the tenants in respect of the tenancy of said minerals."

Oct. 17, 1907.

Ranken's
Trustees v.
Ranken.

The questions of law were:—"1. Are the mineral rents and lordships payable from Whitehill income of the trust, and do they fall to be paid over to the second and third parties accordingly? Or 2. Are said mineral rents payable to the second and third parties, as income of the trust, only so long as the said minerals are not worked? Or 3. Do said mineral rents and lordships form part of the corpus of the estate, and do they accordingly fall to be retained by the first parties for the purpose of being ultimately paid over to the person entitled to a conveyance of the estate? Or 4. Is the accumulation of said rents and lordships struck at by the Thellusson Act, and do they accordingly fall to be paid over in the meantime to the second party as possessing for the time the character of heir-at-law of the testator, and heir of George Ranken entitled to conveyance of the estate?"

Argued for the first parties;—Minerals were partes soli, and so-called mineral rent was not truly rent, but was the price paid for part of the corpus of the estate.¹ Mineral rents being thus capital, not income, mineral rents ought not, in strictness, to fall under an ordinary gift of the income of an estate. An exception was recognised in the case of minerals which had been worked in the lifetime of the testator; the rents of such minerals were carried by an ordinary gift of the income of the estate, but it was otherwise where the minerals had not been worked in the lifetime of the testator,² which was the case here with respect to the minerals of Whitehill. That estate was fifteen miles distant from Glenlogan, so that the minerals in the two estates could not be regarded as a unum quid. It made no difference that the minerals in Whitehill were not at present being worked, the fixed rent of £200 a year paid by the mineral tenants was capital, not income. That being so, the Thellusson Act³ did not apply, for it struck at the accumulation of income only. The fixed rents or lordships paid for the minerals in Whitehill ought to be retained by the first parties for behoof of the person ultimately entitled to a conveyance of the estate.

Argued for the second party;—(1) In any view, in accordance with the rule established in the case of Campbell,² the third parties were

¹ Gowans v. Christie, Feb. 14, 1873, 11 Macph. (H. L.) 1, per Lord Cairns, at p. 12.

² Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, March 15, 1882, 10 R. (H. L.) 65.

³ 39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98.

Oct. 18, 1907.

Don Francesco v. De Meo.

(Cond. 2) "For some time prior to June 1904 the defender carried on business in the premises now occupied by the pursuer, and the pursuer about that time entered into negotiations with the defender for the purchase of that business." (Ans. 2) "Admitted."

(Cond. 3) "On 13th June 1904 a verbal agreement was come to between the parties whereby the defender agreed to sell, and the pursuer agreed to purchase, the stock-in-trade, fittings, and goodwill of the said business at the price of £150 (the stock in trade and fittings being valued at £50, and the goodwill at £100), said price to be paid within two years by instalments of £2 per week during the summer months, and £1 or so per week during the winter season, the sum to be paid during the winter season being dependent on the income from the business, and in respect of said price the defender undertook not to compete with the pursuer in business in Peebles under a penalty of £150." (Ans. 3) "Admitted that defender agreed to sell on the date here mentioned the business as then carried on by him in shop at 25 Northgate, Peebles, including the whole moveable property therein, and pertaining thereto, to pursuer at the price of £150, which was subsequently paid in terms of the documents referred to in the following answer. Quoad ultra denied."

(Cond. 4) "Said verbal agreement was repeated in the presence of witnesses at a meeting between the parties in Edinburgh on 26th August 1904, and was reduced to writing and signed by the parties on that date before said witnesses. Both pursuer and defender are Italians, and the document was executed in the Italian language, and is herewith produced." * (Ans. 4) "Admitted that the pursuer and

* The pursuer lodged in process the following:—

"Translation by Pursuer of Document No. 3 of Process.

"Edinburgh, 26th August 1904.

"I, the undersigned, Onofrio De Meo, do agree to sell my shop to Francesco Don Francesco for £150, which is situated at 25 Northgate, Peebles, such sum must be paid by instalments as follows:—That in two years' time Francesco Benigno will pay to Onofrio De Meo two pounds each week during the summer season and one pound or so each week during the winter season, according to the income of business. The said shop was handed over to Francesco Don Francesco on 13th June 1904, the vendor to receive full payment in two years' time from that date.

"I, Onofrio De Meo, bind myself not to serve in any other ice-cream shop in Peebles, and should I do so, Francesco Don Francesco is entitled to all the money he paid to me for said property. We leave the following space for anything to be added to the above contract.

Stamp 6d.

"ONOFRIO DE MEO.

"FRANCESCO DON FRANCESCO.

"BORDONE ACHILLE, testimone.

"PASQUALO MARANDOLA.

"ALPHONSO VETRAINIO."

"Translation by Pursuer of Document No. 6 of Process.

"Edinburgh, the day 26 August 1904.

"I here undersigned Francesco Donfrancesco myself declare of being debtor with Mr Onofrio Demeo for the sum of £ sterling 150. Say One hundred and fifty paid £ sterling 42 say pounds for having bought one of his shop situated at No. 25 Northgate, Peebles.

"I Francesco Donfrancesco have the full responsibility of paying the said Onofrio Demeo the said sum of £ sterling 2 say two in the summer defender are both Italians, and that on 26th August 1904 they reduced the terms of the sale and purchase of said business to writing in their own language as after explained. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the agreement between the parties was contained in two documents each signed by them, one containing an offer or agreement by defender to sell said business to pursuer for £150 on certain conditions as regards payment of the purchase price, which was delivered to pursuer, and the other containing an acknowledgment by pursuer that he had bought said business (the signing by him of the first mentioned document being held by the parties as an acceptance by him of said offer), and agreeing to fulfil the defender's conditions under certain penalties therein expressed, if incurred, which was delivered to the defender, said two documents together forming the contract of sale between the parties and shewing exactly its terms. A copy of said last mentioned document with English translation thereof interlined in red is herewith produced and referred to. Further explained and averred that said first mentioned document did not contain the last paragraph appearing in the writing No. 3 of process, lodged by pursuer, the accurate translation of which into English is:—'I, Onofrio De Meo, bind myself not to serve in any other ice-cream shop in Peebles, and if I do so the party is entitled to all the money paid. This space remains for anything to be put afterwards.'"

Oct. 18, 1907.
Don Francesco v. De Meo.

(Cond. 5) "Notwithstanding the obligation undertaken by defender and contained in said agreement of sale, the defender did, in or about the month of June 1906, open premises at No. 34 High Street, Peebles, under the name of N. De Meo, where he still continues to carry on business for the sale of confectionery and ice-cream contrary to the terms of said agreement." (Ans. 5) "Admitted that defender in the month of June 1906 commenced and still carries on the business of a confectioner and ice-cream merchant at 34 High Street, Peebles. Quoad ultra denied."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Said writing, forming No. 3 of process, being insufficiently stamped in terms of law, pursuer ought to be called upon to implement the provision contained in the Stamp Act of 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39), sec. 14, anent the production of insufficiently stamped deeds in judicial proceedings, and failing such implement the action should be dismissed, with expenses.*

months from 15 May to 15 November 1905 in the winter at one pounds per week or what I am able to. I Donfrancesco myself guarantee to pay all the sum for £50 sterling from 13 June 1904 to 13 June 1906 say June nineteen six and every time I pay the said Onofrio above the sum of two pounds he is obliged to put on a stamp.

"Refusing to pay the said sum the way written the said Onofrio he can retake the present shop and satisfy me with what the law will allow.

"If the Donfrancesco does not pay the witness have no responsibility or interest in the consequence.

Stamp 6d.

"FRANCESCO DONFRANCESCO DI DEMENICO.

"Accetto ONOFRIO DEMEO.

"BORDONE ACHILLE, testimone.

"PASQUALO MARNANDOLA.

"ALPHONSO VETRAINO.

Testimoni."

* The Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39), enacts:—

Sec. 14. "(1) Upon the production of an instrument chargeable with any

Oct. 18, 1907.

Don Francisco v. De Meo.

On 27th December 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Orphoot) granted decree against the defender for payment of £150, with interest.

On 18th January 1907 the Sheriff (Maconochie) on appeal pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has failed to set forth any relevant defence to the action: Therefore dismisses the appeal, and of new grants decree against the defender, ordaining him to pay to the pursuer the sum sued for, with interest as craved."

The defender appealed, and argued;—No. 3 of process ought to have been stamped with an ad valorem stamp. It was not a mere agreement. It was an agreement for the sale, within the meaning of section 59, subsection (1), of the Stamp Act, 1891, of the goodwill of the defender's business, and it required to be stamped as such.¹ Until it had been stamped it could not be received in evidence.²

Argued for the pursuer;—The sale of the defender's business to the pursuer took place on 13th June; the defender admitted that in Ans. 3. The document No. 3 of process, which was dated 26th August, was a mere memorandum of an already concluded contract, which had been in part implemented. In any view, No. 3 of process did not require a stamp, for it was at the most an offer of which No. 6 of process was the acceptance, and the proper place for the stamp was the acceptance. It might be that the acceptance No. 6 of duty as evidence in any Court of civil judicature in any part of the United Kingdom, or before any arbitrator or referee, notice shall be taken by the Judge, arbitrator, or referee of any omission or insufficiency of the stamp thereon, and if the instrument is one which may legally be stamped after the execution thereof, it may, on payment to the officer of the Court whose duty it is to read the instrument, or to the arbitrator or referee, of the amount of the unpaid duty, and the penalty payable on stamping the same, and of a further sum of £1, be received in evidence, saving all just exceptions on other grounds."

"(4) Save as aforesaid, an instrument executed in any part of the United Kingdom, or relating, wheresoever executed, to any property situate, or to any matter or thing done or to be done, in any part of the United Kingdom, shall not, except in criminal proceedings, be given in evidence, or be available for any purpose whatever, unless it is duly stamped in accordance with the law in force at the time when it was first executed."

Sec. 54. "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'conveyance on sale,' includes every instrument . . . whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser, or any other person on his behalf or by his direction."

Sec. 59. "(1) Any contract or agreement . . . made in Scotland, with or without any clause of registration, for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, or for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares, or merchandise, or stock, or marketable securities, or any ship or vessel, or part interest, share, or property of or in any ship or vessel, shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty, to be paid by the purchaser, as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold."

¹ Potter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1854, 10 Excheq. (Hur. & Gord.) 147; Benjamin Brooke, Limited, v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R., [1896] 2 Q. B. 356; West London Syndicate, Limited, v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, L. R., [1898] 2 Q. B. 507.

² Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 14.

process was insufficiently stamped, but it was not necessary to look at No. 6 of process, because the defender admitted that his offer had been accepted. In the English cases on which the defender founded the goodwill was specifically conveyed; there was nothing of that kind here. Oct. 18, 1907
Don Francisco v. De Meo.

At advising,—

LORD ARDWALL.—This action arises out of the sale of an ice-cream business by the defender to the pursuer, and the pursuer asks that the defender should be ordained to pay a sum of £150 sterling, being the penalty agreed to be paid in case of the defender breaking his agreement not to carry on business in any other ice-cream shop in Peebles.

The defender states as a preliminary objection to the document founded on by the pursuer that it is not properly stamped, inasmuch as it is stamped only with a sixpenny agreement stamp and not with an ad valorem stamp, as provided for by section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, and the section of the Stamp Act founded on as excluding the document from the cognisance of the Court is section 14, subsection (1), of the said Stamp Act, which provides that notice shall be taken by Judges “of any omission or insufficiency of the stamp” on any instrument produced as evidence. Now, this is not a provision compelling Judges to raise test cases or try doubtful questions regarding the stamping of instruments. I think that they are only bound to intervene to protect the Revenue where there is an undoubted case of insufficient stamping or an attempted evasion of the Stamp Act. Now, in my opinion there is no such case here. The document in question was stamped with a sixpenny stamp, which is the proper and appropriate stamp for any ordinary agreement; but it is pleaded for the defender that this document was not only an agreement, but was an agreement for the conveyance and sale of the stock and fittings and goodwill of the shop mentioned in the document. In my opinion this is far from being clear, for the document itself sets forth, and it is matter of common ground on the record, that the agreement for the sale of the business was, as set forth in Cond. 3 and answer thereto, a verbal agreement, and was concluded on 13th June 1904, and on the same date the shop was handed over to the pursuer, the price of the business being then also fixed at £150. This being so, it appears to me that so far as the sale of the business was concerned, No. 3 of process was not the instrument under which that sale took place, although it refers to and recites the sale, but was merely an agreement (1) as to the mode of payment of the price, and (2) as to the obligation on the defender not to carry on another similar business in Peebles under penalty of paying back all the money paid for the business; and it falls to be observed that it is only as evidence of the second point that the document is now produced, and for that purpose undoubtedly it is sufficiently stamped.

I accordingly think that this is not a case in which there is any duty on the Court to order this document to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp either proprio motu or on the motion of one of the parties.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD LOW concurred.

Oct. 18, 1907. but as regards the merits I have no doubt. In using a drift net or in using a net as a drift net the defender was plainly acting contrary to the interdict whether interim or perpetual.

Home

Drummond v. M'Lachlan.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

There remains, however, the question whether the judgment can stand notwithstanding the fact that the interlocutor which declared the interdict perpetual was pronounced in a process which had fallen asleep. At the time at which the Sheriff disposed of the case I think he was probably right and could not have considered the regularity of the former decree, but we are in a different position, for we have the former process before us and can see that it had gone to sleep. That being so, it is, I think, safer to revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. But it was strongly pleaded that the interim interdict was no longer standing, because it had been brought to an end by the fact that the defenders had lodged answers, and in support of this the opinion of Lord President Inglis—then Lord Justice-Clerk—in *Hamilton v. Allan*¹ was referred to. Now, to read the opinion of Lord President Inglis in that way is to make it inconsistent with itself, and it must, moreover, be considered as having some relation to practice. There is no practice which suggests that the lodging of answers can take away the effect of a judgment of a competent Court. On the contrary, the practice is that, where interim interdict has been granted de plano, the Lord Ordinary after answers have been lodged and parties heard either passes the note to try the question and continues the interim interdict or refuses the note and recalls the interdict. Now, either to continue or to recall an interdict that has previously come to an end is impossible.

I see that the late Mr Antonio, who had, of course, great experience in such matters, gives in his book the procedure as—"Intimation ordered and interim interdict granted. Answers lodged and parties heard. Note passed and interdict continued." The practice without doubt being so, and commending itself to common sense, it follows that an interdict is not set aside merely because answers are lodged. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the interim interdict was standing at the time of the fishing in question.

I think we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff and revert to that of the Sheriff-substitute both as to his findings in fact and in law.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the merits, the evidence appears to me to be perfectly clear and to justify the interlocutors of the learned Sheriffs. The only matter of any difficulty in the case arises in consequence of certain dicta of the late Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of Hamilton v. Allan.¹ I cannot help thinking that the report incorrectly sets forth what the learned Lord Justice-Clerk really said. The main question in that case was as to whether an interim interdict granted in the Bill-Chamber upon presentation of the note and before answers were lodged, continued in force notwithstanding that the action had been allowed to go to sleep, and it seems to have been argued on behalf of the respondent that it would be a great hardship to him to have an interim interdict

¹ 23 D. at p. 591.

one or more of them, for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in any part of the river or estuary of the Forth, with the nets known as drift nets or hang' nets, or from placing or setting nets of that description in any part of the said river or estuary; (2) that on said 18th August 1902 interim interdict as craved was granted; (3) that appearance was entered and defences lodged by the respondent; (4) that said interim interdict has not been recalled; (5) that on 17th July 1906 the respondent fished for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in the River Forth between Kelliebank, North Alloa, and Alloa Inch, in the parish of Alloa and county of Clackmannan, with a drift or hang net in the manner interdicted: Therefore finds that the respondent has broken the interim interdict granted on 18th August 1902: Fines," &c.

Oct. 18, 1907.
Home
Drummond v.
M'Lachlan.

On appeal the Sheriff (Lees) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuses the appeal, but recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 28th November 1906: Finds in fact (1) that on 18th August 1902 interim interdict was granted in this Court prohibiting the defender from fishing for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in any part of the river or estuary of the Forth with the nets known as drift nets or hang nets, or from placing or setting nets of that description in any part of the said river or estuary, and that on 21st October 1903 perpetual interdict to this effect was thereafter granted; and (2) that on 17th July 1906 the defender in breach of this interdict fished for salmon or fish of the salmon kind in the River Forth within this county with a net which he and those with him used in the manner forbidden by said interdict: Finds in law that the defender has in these circumstances been guilty of a contempt of the authority of this Court: Therefore fines," &c.*

The defender appealed, and argued;—(1) As no step had been taken in the action for interdict between 3d October 1902 and 7th October 1903, the process had fallen asleep,¹ and consequently the interlocutor of 21st October 1903 declaring the interdict to be perpetual was inept, and breach of it could not be complained of.² (2) Neither could breach of the interim interdict granted on 18th August 1902 be complained of, for that interdict fell ipso facto when the defences were put in.³

The undernoted authorities were cited by the pursuers at the hearing.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case stands in a somewhat peculiar position,

* "NOTE.—It is not doubtful that the defender disobeyed the interdict that was granted. But it was urged that the final decree of interdict was incompetent—that the cause had fallen asleep. I am afraid I cannot enter on any question of this kind. This is not the process in which to impugn the regularity of the former decree. I must assume it to be good. . . ."

¹ Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 49.

² Clark v. Stirling, June 14, 1839, 1 D. 955, per Lord Cockburn at p. 984.

³ Hamilton v. Allan, Feb. 16, 1861, 23 D. 589, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 591.

⁴ Neil v. M'Nair, June 7, 1901, 3 F. (J. C.) 85; Clippens Oil Co., Limited, v. Edinburgh and District Water Trust, March 20, 1906, 8 F. 731; Henderson v. M'Lellan, May 23, 1874, 1 R. 920.

Oct. 18, 1907. answers is the proceeding which gives him a locus standi to discuss the question and to get rid of the interim interdict.

Home
Drummond v. M'Lachlan. I am unable to doubt that that is what the Lord Justice-Clerk meant, and I am confirmed in this opinion by what fell from the present Lord

Lord Ardwall. President in the Clippens Oil Company's case.¹ He points out that the practice in the Bill-Chamber as to the subsistence of interim interdicts was always the same as we now understand it, although procedure by note has been substituted for procedure by bill. Further, in an excellent work by the late Mr Antonio, Clerk of the Bills, on the practice of the Bill-Chamber, it is set forth as the usual procedure that on the note being passed the interim interdict is continued. That implies that at the time when the note is passed there is a subsisting interdict, because it would be absurd and futile to issue an interlocutor continuing an interdict if the interdict had fallen the moment answers were lodged, for in that case there would be no existing interdict capable of being continued. Accordingly I have no doubt that when interim interdict has once been granted, it subsists until it is recalled by a competent Court or Judge.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and recalled the interlocutor appealed against; found in fact in terms of the five findings in fact in the interlocutor of 28th November 1906; found that the defender had broken the interim interdict granted on 18th August 1902, and remitted to the Sheriff to fine the defender and to proceed thereafter as accords.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—LINDSAY COOK & DICKSON, Solicitors—Agents.

No. 5.

THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents),—Hunter, K.C.—Macmillan.

Oct. 18, 1907.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Clyde, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

Railway—Siding—Renewal of Siding—Identity of Subject—Running Powers—Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865 (28 and 29 Vict. cap. clxvii.), sec. 15.—The Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, conferred on certain railway companies running powers over the sidings of the railways vested by the Act in the Caledonian Railway, “constructed at the time of the commencement of this Act, or any renewals thereof.”

Circumstances connected with the construction of a siding, in which held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall) that the siding in question was a renewal of a siding in existence at the commencement of the Act.

1st Division.
Lord Ardwall.

By the Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865 (28 and 29 Vict. cap. clxvii.), sec. 15, it was provided that, inter alios, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and the Monkland Railway Company “may so run over and use all or any of the stations, sidings, or branches” of the railways vested by the Act in the Caledonian Railway Company "constructed at the time of the commencement of this Act, or Oct. 18, 1907. any renewals thereof," on payment of certain tolls.

This action was raised at the instance of the North British Railway Company (who had acquired the rights conferred by the Act on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company and the Monkland Railway Company), and of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, against the Caledonian Railway Company, for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to run over and use a siding situated on the defenders' branch line to the Terminus Quay, Glasgow, and running therefrom into the bonded store belonging to Slater, Roger, & Company, Limited, on payment of the tolls specified in the Act.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

The following history of the siding is taken substantially from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—In 1857 the General Terminus and Glasgow Harbour Railway Company entered into a feu-contract with William Sim, by which they conveyed to him the steading of ground subsequently occupied by the bonded store belonging to Slater, Roger, & Company, and referred to in the summons, and obliged themselves to lay suitable rails from the existing branch of their railway to the boundary line of the piece of ground conveyed. At the date of the passing of the Amalgamation Act in 1865 the siding had been constructed, and ran along the southern boundary of the ground, terminating at its western extremity. It formed a branch siding from another siding leading from the General Terminus branch to Vermont Street, and known as the Vermont Street Siding. The siding admittedly belonged to one of the railways vested by the Act in the Caledonian Railway Company, and was accordingly one to which the provisions of sec. 15 applied.

The steading of ground was disposed of by Mr Sim to a Mr Robson, and by him to Messrs Slater, Roger, & Company. In Mr Sim's time it was occupied as a granite work, and the siding to it came to be called the "Granite Siding." It was subsequently leased by him to the Birkenshaw Coal Company, who used it as a coal depot, and who in 1895 arranged with the Caledonian Railway Company that the Granite Siding, instead of being carried along the southern boundary of the ground, should enter it at its south-east corner, and similarly that what was before the Vermont Street siding should be carried into the steading at its south-west corner, both branches being prolonged for some distance into the depot, and the extended portions of the siding being laid by the Birkenshaw Coal Company. In the course of these operations a considerable difference was made in the direction of the Granite Siding, and the rails were taken up for some length and relaid in a different position. The occupancy of the Birkenshaw Coal Company ceased in 1901, when they took up and removed the rails of both branches of the sidings so far as belonging to them, the effect of which was to remove the sidings altogether for a short distance to the south of the steading of ground.

On the acquisition of the ground by Messrs Slater, Roger, & Company they erected a bonded warehouse, and applied to the Caledonian Railway Company for siding accommodation, and the Company laid down the siding now in dispute, which differed from the original Granite Siding in the following respects—it was laid in a different position and direction, the divergence being 10 feet at the widest point; it was on a different level, being about 5 feet lower at the point where it entered the steading of ground; instead of running along the southern boundary of the ground it entered into it at the south-east corner, and ran for

Oct. 18, 1907. a considerable distance through it, and the Vermont Street branch of the siding was removed, the approach being by a single line of rails.
 North British Railway Co. The pursuers or their predecessors exercised running powers over
 v. Caledonian Railway Co. the siding in virtue of the Act at least from 1879 until the removal of the siding by the Birkenshaw Coal Company.

In these circumstances the question arose whether the siding as it now existed was a renewal of a siding in existence at the time of the commencement of the Amalgamation Act, and this action was raised to determine the matter.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The siding in question being a renewal of a siding existing at the time of the commencement of the Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, the pursuers are entitled in virtue of that Act to run over and use the same.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The siding in question not being a siding constructed and existing at the time of the commencement of the said Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, or a renewal thereof, but being a new, independent, and separate siding, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

On 30th October 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall), after a proof, found the pursuers entitled to use the siding, so far as the same was situated on land belonging to the defenders, in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuers ask for a declarator that under the 15th section of the Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, they are entitled to running powers over the siding which leads from a branch of the defenders' General Terminus Railway to the steading of ground now occupied by a bonded store belonging to Messrs Slater, Roger, & Company—at least that is what they now ask for, although as I read the summons their claim as there set forth includes a continuation of the lines of rail beyond the siding for some 70 feet into the said bonded store. It is clear that I am not entitled in this action to deal with that 70 feet at all, because it belongs to Slater, Roger, & Company, who are not called as parties to this action, and who certainly are under no obligation to give running powers over the said 70 feet of siding. I have accordingly limited my decree to that part of the siding which is situated on land belonging to the defenders, for it is to it alone that this action can by any possibility be supposed to apply. . . .

"(After a narrative of the facts)—These facts, the defenders say, constitute this a wholly different siding, and should preclude the Court from holding that it is either the original siding or a renewal thereof. I am unable to adopt this view. A siding, like any other piece of railway line, is intended to constitute a way for the transit of goods or passengers from one point to another, and it seems to me that the identity of the present siding with the old 'Granite Siding' must be judged of by the test whether it fulfils the same purposes as the old siding did. It appears to me to be a matter of indifference whether it is laid on precisely the same route as the old siding, or deviates a few feet to one side or another, or whether the levels of the rails have been altered a few feet up or down, provided it is laid in such a way as to serve the purpose of a means of transit between the same subjects as the siding formerly existing at that place served. In the present case it is not open to doubt that the siding as now existing serves as a means of transit between the identical steading of ground which the Granite Siding served and the same branch of the General Terminus Railway, and this being so, I do not think it matters in the least what alterations have been made either in its direction or levels; and in my opinion it would be absurd to hold that

The defenders reclaimed.

Oct. 18, 1907.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The dispute in question has arisen over a certain siding, and the history of that siding seems to be this: Originally there was a long siding going to a place called Vermont Street, and from that there was a branch siding which went to serve some works that at that time—I am now speaking of the time which ended in 1865, the date of the Amalgamation Act—belonged to a gentleman of the name of Sim. Subsequently Vermont Street really went out of existence, being superseded by a large depot known as the Kinning Park Depot, and accordingly part of the siding that went to Vermont Street was entirely abandoned, and the portion that went into Sim's works was still continued, although the actual direction of the rails was a little altered, in particular, instead of being only one branch it was bifurcated and made into two branches, and these two branches were prolonged into the works themselves, Sim having been succeeded by the Birkenshaw Coal Company. That was the state of affairs in 1895. In 1901 the Birkenshaw Company left the ground, and they were eventually succeeded by Messrs Slater, Roger, & Company, who seem to have taken possession in 1903, and who are the present possessors of the ground. During the period after the Birkenshaw people left and Slater, Roger, & Company came in, the siding was so far altered. The Birkenshaw Company took away the rails in so far as they were within their own ground, and the siding became a sort of bifurcated end which approached the ground without actually entering into it. There seemed to be a little dispute between the parties as to whether this bifurcated end was actually used for the purpose of taking goods which went into the ground, or taking anything away from the ground, but in the view I take of it it really does not make any difference.

I think the whole question is whether there really is identity of subject. I think it is perfectly clear that the question of who the private person was who used the siding is neither here nor there. All sorts of people would use the sidings on the General Terminus system, and the running powers were not given merely so long as these sidings were used by the same people; they were given so long as there was identity of subject. I come to the conclusion without any difficulty that here there is in the fair meaning of the words identity of subject. I do not think that the fact, if it be a fact, that for a short period the siding was, so to speak, disused, really alters the question. The siding now is what it originally was, namely, a siding for the use of those particular works connecting with the Caledonian Railway system at that point. I do not think it has lost its proper identity the pursuers could lawfully be deprived of statutory running powers over a siding leading to a particular place or piece of ground merely because the defenders and the present owners of the ground, for the convenience of the latter, make alterations on the levels and position of the siding as compared with the siding as it existed at the passing of the Act of 1865.

“On these grounds I consider the pursuers are entitled to the declarator they ask, subject to the qualification I have inserted in the decree. I am of opinion that the siding in question is a renewal of the siding which existed at the same place and substantially in the same position in 1865.”

Oct. 18, 1907. at all, and, accordingly, I think the conclusion the Lord Ordinary has come to is right.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree. I agree with the final sentence of the Lord Ordinary's opinion in which he says the siding in question is in his judgment a renewal of the siding which existed in the same place and substantially in the same position in 1865.

LORD PEARSON.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT adhered.

JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6. JAMES KIRKWOOD & SONS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Hunter, K.C.—Sandeman.

Oct. 15, 1907. THE CLYDESDALE BANK, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Ure—King.

Kirkwood &
Sons v.
Clydesdale
Bank.

ROBERT PATERSON (Moffatt's Judicial Factor), Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Campbell—Macmillan.

Bank—Cheque—Bill of Exchange—Death of Drawer before presentment—Assignment of Funds in hands of Bank—Credit balance on current account—Debit balances on other accounts—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), secs. 53 (2), 73, 75.—A bank having refused payment of a cheque on the ground that it had received notice of the death of the drawer, the holder of the cheque in an action against the bank claimed payment of the amount on the ground that to that extent the cheque operated as an assignment of a sum standing at the drawer's credit on his account current in the hands of the bank.

In a proof the bank books shewed a balance due to the drawer on his account current more than sufficient to pay the cheque, but they also shewed that on his other accounts the drawer was due to the bank for advances a larger sum than that standing at his credit on the current account. For these advances the bank held securities.

Held (1) that the cheque, as a cheque, having lapsed at the death of the drawer, the pursuer could not avail himself of the rule by which a bank, which is in the habit of honouring a customer's cheques on a current account, is not entitled without notice to refuse payment because on a balance of all accounts the customer is a debtor to the bank; and (2) that the cheque did not operate as an assignment, in respect that at the time when it was presented to the defenders there were not in their hands any "funds available for the payment thereof" within the meaning of section 53 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

1ST DIVISION. ON 15th December 1904 Messrs J. & G. Moffatt, stockbrokers, Glasgow, of which George Moffatt was the sole partner, for value, delivered to Messrs James Kirkwood & Sons, also stockbrokers there, a cheque for £1588, 8s. 7d., drawn by them in favour of Messrs Kirkwood upon the Clydesdale Bank, Glasgow. The cheque was presented to the Bank on 16th December 1904, but payment was refused on the ground that the Bank had received notice that Mr George Moffatt had died that morning.

Thereafter an action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by Messrs Kirkwood against the Clydesdale Bank, concluding for payment of the sum of £1588, 8s. 7d. Oct. 15, 1907.

On 4th January 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) assoilzied the defenders.

Kirkwood &
Sons v.
Clydesdale
Bank.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session.

On 7th December 1906 the Court appointed the appellants to intimate the dependence of the action to the judicial factor who had been appointed on the estate of the deceased George Moffatt, and ordained him, if so advised, to compare in the cause. Thereafter the judicial factor appeared, and lodged defences. The record was reopened, and an amended record made up and closed.

The pursuers averred that the cheque founded on was drawn by Messrs Moffatt's clerk, Mr D. H. Penman, who was authorised to draw upon their current account, and on that account only; that on 16th December 1904, when the cheque was presented, there was a sufficient sum at the credit of that account; that Messrs Moffatt had been in the habit of drawing upon that account irrespective of the state of the balance on various loan accounts which they had open, and that the cheques were duly honoured.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect that the cheque founded on was granted for value, and that when it was presented to the Bank the Bank held cash belonging to the drawers, or otherwise had placed at the credit of the account on which said cheque was drawn a sum exceeding the amount thereof, and in respect that the presentation of said cheque operated as an assignation of the funds standing at the credit of said account belonging to Messrs Moffatt in the hands of said Bank to the extent of the sum for which it was drawn from the time when so presented, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved, with expenses. (2) It having been part of the course of dealing between the Bank and the said firm of Messrs Moffatt that cheques drawn on the said working account should be honoured so long as there were funds in that account, and that irrespective of the state of balance of other accounts open between the parties, the Bank were not entitled to strike a general balance and dishonour cheques drawn by the said Messrs Moffatt without having first given them notice of their intention so to do. (3) No notice having been given by the Bank of their intention to close the said working account prior to the drawing of the said cheque, they are not now entitled to transfer the amount at the credit of the said working account to the said other accounts, to the prejudice of the pursuers. (4) The sums at the credit of the said working account having, as at the said 15th December 1904, been specially appropriated to meet the said cheque in the pursuers' favour, they are entitled to decree as craved.

The following pleas were stated on behalf of the defenders the Clydesdale Bank;—(3) In respect that when said cheque was presented to these defenders they held no funds of Messrs Moffatt which could be assigned to the pursuers, these defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The authority by Messrs Moffatt and the said George Moffatt to these defenders to honour all cheques drawn on their account signed by Mr David Hedderwick Penman of their office having fallen by the death of the said George Moffatt, absolvitor should be pronounced, with expenses. (5) Separatim, notice of the death of the said George Moffatt having been given to these defenders before the presentation of said cheque, these defen-

Oct. 15, 1907.

Kirkwood &
Sons v.
Clydesdale
Bank.

ders were, in terms of subsection 2 of section 75 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882,¹ warranted in refusing payment of same, and they are accordingly entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (6) There having been no arrangement between Messrs Moffatt and these defenders that cheques drawn by Messrs Moffatt should be honoured irrespective of the balance due by Messrs Moffatt to the Bank, these defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (7) These defenders being entitled at any time without notice to treat all the accounts between Messrs Moffatt and the Bank as one account, and to apply the credit balance on any account towards meeting the debit balances on the other accounts, absolvitor should be pronounced, with expenses.

Similar pleas were stated on behalf of the defender the judicial factor.

On 16th May 1907 a proof was allowed, which was led before Lord Pearson.

The following facts were admitted or proved:—At the time of the presentation of the cheque the Messrs Moffatt had various accounts open with the Bank—a current account, at the credit of which there was then standing a balance of about £3000; a loan account; and several cash accounts—on all of which together there was a debit balance against the firm much greater than the sum at the credit of the current account. Against this debit balance the Bank held securities of various kinds. The cheque in favour of Messrs Kirkwood was in ordinary form, and did not bear to be drawn upon any particular account, but it was signed by D. H. Penman, a clerk in the employment of Messrs Moffatt who had authority to operate only upon the current account, and there was no doubt that it was intended to be drawn upon that account. It was part of the course of dealing between Messrs Moffatt and the Bank that cheques drawn on the current account were honoured so long as there were funds in that account, irrespective of the state of balance of the other accounts open between the parties.

Argued for the pursuers;—The cheque operated as an assignment of the balance at the credit of Messrs Moffatt's current account with the bank at the time when it was presented, to the amount for which the cheque was drawn.² The cheque was drawn upon the current account, and the admitted balance at the credit of that account was a fund in the hands of the bank "available for the payment thereof," within the meaning of section 53 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.³ It was immaterial that on a balance of all the accounts open between Messrs Moffatt and the bank, Messrs Moffatt were debtors to them, for a banker who was in the habit (as in this case) of honouring his customer's cheques upon his current account so long as there were funds there, was not entitled, without notice, to refuse to honour such a cheque, merely because on a balance of all accounts the customer was found to be owing money to the bank.⁴ The pursuers being holders of the cheque for value, had a jus quæsitum to enforce this

¹ Quoted in the Lord President's opinion at p. 23.

² Bryce v. Young's Executors, Jan. 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 312; British Linen Co. Bank v. Carruthers and Ferguson, June 6, 1883, 10 R. 923; Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 53 (2), 73.

³ Quoted in the Lord President's opinion at p. 24.

⁴ Cumming v. Shand, 1860, 5 Hurl. & Nor. 95; Buckingham & Co. v. The London and Midland Bank, Limited, 1895, 12 T. L. R. 70; King v. British Linen Co., June 15, 1899, 1 F. 928.

rule even after the death of the drawer. In any event, it was not the case that Messrs Moffatt were debtors to the bank, for their overdrafts were admittedly secured to an extent larger than the amount advanced. The bank could not be considered creditors of Messrs Moffatt until they had realised their securities and found them insufficient.

Oct. 15, 1907.
Kirkwood &
Sons v.
Clydesdale
Bank.

Argued for the defender, the judicial factor;—The rule as to honouring cheques founded on the course of dealing between Messrs Moffatt and the bank had no application to the case, because such a rule could only operate when there was a cheque regarding which the question could arise, and this cheque had ceased to exist as a cheque after Mr Moffatt's death.¹ Whatever force the plea might have had if stated during Mr Moffatt's lifetime, there was no authority for holding that it was available to third parties after his death. The pursuers were in no better position if they founded on the cheque as an assignment in their favour, because at the time when it was presented there was nothing to assign. The bank was entitled to mass all the accounts kept by Messrs Moffatt, and to set off the debit balance on the loan and cash accounts against the credit balance on the current account,² the effect of which was to shew that Messrs Moffatt were debtors to the bank. They were none the less debtors because their debt was secured, seeing that ex hypothesi a security implied the existence of a debt which required to be secured, and the securities could only be realised after the funds of the debtor had been exhausted.

Counsel for the Clydesdale Bank adopted the argument for the judicial factor.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers in this action are stockbrokers in Glasgow. In order to oblige a certain Mr Moffatt, now deceased, who wished a sum of money in London, and who had not himself got a bank account there, they gave Mr Moffatt a cheque upon a bank in London, and by that means put in Mr Moffatt's hands a document by which he could get the money in London. They were paid for that by taking from Mr Moffatt a cheque upon his Scottish Bank, the Clydesdale Bank, with its office in Glasgow.

The pursuers unfortunately did not present that cheque at the moment, and before they did present the cheque Mr Moffatt had died his death being sudden. The result of that was that naturally enough the Clydesdale Bank refused to pay the cheque when presented; and the present action is directed by the Messrs Kirkwood against the Clydesdale Bank for payment of the cheque. Now, the pursuers cannot deny that, so far as the ordinary operation of the cheque was concerned, the Clydesdale Bank were perfectly within their rights, and it was according to their duty to refuse payment of the cheque, because section 75 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, says perfectly clearly that "the duty and authority of a banker to pay a cheque drawn on him by his customer are determined by (1) countermand of payment, and (2) notice of the customer's death." It is not denied that at the time the cheque was presented the Clydesdale Bank had notice of the customer's death.

But the pursuers rely upon the second subsection of the 53d section which

¹ Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 75 (2).

² Thomas v. Howell, 1874, L. R. 18 Eq. 198.

Oct. 15, 1907. says :—" In Scotland where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof the bill operates as an assignment of the sum for which it was drawn from the time when the bill is presented to the drawee." The pursuers say that the Clydesdale Bank had funds in their hands belonging to Mr Moffatt, and that accordingly this cheque being an intimated assignation of these funds they are bound to make the same forthcoming. This statement of having funds in their hands belonging to Mr Moffatt the Clydesdale Bank deny ; but the state of the facts as elucidated by the proof is this Mr Moffatt, in accordance with a common practice, kept several accounts, and, using the nomenclature that is common in Scottish banking, these accounts may be described as Current Account, Loan Account, and various Cash Accounts. Now, the Current Account is, as its name indicates, an account on which the ordinary transactions from day to day are made ; and there is no question that this cheque was intended to be drawn upon that Current Account. In point of fact it was drawn not by Mr Moffatt himself but by a gentleman connected with his firm who had right to draw upon this account, and upon no other. The state of affairs as at the death of Mr Moffatt was that in the Bank's books there was on that Current Account a credit balance in favour of the customer. But there were other accounts—namely, the Loan Account and various Cash Accounts ; and in all of these, as was natural, there was a debit balance against the customer. There is no question whatever that the sum of these debit balances against the customer amounted to a sum much greater than the credit balance upon the Current Account.

It is quite true that against these debit balances upon the Loan and Cash Accounts the Bank held various securities partly consisting of stock and shares belonging to the debtor himself, and partly consisting of guarantees by various third parties, which guarantees for the purposes of the argument may be assumed to be good guarantees—that is to say, guarantees given by persons who if called upon are equal to meet the amounts. Now, the argument therefore really has come to this—In the circumstances is the Bank's answer that it has no funds of Mr Moffatt a true one or not ?

I am of opinion that it is a true one. It seems to me that the state of affairs between a banker and his customer as at any given time must be taken to be the state of affairs upon all accounts ; and the state of affairs on all accounts shews perfectly clearly that the Bank did not owe the customer, but the customer owed the Bank money. I do not think that fact is disturbed by either of the two considerations which have been pressed upon us by the counsel for the pursuers. One consideration is the question of what security the Bank holds. That is a matter of very great moment for the Bank, but none the less it does not seem to me to alter the relation of debtor and creditor as between the Bank and its customer. That becomes very clear if you look at the security such as is given by an outsider—by a cautioner or by a guarantor. What is caution ? It is not to pay money that you owe yourself, but it is to pay money that is owed by somebody else. In other words the very hypothesis of a cautioner being called upon is that the customer is truly in the relation to the Bank of a debtor and not a creditor. As little I think is the fact I have mentioned affected by the rule in support of which reference was made to the English cases of Buck- ingham,¹ and of Cumming v. Shand.² That is the rule which lays down Oct. 15, 1907. that a banker who is in the habit of honouring his customer's cheques to the extent to which he has funds at that customer's credit upon a Current Account is not entitled, without notice, at any moment, to turn round and refuse to honour these cheques because as a matter of fact there are other Loan and Cash Accounts, and because as a matter of fact if all the accounts were massed the customer would be found to be a debtor and not a creditor. That seems to be common-sense, and really it is a rule without which the ordinary banking practice with customers would be impossible. Cash Accounts generally and Loan Accounts always have from their birth a debit balance against the customer, and a customer who happened to have a Loan Account or a Cash Account as well as a Current Account, would never be in security to work on a Current Account at all, because he might never know at any moment when a cheque might be dishonoured upon presentment. But that does not affect this question. The question here as upon a question of honouring a cheque is gone, because the cheque as a cheque was countermanded by death, and the whole question is what is the right which is given by the section of the statute which says that a cheque shall operate as an assignation. It seems to me quite clear that the expression "where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof," must mean funds as upon a true state of the accounts between the two parties concerned. As I have already pointed out upon a true accounting between the parties concerned there were no funds in the hands of the Clydesdale Bank belonging to this gentleman at this time, and I am accordingly of opinion that the result which the Sheriff has come to is right, and his judgment ought to be affirmed.

Kirkwood &
Sons v.
Clydesdale
Bank.

Ld. President.

LORD KINNEAR, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD PEARSON concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

J. MULLO WEIR, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—
Agents.

JAMES ADAM PATTULLO, Petitioner.—C. D. Murray—Lyon Mackenzie. No. 7.

CAITHNESS FLAGSTONE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATOR,

Respondents.—Hunter, K.C.—D. Anderson.

Oct. 22, 1907.

Expenses—Company—Winding-up—Creditor's petition for judicial winding-up—Supervision order pronounced on company's petition—Creditor's expenses.—One of the creditors of a company presented a petition for the judicial winding-up of the company. Thereafter the company, having passed an extraordinary resolution for voluntary winding-up and having appointed D. as liquidator, petitioned for a supervision order, and lodged answers to the creditor's petition. The creditor also lodged answers to the company's petition. At the hearing the parties agreed that a supervision order should be pronounced, but the creditor moved that D. should be superseded as liquidator. The Court pronounced a supervision order in the company's petition and continued D. as liquidator. The creditor moved that his expenses in his petition for judicial winding-up should be expenses in the liquidation. The company opposed.

Pattullo v.
Caithness
Flagstone Co.,
Limited (in Liquidation).

The Court held that the creditor's expenses prior to the date of the peti-

¹ 12 T. L. R. 70.

² 5 Hurl. & Nor. 95.

Oct. 22, 1907. tion for a supervision order were expenses in the liquidation, and quoad ultra refused the motion.

Pattullo v.
Caithness

Flagstone Co.,
Limited (in Liquidation).

2D DIVISION.

ON 29th July 1907 James Adam Pattullo, S.S.C., Edinburgh, presented a petition praying that the Caithness Flagstone Company, Limited, be wound up by the Court. The petitioner was a creditor of the Company, as the registered holder of debenture bonds by the Company for £500.

On 30th July 1907 an extraordinary general meeting of the Company passed an extraordinary resolution that the Company be wound up voluntarily. The meeting also passed a resolution appointing Thomas Dingwall to be the liquidator, and further resolved that the voluntary liquidation should be continued subject to the supervision of the Court.

On 12th August 1907 the Company and Dingwall, as liquidator, presented a petition praying that the voluntary liquidation be continued subject to the supervision of the Court.

Answers were lodged to each petition.

At the hearing the parties concurred in stating that they were agreed that the voluntary liquidation should be continued subject to the supervision of the Court, but the petitioner Pattullo moved that the appointment of Dingwall as liquidator should be superseded by the appointment of another person as liquidator.

The Court having held that Dingwall's appointment should not be superseded, Pattullo moved that the expenses of his petition for a winding-up order should be expenses in the liquidation. He cited the undernoted authorities.¹

The Company and its liquidator opposed the motion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We allow the expenses of initiating the petition for a judicial winding-up, but not of any after proceedings.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL was sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petitioner Pattullo's petition, found him entitled to expenses up to 12th August 1907, and found that these expenses formed expenses in the winding-up.

A supervision order was pronounced in the Company's petition.

M'NEILL & SIME, S.S.C.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 8.

JOHN HIRST SELKIRK, Pursuer (Reclamer).—Crabb Watt, K.C.—R. S. Brown.

Oct. 24, 1907. ALEXANDER FERGUSON, Defender (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—Laing.

Selkirk v.
Ferguson.

Contract—Essential Error—Error as to stipulations in deed signed—Error as to contents not induced by one of the parties—Signature of contract in ignorance of alteration on draft.—F. signed a contract with S. without reading it over, in the belief that no material alteration had been made on a draft revised by him. F. subsequently refused to implement the contract on the ground that a material alteration had been made in one of the clauses, of which he had not been made aware. S. brought an action of damages against F. for breach of contract. Oct. 24, 1907.

¹ Drysdale & Gilmour v. Liquidator of International Exhibition of Electrical Engineering and Inventions, Nov. 13, 1890, 18 R. 98; Pattisons, Limited, v. Kinnear, Feb. 4, 1899, 1 F. 551; Elsmie & Son v. Tomatin Spey District Distillery, Limited, Jan. 30, 1906, 8 F. 434; M'Gregor v. Ballachulish Slate Quarries Co., Limited, supra, p. 1.

Selkirk v.
Ferguson.

After a proof, held (rev. judgment of Lord Johnston) (1) that when F. signed the deed he was under no error as to its nature, (2) that his error as to one of the clauses was not induced by S., and (3) that accordingly F. was bound by his signature.

JOHN H. SELKIRK, London, raised this action of damages for breach of contract against Alexander Ferguson, Glasgow, in the following circumstances. 1st Division.
Ld. Johnston.

Alexander Ferguson, Glasgow, having acquired the patent rights in an advertising machine called the "Animated Poster," entered into an agreement with John Hirst Selkirk, advertising contractor, London, under which Ferguson bound himself to defray the costs of providing the machines and to pay a salary to Selkirk; and Selkirk, on the other hand, bound himself to manage the business, to endeavour to procure sites for the machines, and to provide advertisements. A deed embodying the terms of this agreement was drawn up by Mr Slark, the agent of a Mr Cohen, who was financially interested in the enterprise, and submitted to the parties in draft. As originally drafted, the 8th article of the deed provided that Ferguson should have right to assign his interest in the patents to a company having a working capital of not less than £10,000, and upon his doing so, that Selkirk should accept such company in place of Ferguson for the purposes of the agreement, "and upon such assignment being carried into effect, the said A. Ferguson shall not be under any further liability hereunder." This article was altered by Selkirk, who deleted the last clause, and when the drafts were being revised by the parties, substituted the provision that, "notwithstanding any such assignment the liability of the said Alexander Ferguson under this agreement shall remain and have effect," and the deed, with this alteration, was signed by the parties. When he signed the contract, Ferguson knew that alterations had been made by Selkirk upon the original draft, but he did not know what they were. He had an opportunity of reading the deed before signing it, of which he did not avail himself, being satisfied with a statement by Mr Slark, who was acting in the interest of neither party, but of Mr Cohen, that the alterations were not material.

Subsequently on discovering the difference between the terms of the deed which he had signed and the terms of the deed as revised by him in draft, Ferguson repudiated the agreement, and the present action was raised.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—3. The defender being in breach of and having broken his contract with the pursuer, is liable in damages to the pursuer therefor.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—4. The defender should be assoilzied, with expenses, in respect that (1) the said agreement was entered into by defender, under essential error induced by pursuer; (2) said essential error was induced by fraudulent misrepresentations and concealment on the part of the pursuer; and (3) said agreement is not binding on defender, but is null and void.

A proof was taken, which established the facts above narrated, and on 1st December 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) assoilzied the defender.*

* "OPINION.—(After a narrative of the facts)—But however one must

Oct. 24, 1907. obtained as to what is error in essentialibus in this branch of law is that it applies where a man has signed a document of some sort thinking it is another sort of document. Mr Bell in his Principles (sec. 11) gives in so many words an illustration,—“As, for example, if one sign a conveyance believing it to be a bond or security or a testamentary deed,” and there is a very well-known leading case in England where a person signed a deed, being told it was a release of rents, whereas it was a release of all claims.¹ There there was a mistake as to the document, not so here. If the matter can be treated as the Lord Ordinary has done, in every case where there has been an alteration of any materiality it could be said that it is not the document. It is the same document with an alteration upon it. I think the Lord Ordinary has imported into his judgment something which has to do with a different class of case from this.

Selkirk v.
Ferguson.

Ld. President.

I should like to say also that I cannot agree with what the Lord Ordinary says, that there cannot be two opinions as to the materiality of the alteration. I think there is room for a difference on the matter, and that it was perfectly possible for one to form an opinion that it was not material. On paper it was a decided alteration. But practically it probably was not. It was not a term of the contract which would necessarily come into operation, for the company might never be formed. And if it was formed, the security of the company, with £10,000 paid up, was practically ample to protect Ferguson for a liability for a salary of £10 a week for three years.

I do not think the Lord Ordinary's judgment can stand. But that leaves the case which is quite well set forth in the defences, that the error in which the defender was, as to the actual difference in the documents, was induced by the misrepresentations of the other party to the contract. The defender cannot object to his own account of what passed being taken, and that account seems to me to negative any idea that there was any representation by the other party which led the defender to sign. By that account he referred the question to Slark, and he was content to abide by Slark's opinion. He knew that there were alterations. He chose to be guided by Slark's view that these were not material—a view which, as I have already pointed out, might, I think, be quite an honest one. And then, though having the opportunity of reading for himself, he did not do so. In such circumstances I think the defender was not entitled to repudiate the contract.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely concur, and I have the less hesitation in concurring because I think that on the question of fact the Lord Ordinary has not arrived at any different conclusion from that which we have formed, and that if he had held that the true issue was whether the defender had been induced to enter into the contract which he signed by the representations of the pursuer, he would have given the same verdict as your Lordship has proposed. The view which he takes of the defender's conduct is even more unfavourable than that which your Lordship has expressed, for after examining the whole proceedings at the meeting, he says,—“It is impossible to account for or excuse the folly and neglect of Ferguson.” In a later passage he refers to his “inexcusable conduct at the signing of the agreement," and on that account refuses to award him expenses in spite of Oct. 24, 1907. his success in the action. The Lord Ordinary cannot have meant to decide ^{Selkirk v.} that the defender's signature was obtained by the pursuer's representations, ^{Ferguson.} since he finds that his conduct in signing was inexcusable. The judgment ^{Lord Kinnear.} of the Lord Ordinary therefore comes to rest upon the opinion in law which he expresses when he says,—“However one must condemn Ferguson's conduct at this stage, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that he signed a document in terms materially differing from those of the document which he believed he was signing. It is no question of the misunderstanding of the import and effect of the document, it was error as to the document itself, and I cannot, therefore, hold Ferguson to be bound by his signature.” I understand this to mean that the contract actually signed by Ferguson was not his deed, because he believed he was signing an instrument of a different character. Now, there is authority to the effect that when a man signs one document thinking it to be another and different document, he is not bound by his signature. The early English case to which the Lord President referred—*Thoroughgood's case*¹—is an excellent illustration. There may be an element of fraud in such cases, but in the more recent decision of Foster v. Mackinnon,² the law is expounded in a sense which seems to coincide with the Lord Ordinary's view, for it is said that an instrument, executed in the belief that it is one thing while in fact it is another, is invalid, not only on the ground of fraud, but on the ground that the mind of the signer does not accompany the signature, or in other words, that he never intended to sign, and in contemplation of law never did sign the contract to which his name is appended. But this is quite a different case. The defender knew the contract that he was signing. He knew that alterations had been made on the draft, and that the document which he was asked to sign was the deed so altered. He did not know what the alterations were, but he asked if they were material, and on being told by Mr Slark that they were not, he thereupon signed the deed. In these circumstances to say that he signed a totally different deed from the one which he thought he was signing, appears to me to be out of the question. The deed he signed was exactly the deed which he thought he was signing—to wit, a contract in the terms of the draft he had seen, but with alterations the nature and importance of which he did not know, but which he was content to accept in reliance on the opinion of Mr Slark. The true issue is whether the error under which he signed was induced by the other party to the contract, and on that issue the judgment of the Court must be for the pursuer.

¹ Thoroughgood v. Cole, 1582, 2 Co. Rep. 9, b.

LORD DUNDAS concurred.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decerned against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £250.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Solicitor—DAVID PHILIP, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ Thoroughgood v. Cole, 1582, 2 Co. Rep. 9, b.

² 1869, L. R., 4 C. P. 704.

No. 9. JOHN STUART GOWANS (Sime, Sullivan, & Dickson's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—D. M. Wilson.
 Oct. 25, 1907. MRS ISABELLA MOIR OR ADAM AND ANOTHER,¹Defenders (Reclaimers).

Sime,
 Sullivan, and Dickson's
 Trustee v.
 Adam.

Administration of Justice—Law-agent—Disclosure of former client's address.—Where an agent has ceased to act for a party to a cause, it is his duty to furnish the opposite party's agent with his former client's address, if it is known to him, so as to enable that party to move the Court to proceed if further attendance is not made.

1ST DIVISION. IN an action for payment at the instance of John Stuart Gowans, C.A., trustee under a trust-deed granted by Sime, Sullivan, & Dickson, stockbrokers, against Mrs Isabella Moir or Adam and her husband, decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuer, with expenses.

The defenders reclaimed.

When the case was called in the Short Roll on 23d October, no appearance was made for the reclaimers.

Counsel for the respondent stated that the reclaimers' agents had informed the respondent's agents that they no longer acted for the reclaimers, but that they had intimated to their former clients that the case was put out for hearing. He further stated that the respondent's agents had requested the reclaimers' agents to supply them with the address of the reclaimers, in order that they might themselves give them intimation of the hearing, but that the address had not been supplied.

The Court continued the case till the 25th October, and directed the Clerk of Court to write to the former agents for the reclaimers, requiring them to attend at the bar at 10 o'clock on the 25th in order to explain their failure to supply the respondent with the reclaimers' address.

On 25th October a statement was made at the bar by counsel on behalf of the former agents of the reclaimers.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are satisfied with the explanation which has been given.

I only wish to add that I should like it to be clearly understood by agents practising in the Court that, in every case in which they cease to act for a party, it is their duty to furnish the agent for the opposite party with the address of their former client, if it is known to them, so as to enable that party to move the Court to proceed if further attendance is not made. For the Court will not deal with the case as if all parties had been properly convened when no appearance is made for one of the parties, and the Court is told that the only intimation he has received of the hearing is intimation from his former agents; the intimation must be given to him by his opponent.

The other Judges present were LORD KINNEAR and LORD DUNDAS.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

Thereafter intimation was duly given to the reclaimers.

The case was called on 30th October, when, there being no appearance for the reclaimers, the reclaiming note was refused, with additional expenses.

FRASER & DAVIDSON, W.S., Agents.

Oct. 25, 1907.

Sime,
Sullivan, &
Dickson's
Trustee v.
Adam.

THE ALLGEMEINE DEUTSCHE CREDIT ANSTALT AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Morison, K.C.—Jameson. No. 10.

THE SCOTTISH AMICABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Campbell—Spens. Oct. 26, 1907.

Insurance—Life Policy—Process—Declarator ab ante—Declarator of right to unmatured policy.—Assignees of an unsurrendered policy of life insurance raised an action of declarator during the lifetime of the insured, in which they called as defenders (1) the insurance company, and (2) former holders of the policy. The action concluded for declarator (1) that the pursuers were in right of the policy, and (2) that the insurance company were bound, on the sums contained in the policy falling due, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or the persons deriving right from them. The insurance company alone lodged defences.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall) that the action so far as directed against the company was incompetent and premature, and should be dismissed, in respect that, until the policy matured, it was impossible to say to whom the proceeds would be payable, and that the insurance company were not the proper contradictors in a question as to whom the policy in the meantime belonged.

On 22d August 1884, a policy of insurance for £2000 was granted by the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society on the life of Oscar Philipp, in favour of Gustav von Portheim, merchant, Austria. By various assignments, into the details of which it is unnecessary to enter, the policy passed into the hands of the Allgemeine Deutsche Credit Anstalt and Erttel Freyberg & Company, both carrying on business as bankers at Leipzig, Germany, who thereafter wrote to the Scottish Amicable Society, asking that they should admit that the Credit Anstalt and Freyberg & Company were the persons in right of the policy. The Society replied that they could express no opinion as to the validity of the title until they were called on to make a payment under the policy.

The Credit Anstalt and Freyberg & Company then raised the present action of declarator, in which they called as defenders (1) the persons to whom at various times the policy had belonged, and (2) the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society. The summons concluded for declarator (1) that the pursuers had a good title to the policy in question, "and the contents and proceeds thereof"; (2) that the defenders, other than the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, had no title to the policy; and (3) "that the defenders, the said Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, are bound, on the sums contained in the said policy becoming due and payable, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or to any person or persons who may have derived right from them in and to the said certificate or policy, contents and proceeds thereof."

At the date when the action was raised, Oscar Philipp was alive, the policy had not been surrendered, and the premiums payable thereunder had all been duly paid.

After narrating the steps by which they had acquired the policy, the pursuers averred:—(Cond. 10) "In virtue of these assignments

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Ardwall.

Oct. 26, 1907. the pursuers are now in right of the said policy, but the defenders, the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, have refused to acknowledge the right of the pursuers, or to go into the question of title until the sum contained in the said policy shall become payable. The pursuers desire to be in a position to deal with the said policy and to sell, assign, or surrender it should they so decide, and to exercise the lawful privileges of a duly qualified assignee recognised under the Society's deed of association. In consequence of the attitude adopted by the defenders to the pursuers it is necessary that their right and title should be judicially declared while the parties to the several transactions above narrated are still alive and their evidence is available."

—
Allgemeine
Deutsche
Credit Anstalt
v. Scottish
Amicable Life
Assurance
Society.

Two of the defenders did not compear, and decree in absence was pronounced against them. Two of the other defenders lodged minutes consenting to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and decree was pronounced against them accordingly. The remaining defenders, the Scottish Amicable Society, lodged defences, and pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The action as laid is incompetent, in respect that the pursuers have no right to demand a declarator in the circumstances condescended on. (5) The action as laid is premature. (6) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, in respect that they do not disclose any right in the pursuers to maintain this action against these defenders in respect of a policy which has not yet become a claim.

On 2d February 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the 4th, 5th, and 6th pleas in law stated for the defenders, dismisses the action so far as the same is directed against the defenders the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, and decerns."*

* "OPINION.—In this case two firms of bankers in Leipzig, Germany, bring an action against the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, and several persons who have at one time or other been interested in the policy libelled, for the purpose of having it declared that the pursuers have good and undoubted right and title to the extent of one-half each of the policy Number 34,186, dated 22d August 1884, and granted by the said Assurance Society on the life of the defender Oscar Philipp; that the other defenders have no right or title to the policy or to the contents or proceeds thereof, 'or to demand payment of the sums due thereunder when the same may become due by the death of the said Oscar Philipp or otherwise,' and—then follows the important conclusion directed against the Assurance Society alone—for the purpose of having it declared that the Society are bound 'on the sums contained in the said policy becoming due and payable, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or to any person or persons who may have derived right through them in and to the policy.'

"By the policy the said Oscar Philipp becomes a contributor to the society, and undertakes payment of the premiums, and on that being done the policy provides as follows:—'then Gustav von Portheim, merchant, Prague, Austria, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be entitled to receive out of the stock and funds of the said society, after the death of the contributor, on proof of said death being made to the ordinary Committee of Management, the sum of £2000.'

"Since the policy was entered into it has had a somewhat complicated history, as will be seen from the notices set forth in answers 2 to 9 of the defences. A glance at these notices shews that questions of very considerable difficulty, and among these possibly questions as to the law of foreign countries, would require to be investigated if the defenders, the Assurance

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—An action of declarator was competent at the instance of any person in whom a right had vested, and who desired to have the validity of his title established.¹ It was not necessary that his title should in point of fact be disputed, and in any case a proper contradictor was before the Court in the person of the Scottish Amicable Society. The great benefit of this form of action was that it provided a means of determining questions of title while parties were alive and while their evidence was accessible,² and this consideration was peculiarly applicable to the present case, where the transactions connected with the assignments of the policy had been so complicated. All the parties who could have a claim to the policy had been called as defenders. In any event, the pursuers were entitled to decree in terms of the first two declaratory conclusions of the summons.

Oct. 26, 1907.
Allgemeine
Deutsche
Credit Anstalt
v. Scottish
Amicable Life
Assurance Society.

Reference was also made to the Policies of Assurance Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144).

Society, were to determine now who is in right of the policy, and accordingly when the pursuers wrote them in 1904 asking that they should admit that the pursuers were the persons in right of the policy, the Society wrote the letter of 17th March 1904, in which they say that they can express no opinion as to the effect or validity of the pursuers' title until they were called on to make a payment under the policy, when the whole title would require to be examined and reported on by the Society's solicitors. The Society having thus refused to pronounce any judgment on the question of title, the present action was brought for the purpose of having the pursuers' title to the policy declared, and the question to be determined now is whether the pursuers were entitled to make the request they did, and whether the present is a competent action against the Assurance Society. No further notice need be taken of the other defenders ; two of them have put in consents to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, but none of them are subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, and therefore I propose to consider this action as one directed solely against the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society. It appears to me that upon the contract embodied in the policy of assurance, and having regard to the law and customs regarding such contracts, the present action is incompetent as directed against the Assurance Society. What they contract to do is to pay a certain sum on proof of death of the contributor, and they are compelled by Act of Parliament to record all notices of assignments and other documents of change of title to the policy, of which notice may be given to them. This they have regularly done. But there is nothing in the contract entitling any person who may acquire right to the policy to come to the Society before the sums in the policy fall due, and demand from them an acknowledgment of the validity of the title. The onerous nature of the demand thus made upon the defenders is obvious. The pursuers make no secret in the correspondence or on the record that the object of obtaining an acknowledgment or certificate of validity from the defenders is in order that they may realise or otherwise deal with the policy. Now, supposing the defenders to grant an acknowledgment of the validity of the pursuers' title, if the pursuers were thereafter to sell or assign the policy on the faith of that acknowledgment, the purchaser from them would be in a position at

¹ Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mackenzie's Tutors, July 1, 1846, 8 D. 964 ; Harveys v. Harvey's Trustees, June 28, 1860, 22 D. 1310, per Lord President Inglis, p. 1326 ; Chaplin's Trustees v. Hoile, Oct. 30, 1890, 18 R. 27 ; Cairns' Trustees v. Cairns, 1907, S. C. 117.

² Earl of Mansfield v. Stewart, July 3, 1846, 5 Bell's App. 139, per Lord Brougham, p. 160.

Oct. 26, 1907. Counsel for the respondents was not called upon.

Allgemeine
Deutsche
Credit Anstalt
v. Scottish
Amicable Life
Assurance
Society.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is clearly right. The matter arises in this way. A policy of insurance was taken out with the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society in favour of a certain gentleman called Oscar Philipp. The pursuers, who are bankers in Germany, raised an action in which they called certain persons, who have, at different times, according to them, been in right of the policy, and they also called the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society. They asked for declarator that the pursuers have good and undoubted right and title to the extent of one-half each—for there are two pursuers—in the policy; and they put in the conclusion that the defenders, the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, are bound, on the sums contained in the said policy the death of the contributor to come forward and demand the proceeds of the policy, and the defenders would be barred from refusing to pay by their acknowledgment, even supposing it ultimately turned out that someone else had somehow or other got a better title. But it was suggested that when the action was raised the defenders ought to have allowed decree to go out against them in absence; but if they had done so I think they would have been in very much the same position as if they had granted an acknowledgment, for it might be said when the time for payment arrived that by allowing decree in absence to go out against them, they had misled some person or persons into purchasing the policy, and, on the other hand, if they defend the action, and have a decree go out against them notwithstanding their defence, it might afterwards be pleaded against them, when the policy came to be paid, that they did not put forward a proper defence. In short whatever way the matter is looked at it comes to this, that what the pursuers demanded from the defenders by letter and now demand by action, amounts to little less than a guarantee of the validity of their title. Now, I think a contract binding an insurance company at any time to give such a guarantee would need to be in very precise terms, and the fact that the Legislature imposes on them a duty of recording notices, and of giving to the persons making the notices an acknowledgment in writing that such notices have been received, seems to imply that they have nothing to do with the validity or invalidity of the notices sent in for registration. (See 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144, secs. 1, 3, and 6.)

“But when the last conclusion which I have above alluded to is looked at I think it will be seen at once that this action is quite incompetent under the policy, because the obligation in the policy is to pay the sum insured to Gustav von Portheim and his assignees, whereas the present summons concludes for declarator that the Society shall be bound to make payment of these sums to the pursuers, or any person who may derive right from them, thus really substituting a new contract for that contained in the policy. I therefore am of opinion that the action is incompetent and premature.

“An ingenious argument was, however, submitted to me for the pursuers, upon the authorities, to the effect that the right to this policy being, on the pursuers’ averments, vested in them, they are entitled now to have that right declared, it being of importance to them that that should be done in order to enable them to realise the policy. Now, undoubtedly in the case of Mackenzie, 8 D. 964, and Provan, 2 D. 298, similar actions were entertained, but as I read these and other cases in the light of the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of Harvey v. Harvey’s Trustees, 22 D. 1310, it is evident that such actions can only be allowed where the Court can be certiorated that all the persons who have or can have an interest in the fund in question are made parties to the action, so that they will be becoming due and payable, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or to any person or persons who may have derived right from them. They base that demand upon a statement in which they set forth a large number of transferences to different people, with a certain amount of bankruptcy proceedings as part of the story, and they say they are now the persons in right of the policy.

—
Allgemeine
Deutsche
Credit Anstalt
v. Scottish
Amicable Life
Assurance
Society.

Now, the only contradictors the pursuers can get are either the original persons to whom the policy belonged, or some of the people in the chain of transmissions which is set forth. The Insurance Company, of course, have no interest in the matter as to whom the policy belongs. Their interest is this, that if the policy matures and becomes a claim, then they will have to pay the proper person. If the pursuers had left out the conclusion which is directed against the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, then, of course, the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society would not, I take it, have entered appearance in the action, because no decree that would have been pronounced could possibly have bound them, there being no reference to them in the only conclusion which would then have remained. Whether the action would have gone on or not would have depended upon whether any of those who are called would have come forward, for if they did not, there would have been decree in absence against them; if they did, it would have been upon such grounds of defence as they set forth. But the Insurance Company would not have been here. When the pursuers put in their claim against the Insurance Company, they put in something which in my judgment they were not entitled to ask, because no one can tell whether the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society will ever be bound to make payment to the pursuers. No one knows who will be the claimants when the time comes for the policy to mature, or when it has been turned into a claim by means of a surrender. Therefore to entertain a declarator ab ante against the Insurance Company seems out of the question. A very good test of the competency is this—could the Insurance bound by the decree in it, and further, it is necessary that in such actions the persons against whom they are brought are proper contradictors of the declarator concluded for. In the present case both these elements are wanting. In the first place, it is impossible to say who may turn up when the policy falls due to claim the proceeds. The original contributor, Oscar Philipp, or his trustee in bankruptcy, may have more rights in it either by way of reversion, or if there are flaws in transmissions of it, and it is quite uncertain, who, at the time when the sum becomes payable, will be the holder of the policy. Further, it may happen that the whole of the present proceedings may be rendered nugatory by the policy lapsing on account of some breach of the conditions, or in consequence of non-payment of the premiums, but above all there is not here a proper contradictor, if the defenders against whom there is no jurisdiction are excepted. The Scottish Amicable Society have no pecuniary interest in the question as to whom the proceeds of the policy shall be paid. When the time comes when they have to make such payment they will then have to determine on the best advice they can get, and after thorough investigation of the title, to whom payment should be made; or if there are competing claims they may, as is the usual course, lay the proceeds of the policy on the table of the Court, and let those who have the real interest in the question of the title dispute their rights inter se."

—
Ld. President.

Oct. 26, 1907. Company have raised an action of multiplepoinding at this time upon such a question? Clearly they could not.

Allgemeine
Deutsche
Credit Anstalt
v. Scottish
Amicable Life
Assurance
Society.
Counsel for the pursuers here have said that they would be quite content if decree was not given in terms of that conclusion. But that simply turns out their action upon another ground, because then it is perfectly clear that the Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society ought not to be here at all, and they are entitled to have the action dismissed as against them.

Ld. President. To these observations I only add that I am perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the Lord Ordinary has expressed his opinion. I have never known, and counsel have been unable to produce to us, any action of declarator where the Court gave a declarator as to a right without there being a proper contradictor present. It seems to me that the whole argument we have listened to this morning was vitiated by an assumption as to who the contradictor in this case is. The Insurance Company is not the contradictor as in the question of whom the insurance policy belongs to. The contradictor must be found among the ranks of the parties to whom at various times the policy belonged, and depends upon the question of whether these various steps or links of the chain of title are or are not correct. The Insurance Company have no interest whatever, except simply to pay the policy when it becomes a proper claim. Therefore it seems to me that the whole of the cases where declarators have been obtained have really no application to the case before us. I propose to your Lordships that we adhere.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and I only add, that my reasons are stated very clearly by the Lord Ordinary in the last paragraph of his opinion, and I agree in all that his Lordship has said.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and with your Lordships. I confess that I think the case a very clear one. There is no proper contradictor here, and no actual lis. As your Lordship has pointed out, it is clear that a multiplepoinding cannot at this time be competently raised, and that, I think, is a conclusive test of the situation.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT adhered.

F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—Agents.

No. 11.

PETER BEGG AND OTHERS (Anderson's Trustees), Compearers (Reclaimers).—Watt, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

Oct. 26, 1907.

JAMES DONALDSON & COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATOR, Respondents.—Constable.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

Company—Winding-up by the Court—Preference—Action by superior for sequestration for feu-duty after Liquidation—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 163.—The Companies Act, 1862, sec. 163, enacts:—“Where any company is being wound up by the Court, or subject to the supervision of the Court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding-up shall be void to all intents.”

Held that an action by a superior against his vassal, a limited company in liquidation, for sequestration of the moveables on the feu for arrears of feu-duty, was not an "attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution" within the meaning of this enactment, in respect that it was not a proceeding for the purpose of creating a security, but was a proceeding for the purpose of making effectual a real security already existing in virtue of the superior's infeftment. Oct. 26, 1907.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

Athole Hydropathic Company, Limited, in Liquidation, 13 R. 818, explained and followed.

Allan v. Cowan, 20 R. 36, distinguished.

ON 1st June 1907 an order was pronounced by the Second Division of the Court for the winding up of James Donaldson & Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and having its registered office at 157 Great Junction Street, Leith, and appointing James Maxtone Graham, C.A., Edinburgh, to be liquidator. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Mackenzie.

On 4th June 1907 the testamentary trustees of James Anderson, manufacturing chemist, Edinburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against James Donaldson & Company, Limited, in liquidation, praying for sequestration of the whole moveables on an area of ground in Ballantyne Place, Leith, of which area of ground Anderson's trustees were the superiors, and James Donaldson & Company, Limited, may (for the purposes of this report) be taken to be the vassals.

On 4th June 1907 warrant to cite and sequester was granted, and on 5th June the petition and deliverance thereon having been served, the moveables were inventoried by the sheriff-officer.

Anderson's trustees had not obtained leave, under sec. 87 of the Companies Act, 1862,* to commence this action, but in July 1907 they presented a note in the liquidation, under sec. 87, praying for leave to proceed with the action.

The compearers averred :—

"The compearers are the superiors of the area of ground referred to, and as the liquidator declines to pay the half year's feu-duty of £107, 10s. due at Whitsunday last, and to give security for the current year's feu-duty of £215, it is necessary, in order to give effect to the superiors' hypothec upon the moveables on the ground, to proceed with the said sequestration. At the time when said action was raised the compearers did not know whether the Limited Company claimed any interest in the goods attached, but in a letter by the liquidator's agents to the compearers' agents on 12th June 1907, the present liquidator expressly claimed that the whole goods attached are the property of the Company.

"In these circumstances, the compearers submit that leave should be granted to them by the Court to proceed with the said action . . . no offer having been made by the liquidator to give the compearers the same relief in the winding-up as they would obtain in the action."

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), enacts :—

Sec. 87. "When an order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the Court, and subject to such terms as the Court may impose."

Sec. 163. "Where any company is being wound up by the Court, or subject to the supervision of the Court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding-up shall be void to all intents."

Oct. 26, 1907.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

The Company and its liquidator lodged answers in which they stated:—"Admitted that the compearers are the superiors of the area of ground in Ballantyne Place, Leith, referred to; that the feu-duty payable under the feu-contract relating thereto is £215 per annum, payable half-yearly at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, and that no feu-duty was paid at Whitsunday 1907. . . . Admitted that the respondent claims that all the moveables on the ground belong to the Company.

"The respondent submits (1) that, under and in terms of section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, the application for sequestration already presented by the compearers is null and void, and that the compearers are not entitled to constitute any preference for feu-duties past due or current over the property of the Company by applying to the Court, under section 87 of the said Act, for leave to proceed with the said application; (2) in any case, the respondent submits that it is not necessary to follow out the said proceedings in order to test the question whether the compearers are entitled to a preference. If the compearers will lodge a claim in the liquidation, the respondent is prepared to deal with the matter on the footing that the compearers had in due time made an application to the Court for leave to proceed, and if the compearers are dissatisfied with the ranking given to them, they can object to the ranking in the ordinary way."

On 25th July 1907 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Mackenzie) refused the prayer of the note.

The compearers, Anderson's trustees, reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and leave to proceed with the action ought to be granted. In England it had been held that section 163 of the Companies Act of 1862, was controlled by section 87, so that the Court had power to grant leave under section 87 to proceed even in cases which fell under section 163, but the reclaimers admitted that the contrary had been decided in Scotland,¹ and consequently leave to proceed could not be granted here if the case fell under section 163. The present case did not fall under section 163. The case was ruled by the case of the Athole Hydropathic,² which decided that a poinding of the ground at the instance of a heritable creditor was not an "attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution" within the meaning of section 163. The principle of that decision was, that a heritable creditor in bringing a poinding of the ground was not seeking to acquire a preference, but was merely seeking to make effectual a real security which he already had. A superior had an even higher security for his feu-duty in virtue of the hypothec over the moveables on the feu which he acquired by his infestment.³ The Athole Hydropathic case² had been followed,⁴ and it was not inconsistent with Allan v. Cowan,⁵ which decided that a poinding by a rate collector, who had by statute a preference for the rates, was ineffectual after the commencement of the winding-up. The ratio of that judgment was, that while a rate collector had a statutory preference he had no security

¹ Allan v. Cowan, Nov. 15, 1892, 20 R. 36; Radford & Bright, Limited, v. D. M. Stevenson & Co., Feb. 20, 1904, 6 F. 429.

² Athole Hydropathic, Limited, v. Scottish Provincial Assurance Co., March 19, 1886, 13 R. 818.

³ Yuille v. Lawrie & Douglas, Jan. 24, 1823, 2 S. 140; Bell's Comms., Vol. II., pp. 26 and 27.

⁴ Holmes Oil Co., Jan. 18, 1901, 8 S. L. T. 360.

⁵ Allan v. Cowan, 20 R. 36.

over any specific portion of the Company's estate, and consequently that his preference was a preference in ranking merely, to be worked out through the liquidator.¹ The word "sequestration" in section 163 did not include sequestration for rent or feu-duty, which was a distinct species of sequestration,² and when the Legislature meant to include it, it did so per expressum.³ It was true that in the Bankruptcy Acts certain rights and remedies of superiors and heritable creditors were expressly reserved, whereas the Companies Acts did not contain any such reservation; but that was explained by the vesting clause of the Bankruptcy Act, which made an express reservation necessary, while the Companies Acts did not contain any such vesting clause. It might be that section 87 of the Act of 1862, read strictly, did not cover the case of an action commenced without leave after the commencement of the winding-up, but the Court would grant leave in such a case.⁴

Oct. 26, 1907.
Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

Argued for the respondents;—Section 87 of the Act of 1862 contemplated two cases, and two only, namely, leave to proceed with an action commenced before the date of the liquidation, and leave to commence an action after the date of the liquidation; it did not contemplate the case of leave to proceed with an action commenced without leave after the date of the liquidation. It might be that in the case of an ordinary action the Court would grant leave to proceed although the action had been commenced without leave after the date of the liquidation, the leave being held to draw back to the date of the raising of the action. Stevenson v. Radford & Bright,⁴ on which the compearers founded, was a case of that sort; but the question here was a question of diligence, which was strictissimi juris, and the Court would not validate retrospectively proceedings for diligence commenced in breach of the Act. Apart from that, this was a case in which the Court had no power to grant leave. The compearers admitted that if the case fell under section 163 of the Act of 1862 the Court had no power to grant leave under section 87. Section 163 in terms prohibited "sequestration" against the estate and effects of the Company after the commencement of the liquidation. The compearers attempted to get out of that by saying that "sequestration" did not include sequestration for feu-duty. The contrary had been held in England on the evidence of Scots counsel.⁵ But even if the word sequestration was open to the construction put upon it by the compearers, the language of section 163 was so wide as to include every kind of diligence. The compearers' only real support was the case of the Athole Hydropathic.⁶ That case was distinguishable from the present. It was a case of poinding of the ground, and proceeded on the principle that the heritable creditor in such an action did not seek to acquire a preference, but merely to make available a preference already existing; whereas a superior's hypothec was not truly a pre-existing right of security depending wholly on his infestment, but was a right which required the diligence of sequestration in order to be made real.⁷ In truth, however, the case of the *Athole Hydropathic*⁶

¹ Allan v. Cowan, 20 R. 36, per Lord Kinnear, at pp. 40-41.

² Bell's Dictionary, p. 976.

³ Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 3, 7, 107.

⁴ D. M. Stevenson & Co. v. Radford & Bright, Limited, June 4, 1902, 10 S. L. T. 82.

⁵ In re Wanzer, Limited, L. R., [1891] 1 Ch. 305.

⁶ 13 R. 818.

⁷ Ersk. ii., 6, 56, and 62.

Oct. 26, 1907. could not stand along with Allan v. Cowan,¹ which was the sound judgment. No good reason could be suggested for putting a heritable creditor or a superior in a more favourable position than a creditor with a statutory preference. Further, subsection (3) of section 3 of the Companies Act of 1886, while it incorporated various sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, did not incorporate section 119, which reserved the landlord's right of hypothec, nor did the Act of 1886 contain any such reservation of the rights of superiors as was contained in section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

At advising,—

LORD LOW.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills must be recalled. I think the only question is, whether the present case is ruled by the judgment in the Athole Hydropathic case² or by that in the case of Allan.¹ I think it is conceded that there is no substantial difference between the position of the creditor here and the creditor in the Athole Hydropathic case.² There the creditor was a heritable creditor infeft in the lands, who was seeking, by the diligence of poinding, to make good the security which he had over the moveables upon the land. In this case the creditor is the superior, who is seeking to make good, by the diligence of sequestration, the security which he has over the moveables upon the land for arrears of feu-duty. It seems to me that for the purposes of this question the position of these two creditors was identical, because both of them had a right of security in regard to certain moveables, and in both cases what they were attempting to do was to make that right of security effectual by attaching the moveables. In the Athole Hydropathic case² it was found that such a proceeding did not fall within the meaning of the 163d section of the Companies Act of 1862. I recognise that the question raised in that case was one of very considerable difficulty, upon which different views might very well be held. But the case was fully argued in the First Division, and the judgment that was given was a considered judgment of Lord President Inglis, of Lord Shand, and of Lord Adam—a tribunal of unquestionably high authority—and the view which they took has been held to rule the law ever since its date, some twenty years ago.

It is said, however, that the more recent decision of the same Division in the case of *Allan*¹ really is not consistent with the view which was taken in the Athole Hydropathic case.² As it happened, I was the Lord Ordinary in the case of Allan,¹ and it seemed to me that it was ruled by the case of the Athole Hydropathic.² But a different view was taken, and I am now satisfied was rightly taken, by the First Division, because the creditor in the case of *Allan*¹ was the collector of the county assessments, and he founded upon a statutory provision to the effect that the debt for the assessments should be a preferable debt. I think that I was perhaps misled to some extent by the way the case had been put in the Athole Hydropathic case,² when it was said that the creditor was only seeking to make effectual a preference which he already had. But, as I have indicated, when that case is examined, the ground of judgment was that he was seeking to make effectual, not a preference in the sense of having a preferable debt, but a reference in the sense of having a security for his debt. Now, in the case of *Allan*¹ the creditor had no security for his debt whatever. He had merely a statutory declaration that in the event of bankruptcy his debt should be dealt with as a preferable debt. I am therefore satisfied that the First Division were quite right in holding that the case of *Allan*¹ was not ruled by the previous case of the Athole Hydropathic.²

¹ 20 R. 36.

² 13 R. 818.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation.)

I therefore think that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be recalled, and leave granted to the superior to proceed with the sequestration notwithstanding the liquidation of the debtors.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I entirely agree. I think that this case is precisely ruled by the judgment twenty years ago of the First Division in the Athole Hydropathic case.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that no two cases could be nearer to one another than the Athole case² and this case. I think the one is practically the same as the other. And as regards the case of Allan,¹ it distinguishes very clearly between such a case as we have at present and the case with which the Court were then dealing. It does so absolutely, and the decision in Allan's case¹ in no way affects the decision of the First Division in the case of the Athole Hydropathic.²

Mr Constable stated a very ingenious argument to the effect that if the decision to be given in this case was to be in accordance with the case of the Athole Hydropathic,² certain logical consequences would follow in other cases. I do not know whether that is so or not, nor do I think it necessarily follows. But if it be true that certain logical consequences would follow, that is a matter for the Legislature to deal with and not for this Court. Therefore, although the argument of Mr Constable was very ingenious we cannot go behind the case of the Athole Hydropathic.²

LORD ARDWALL was sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note against the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, dated 25th July 1907, recall the same: Find the sequestration at the instance of the reclaimers competent: Authorise them to proceed therewith, and decern," &c.

W. & T. P. MANUEL, W.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

MRS CATHERINE GILLIES OR DENHOLM AND OTHERS (John Denholm's Trustees), First Parties.—C. H. Brown. No. 12.

MRS CATHERINE GILLIES OR DENHOLM, Second Party.—C. H. Brown. Oct. 29, 1907.

THOMAS DENHOLM AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Valentine.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Ademption—"Carriage"—Motor-Car.—The proprietor of an estate died in January 1907 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated in 1890. In it he directed his trus-

¹ 20 R. 36.

² 13 R. 818.

Oct. 29, 1907. tees to make over his landed estate to his wife, and with certain small exceptions his whole "furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, and bed and table linen, and also my horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements."

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm.

At the date of his settlement the testator had carriages and horses, but subsequently he sold these and bought two motor-cars, which he possessed at the time of his death.

Held that the bequest of carriages included the motor-cars.

1ST DIVISION. JOHN DENHOLM, of Eastwoodmains, Renfrewshire, died on 3d January 1907, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 22d October 1890, by which he conveyed to trustees, for the purposes therein mentioned, his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The purposes were as follows:—“(First) for payment of all my just and lawful debts and sickbed and funeral expenses; (secondly) I direct my trustees to make payment to the said James Ferguson of a legacy of £250 free of legacy-duty; (thirdly) I direct my trustees to deliver to my brother Thomas my gold watch, breechloading gun, and all my body clothing, together with all articles of every description belonging to me that are at Greenhill at the time of my decease; (fourthly) I direct my trustees to make over to my said wife Kate Gillies or Denholm my whole other furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, and bed and table linen, and also my horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements; (fifthly) I direct my trustees to make over to my said wife Kate Gillies or Denholm my lands and estate of Eastwoodmains. . . .” He directed one half of the residue to be given to his wife, and the other half to be divided among his brother’s children and a sister’s children.

A question having arisen regarding the construction of the deed, this special case was presented, to which the parties were (1) the trustees, (2) the testator’s widow, and (3) the other residuary legatees.

The case stated:—“3. Mr Denholm resided at The Mains, a small residential estate near Giffnock, about five miles south of Glasgow on the Kilmarnock Road. That estate adjoins and is surrounded on three sides by his estate of Eastwoodmains. He left estate amounting to about £53,000. For many years Mr Denholm kept a brougham and a wagonette and one carriage horse, and occasionally a riding horse; but about four years ago he bought a 10 H.P. Argyle open motor-car, and got his coachman trained to drive it. Shortly thereafter he sold his wagonette and horses but retained his brougham, for which he occasionally got a horse on hire. About a year before his death he bought another motor-car—a 16 H.P. Argyle brougham motor-car—and he then sold his brougham. These motor-cars were in his possession at his death, and they are valued for Government duty purposes at £75 and £450 respectively. Deceased’s furniture and plenishing, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements, other than the effects bequeathed to Thomas Denholm, are valued at £474. A question has arisen as to whether the bequest in favour of the second party contained in the above recited fourth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement carries the motor-cars to the second party or not.”

The second party contended that the motor-cars in question were bequeathed to her. The third parties contended that they formed part of the residue of the trust-estate.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Is the second party entitled to the said motor-cars in virtue of the bequest in her favour contained in the said fourth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement? or (2) Do the said motor-cars fall to be included in the residue of the testator's estate under the last purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement?"

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm.

Argued for the second party;—It was the intention of the testator that the motor-cars in question should go to his wife. The scheme of his settlement was to bequeath to her his estate of Eastwoodmains, with all the plenishing required for her enjoyment of the same, including the means of locomotion which he was using himself at the date of his death. There was nothing in the word "carriage" to prevent it including motor-cars. Under the Revenue Statutes, for the purpose of Excise duties, the term "carriage" included any vehicle whether drawn by horses or propelled by mechanical power. The case of *In re Platt*¹ was distinguishable on the grounds that there was there no general bequest of plenishing, that the references to "harness and saddlery" shewed that only horse carriages were meant, and that the testator in that case owned both horse and motor-carriages when he died. In the present case, it was immaterial that the testator had no knowledge of motor-cars at the time when he executed his will. It was enough that he owned motors at his death, and that he had left a will in terms which could fairly be held to include motor-cars.

Argued for the third parties;—The second party could take no benefit from the word "plenishing," which was only intended to include articles of the nature of those specified in the first part of the list, namely, from "books" to "table linen." The collocation of the words "horses" and "carriage" shewed that what the testator intended to convey were horse carriages. The bequest to the widow was a specific bequest, and accordingly the time for ascertaining the extent of the bequest was the date of the execution of the will, not the date of the testator's death. There could be no doubt that when the will was executed, it was horse carriages which the testator had in his mind. These carriages having been sold, and the subject specifically bequeathed having thus ceased to exist at the testator's death, the legacy to the widow had been adeemed.²

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The parties in this special case are on the one hand the trustees and the residuary legatees of the late Mr John Denholm, and on the other the truster's widow; and the question arises on the interpretation of a clause in his trust-disposition and settlement. That trust-disposition and settlement was dated in 1890, but Mr Denholm did not die until 1907. He thereby made over all his property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and then he proceeded to state the trust purposes. The first direction to his trustees was to pay a legacy to a certain gentleman, and the second was to deliver to his brother Thomas certain specific articles, which may be described as articles particularly appropriate to a man. Then he proceeded in the fourth purpose to direct his trustees "to make over to my

¹ In re Platt, "The Times," April 20, 1907, per Kekewich J.

² White & Tudor's Equity Cases, 7th ed., vol. i., pp. 808, 812, 819; Dean v. Gibson, 1867, L. R., 2 Eq. 713; Ashburner v. Macguire, 1786, 2 Bro. Ch. 108.

Oct. 29, 1907. said wife my whole other furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, and bed and table linen, and also my horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements." He next bequeathed to his wife the lands and estate of Eastwoodmains, and finally gave directions as to his residue.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm.

Ld. President.

Now, the point is whether under the bequest in this fourth purpose the wife has, or has not, right to two motor-cars, which were in the premises of the deceased at the time of his death. At the time of the execution of the will in 1890 the testator was not in possession of any motor-cars. That was not much to be wondered at, because, although motor-cars had as a matter of fact been invented in 1890, there were very few indeed of them in the United Kingdom at that time. But as time went on motor-cars became common, and the deceased Mr Denholm first bought one motor-car, and relinquished part of his stable establishment, and afterwards got a second motor-car, and gave up keeping horses altogether, so that at the time of his death he did not have any means of locomotion except motor-cars, one being an open car, and the other a brougham or landaulette. The whole point is whether these motor-cars fall within the expression which I have read.

Of course, this is a matter of intention, and the first observation I have to make is that one cannot read the testator's settlement without seeing that he wanted—speaking generally—his wife to have the whole moveable property that was connected with the enjoyment of his house, all except those special articles, which would not have been appropriate to a lady, namely, the breechloading gun and body clothing, which he gave to his brother Thomas. That being the testator's intention, the only question which remains is whether the words he used were sufficient to give effect to that intention, and that depends upon whether the word "carriage" can be held to include motor-cars. I think one is entitled to construe the word "carriages" in the will of the testator in the light of what the testator himself had done, and I think that the testator when alive shewed that he had come to consider these motor-cars as his carriages. The word "carriage" itself is certainly wide enough to cover any form of vehicle in which you are carried, though it has secondary significations which vary according to the context. It may be admitted that the ordinary sense of the word "carriage" is a carriage drawn by horses, but to shew how its meaning varies, I may take this illustration. I do not suppose that anyone would doubt that a dog-cart would fall under the designation of "carriages," and yet there is as little doubt that if a person who kept a dog-cart and a landau or barouche, sent round to his stable and said, "I want the carriage," that would be regarded as equivalent to an order to send the barouche or landau, and not the dog-cart. I accordingly think that the word "carriage" is a term sufficiently elastic to include motor-cars, and that when this gentleman allowed his will to remain unaltered, knowing that he had actually replaced his horse carriages by motor carriages, he intended the bequest of his carriages to include his motor-cars. I am therefore for answering the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The first point that was taken by the residuary legatees was that the testator had no motor-cars in his possession at the time of making his will, and that what he meant by the word "carriages" must be ascertained by reference to his actual possession at that date. If that were sound, it would, as a logical consequence, prevent the widow from receiving any of the other articles, which were left to her in the same sentence, except on condition of shewing that they belonged to the testator at the time of making the will. But the contention appears to me to be entirely without foundation. I do not come to that conclusion upon any rule of law as to the date at which a will should be held to speak, but as mere matter of construction of the plain meaning of the words used in this particular will. We cannot construe a particular clause in a will disjoined from the rest, but we must take in the whole deed in order to see what the testator really means; and the first thing that strikes one in this settlement is that the testator clearly intends to dispose, not of the property, which he had at the time, because he might have changed it considerably before his death, but of the whole real and personal property of every kind and description which should belong to him at the time of his death. That is the description, at the outset, of the property he means to dispose of. When he comes to deal with the particular kind of property with which we are concerned now, he begins, in the first place, by leaving certain things to his brother Thomas, and he says that the trustees are to deliver to his brother Thomas "my gold watch, breechloading gun, and all my body clothing, together with all articles of every description belonging to me that are at Greenhill at the time of my decease." I understand that Greenhill was the house where his brother lived. Well, then, he was to have all the articles that are at Greenhill "at the time of my decease." Then he goes on to make the provision in question for his wife. He says that she is to have all the other furniture and plenishing, including certain specified things. Now, it seems to me plain on the collocation of these two sentences that the time he had in view in both was the same time. My brother is to get all the things at the time of my death that are in Greenhill, but as for the other things, my wife is to have them. What other things? The other things at the time of my death besides the articles and furniture and so on which are at Greenhill, and which go to my brother. Therefore, it seems to me that the only question that really requires consideration is whether the words in which he bequeaths to his widow his "carriages" are wide enough to cover the only kind of carriage which he had at the time of his death, that is, motor-cars. I have no hesitation in agreeing with your Lordship that, according to the ordinary use of language, a "motor-car" is a "carriage," because a "carriage" is, as your Lordship said, simply a vehicle for carrying persons.

It is perfectly true, and I entirely agree with the observation of your Lordship, that in ordinary language people very often do use the term "carriage" to describe a particular kind of vehicle in order to distinguish it from some other kind, which nevertheless also falls within the general signification of the word "carriage"; as in the instance your Lordship stated, it is perfectly common and natural that a man should describe a barouche or a landau as a carriage in order to distinguish it from a wagonette or a dog-cart. But when he uses the term not for the purpose

Oct. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm.

Lord Kinnear.

Oct. 29, 1907. of distinguishing between particular articles, which may fall within the meaning of the general word, but for describing all the articles which might possibly be described by it, then it must receive its most comprehensive meaning. I have no doubt at all that it ought to receive its comprehensive meaning in this case, both because I think that is the plain meaning of the words used, and also because when you read the will, as it is right we should read the will, with reference to the statement before us as to the things possessed by the testator at the time of his death, we find that the carriages that he himself was using at the time, and the only carriages, were motor-cars. That the intention of the testator was to put his widow in the same kind of enjoyment of his house and furniture and means of locomotion as he himself had enjoyed during his life seems to me to be plain upon a fair construction of the will. I therefore agree with your Lordship's proposal as to the way in which the questions should be answered.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. It seems clear that the testator, when he subscribed his settlement in 1890, intended to bequeath to his widow the whole accessories, both indoors and out of doors, requisite to her comfortable enjoyment of the landed estate she was to possess. In the latter category were included "my horses and carriages." Mr Denholm owned at that time a horse or horses, and also a brougham and a wagonette. But when he died in January 1907 he had parted with his horses, his brougham, and his wagonette, and had acquired in their stead two motor-cars. It is, to my mind, impossible to suppose that Mr Denholm, though he altered his style of private locomotion in accordance with the march of modern times, intended to alter, and indeed to delete, the bequest to his wife of a comfortable, though not absolutely necessary, item of her enjoyment of the estate which he bequeathed to her. Nor do I think that, looking to the admitted circumstances of his establishment as regards the modes of vehicular conveyance successively employed by him, we shall in the slightest degree strain the language of his settlement if we decide, as your Lordships propose to do, that the motor-cars fall within the expression of his bequest of "carriages." It seems to me therefore that the first question put to us should be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

SMITH & WATT, W.S.—HENRY SMITH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13. JOHN TOAL, Pursuer (Appellant).—J. A. Christie.
 THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
 Oct. 31, 1907. Sol.-Gen. Ure—Grierson.

Toal v. North British Railway Co. Reparation—Negligence—Railway—Failure of railway servants to close carriage doors before setting train in motion.—An action of damages for personal injuries brought against a railway company by a passenger who had been knocked down by an open carriage door as a train was leaving a station, dismissed as irrelevant, where the only averment of negligence against the railway company was that they had failed to close the carriage doors before setting the train in motion.

Oct. 31, 1907.

Toal v. North
British Railway Co.

1st Division.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

JOHN TOAL, craneman, Springburn, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against the North British Railway Company for damages for personal injuries. He averred that on 17th November 1906 he was a passenger by one of the defenders' trains which stopped at College Street Station, Glasgow, where the pursuer alighted. "While he was standing on the platform he was struck and knocked down by an open carriage door, and his leg slipped down between the platform and the train. The train was in motion at the time pursuer was struck, and after it had passed the pursuer fell on to the rails" and received certain injuries.

The pursuer further averred:—"The said accident to the pursuer was due to the fault and negligence of defenders' servants, for whom defenders are responsible. When said train was stopped at said platform there were no porters or officials on the platform to see that the doors of the carriages were closed before the train was restarted. It is the duty of defenders, and is the invariable practice of railway companies, to close the doors of compartments before a train is allowed to leave the station, but this the defenders and their servants culpably and negligently failed to do on the occasion of this accident to pursuer. The defenders and their said servants were also negligent in respect that they set said train in motion without closing said door. If the guard of said train or any of defenders' porters had been on said station and had paid attention to their duty, they would have closed the door which struck pursuer before the train was allowed to restart from said station, and the said accident would have thus been avoided. The pursuer believes and avers that the guard of said train was negligent, and did not come to the platform at said station, and failed to have regard for the safety of pursuer and others on said platform by having said door shut."

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (3 b) The said accident was caused by the pursuer's own fault or negligence, or the pursuer's own fault or negligence materially contributed thereto.

On 24th July 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial.

The defenders, in support of the pleas above given, argued;—This accident might have occurred in the manner alleged although all the doors were closed by the time the train left the platform. The cause of the accident founded on must therefore be that the doors were not closed before the train was started. But there was no duty on a railway company to close the doors before starting the train—if it were so, it would render the punctual working of the railway traffic at many stations quite impossible. The action, therefore, as laid was irrelevant. Further, the pursuer's record in itself disclosed a case of contributory negligence. There was no averment that pursuer had not had time, or was for any other reason unable, to step clear of the carriage doors before the train started, and in the absence of any such averment he must be held in fault for having failed to take that very obvious and necessary precaution.

Argued for the pursuer and appellant;—The action was relevant. The platform was provided for passengers, and to start a train with

Oct. 31, 1907. the doors open so as to injure those standing on the platform was a clear case of negligence on the part of the Railway Company. There was a duty on them to see that the doors were closed.¹ There was no case of contributory negligence disclosed on the pursuer's record. The onus of proving it was on the defenders who founded on it,² and therefore that question must go to proof and be decided by the jury.

—
Toal v. North British Rail-
way Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am unable to find in this record a relevant averment of negligence against the defenders. The pursuer sets forth that on a certain date he travelled in a train which stopped at College Street Station. He alighted. He then says that while he was standing on the platform—he does not tell us how long he had been standing there—he was struck and knocked down by an open carriage door, and his leg slipped down between the platform and the train. The train was in motion at the time the pursuer was struck, and after it had passed the pursuer fell on to the rails. Now, the only facts that are there given to us are that the pursuer got out of the train, that he stood upon the platform, and that while there he was knocked down by an open carriage door. He must, of course, necessarily have been so close to the edge of the platform as to permit of the door knocking him down. The only averment of negligence that is made in these circumstances against the Company is this:—"It is the duty of the defenders, and is the invariable practice of railway companies, to close the doors of compartments before a train is allowed to leave the station." I say in passing that this "leaving the station" is rather an ambiguous phrase, and I rather fancy that the writer of the sentence, which I have just read, meant by "leaving the station," really the starting of the train. The only doubt raised in my mind as to that is that in the next sentence he says this:—"The defenders and their said servants were also negligent in respect that they set said train in motion without closing said door." However that may be, I take the last averment as being the substance of the negligence averred, viz., that there was negligence in respect that the train was set in motion without the doors being closed.

I think that is an impossible averment of negligence to go to a jury, seeing that it is common knowledge, from the practice of railway companies, and indeed from the necessities of the case, that a great deal of the service of suburban trains would be practically impossible, if it were absolutely necessary to close every door before the train was allowed to start. That it is quite a proper precaution for railway servants to close the doors, so far as they can, before the train starts, I do not doubt, but that is a perfectly different thing from saying that, if a door is not closed before the train is allowed to move, there is negligence on the part of the railway company. There is no averment that the train was started so quickly as to give no proper opportunity to alight. All that is said is that it is negligence because the train was started while a door was still open. I do not think that is common-sense. I think therefore your Lordships should dismiss this action, as being wanting in relevancy of averments against the Railway Company. Oct. 31, 1907.

¹ Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Jackson, (1877), L. R., 3 App. Cas. 193, Lord Cairns, at p. 198.

² Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., (1887), L. R., 12 App. Cas. 41, Lord Watson, at p. 47.

I think that is a safer ground to go upon than what was also urged on us—the disclosure of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer in bar, because, although no doubt I do think the chances, so to speak, are all in favour of it being the man's own fault that he allowed himself to be struck by the door of a railway carriage while on the platform, still that is not a universal proposition. There may have been circumstances in which he was not able to get away, and the proof of contributory negligence must, of course, lie upon the person who is alleging it—namely, the defender. But before the defender is put to any such proof there must be a case of negligence against him. It is there I think that this case fails, and I am therefore for dismissing the action.

Toal v. North
British Railway Co.
Ld. President.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I only add that I do not find any averment that the defenders did not give the pursuer time to alight, and that he was knocked down before he had time to step from the carriage to a safe place. There is no averment of that kind, and in the absence of an averment of that kind, I think the case rests exactly as your Lordship has put it.

LORD DUNDAS.—I also agree. I only add that to my mind the case is an extremely plain one.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT dismissed the action.

St CLAIR SWANSON & MANSON, W.S.—JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

COLIN MACANDREW, Petitioner (Appellant).—Chree—Macmillan. No. 14.

JOHN DODS, Respondent.—Hunter, K.C.—A. M. Mackay.

Oct. 31, 1907.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Declinature of Jurisdiction—Disputed question of fact—Sist of cause to enable Court of Session action to be brought—Discretion of Dean of Guild.—A petition having been presented to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect certain buildings, answers were lodged thereto objecting that the proposed buildings were in contravention of certain building restrictions. No proper competition of heritable right was involved, but the matter depended on the construction of certain documents and on evidence as to the precise position of a plot "A" marked on a certain plan which had been lost. The Dean of Guild sisted the petition to enable the petitioner to establish his alleged rights in the Court of Session. Against this interlocutor the petitioner appealed, maintaining that the Dean of Guild should not have declined jurisdiction, but ought to consider and determine the matter himself.

Macandrew
v. Dods.

The Court held that, in the circumstances, it was not expedient to disturb the discretion of the Dean of Guild, and affirmed his interlocutor.

ON 1st June 1907, Colin Macandrew, builder, Edinburgh, presented a petition to the Lord Dean of Guild of the city of Edinburgh, applying for warrant to erect an office building on ground of which he was the proprietor, situated at No. 13 Lauriston Gardens, Edinburgh. Answers to this petition were lodged by John Dods, an adjoining proprietor, who objected to the proposed building on the 1st DIVISION.

Dean of Guild
Court, Edinburgh.

Oct. 31, 1907.

Macandrew
v. Dods.

ground that it would contravene certain building restrictions which, as he alleged, were binding on the petitioner.

The petitioner's ground and the respondent's ground formed part of the lands of Lauriston Lodge, and were held under titles derived from a common author. The petitioner's ground was held by him under a disposition, dated March and April 1889, granted in his favour by Mrs Beattie, widow of the deceased George Beattie, and others, as trustees therein mentioned. That disposition contained the following provision :—" Declaring that the said Colin Macandrew and his foresaids shall be bound, as by acceptance hereof he binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, not to feu the piece of ground hereby disposed except for the building of villas, unless with the consent of the feuars in Lauriston Gardens, to whom we or our predecessors in office, as trustees foresaid, have undertaken the like obligation in the feu-rights granted by us or our foresaids, and also that in so far as we are or may be held to be under any obligation ourselves not to erect on the said piece of ground any other buildings than villas, unless with consent foresaid, the said Colin Macandrew and his foresaids shall be under the same obligation, it not being intended to impose on them any obligation against themselves erecting other buildings than villas unless such obligation already exists upon us, in which case the same obligation shall continue to exist, and shall be binding on them ; which burden, obligation, and declaration hereinbefore contained are hereby created and declared to be real servitudes and burdens upon and affecting the piece of ground before disposed, and as such are appointed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines as part of these presents, and inserted or validly referred to in any notarial instrument to follow hereon, and in all future transmissions and investitures of the said piece of ground, or any part or portion thereof, under pain of nullity of the deed, writ, or instrument from which the same shall be omitted."

The respondent's title was based on a feu-contract, dated September 1863, entered into between George Beattie and others, as trustees therein mentioned, of the first part, and the respondent's author, William Gibson, of the second part. The ground feued was described with reference to a feuing-plan of the lands of Lauriston Lodge, made out by James Lorimer, civil engineer in Edinburgh, and the feu-contract contained this provision :—" The said feuing-plan being referred to for no other purpose whatever than as shewing the position of the ground hereby feued, the said parties of the first part reserving right to themselves and their successors to deviate therefrom as they shall think proper in regard to the unfeued ground, except that the said feuing ground shall only be feued for the erection of villas, but declaring that the house of Lauriston Lodge and grounds surrounding the same as shewn on said plan which have now been feued shall not be used for such purposes as shall be a nuisance to the said William Gibson and the other feuars, and declaring that no buildings shall be erected by the said parties of the first part, or by their feuars, on the ground of Lauriston Lodge southward of the plot of ground marked A on the said feuing-plan feued to Adam Beattie to the extent of the breadth of that plot on the south side thereof, and to the south boundary of the ground of Lauriston Lodge, of greater height than the boundary wall of the back ground of the houses, being six feet high, with the exception of summer-houses which may be erected of a greater height, and the said parties of the first part shall take the feuars from them bound to this effect, and to submit to them the plans of any contemplated summer-houses, and to obtain the approval of the party of the second part or his foresaids before erection thereof." Oct. 31, 1907.

Macandrew
v. Dods.

The petitioner averred that no part of the proposed building would occupy the ground, or a part of the ground, southward of the plot marked "A" on the said plan; while the respondent averred that part of the proposed building would occupy ground southward of that plot.

The petitioner pleaded;—(2) As the erection of the proposed buildings involves no violation of any conditions in the petitioner's or respondent's title, warrant therefor should be granted.

The respondent pleaded;—(3) The operations proposed by the petitioner being in direct violation and contravention of the conditions and restrictions contained in his title-deeds, he is not entitled to warrant as craved, and the same ought to be refused. (4) The respondent having right in virtue of the obligations in his favour contained in his title-deeds to object to the operations proposed, and the respondent having so objected, the warrant craved by the petitioner ought to be refused.

In 1899 the petitioner had made a similar application to the Dean of Guild Court, and on that occasion the then Dean of Guild sisted the petition to enable the rights of parties to be established in the competent Court, but no further steps were taken.

In the present proceedings the respondent admitted that the feuing-plan prepared by James Lorimer had been lost, but proposed to lead evidence to establish the position of the plot of ground that had been marked "A" on that plan.

On 8th August 1907 the Dean of Guild, without taking evidence, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties and considered the whole cause, sists the petition to enable the petitioner to establish his alleged rights in the Court of Session, and decerns." *

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—No question of heritable right was involved here, but merely a question of the construction of certain documents. (1) The petitioner's title—Neither in the petitioner's title itself nor as devolving upon him from his authors was there any prohibition of the erection of other buildings than villas. All that was prohibited was feuing for the erection of other buildings than villas. The petitioner's authors had not feued to him, they had dispoed, and the petitioner did not propose to feu to anybody. Therefore, strictly read, the titles imported no restriction on the petitioner from erecting the buildings he

* The concluding paragraph of the note annexed by the Dean of Guild to his interlocutor was as follows:—"In 1899 the petitioner made a similar application to this Court, and the respondent avers that that application was for warrant for a building on the same land as the petitioner now proposes to build on. The application in 1899 was opposed by the then owner of the respondent's feu. This Court sisted the petition in 1899 to enable the rights of parties to be established in the competent Court. The petitioner did not proceed after this Court's judgment in 1899 to establish his alleged rights. The Dean of Guild sees no reason for going back on the judgment of the Court in 1899, and therefore he again sists the petitioner's application, and for the reasons expressed in his opinion in 1899 he thinks that it lies on the petitioner to establish his rights."

Oct. 31, 1907.

Macandrew
v. Dods.

proposed to erect.¹ (2) The respondent's title—The provisions in favour of the respondent created no known servitude over the petitioner's property, but only a building restriction, and therefore were not binding on the petitioner, as they were not contained in nor had been imported into the petitioner's title.² Consequently the position of the plot "A" on the lost plan was immaterial, and no inquiry was necessary. Both these points could be competently disposed of by the Dean of Guild, and should have been disposed of by him, and it was not right that the petitioner should be subjected to the delay and expense of a Court of Session action. The case should therefore be sent back to the Dean of Guild to be disposed of, or, as it was now competently before this Court, it might be disposed of by them. Even if an inquiry were found to be necessary, it should take place before the Dean of Guild.

Argued for the respondent;—The questions involved here were difficult and complicated, and in addition an inquiry was necessary, and it was within the discretion of the Dean of Guild to sist the cause and allow the matter to be determined in a Court of Session action. (1) The petitioner's title—This title, fairly read, clearly implied a prohibition against the erection of buildings other than villas.³ (2) The respondent's title—The provisions therein contained created a known servitude—that of altius non tollendi—and were therefore binding on the petitioner without entering his titles.⁴ Consequently an inquiry into the position of plot "A" on the lost plan was necessary. It was more expedient that such an inquiry should take place in the Court of Session, and therefore the Dean of Guild had wisely exercised his discretion in not allowing that inquiry to take place, and these difficult questions of construction to be settled, in a Dean of Guild process.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is not one that comes under quite ordinary circumstances. The proprietor of ground in Edinburgh wished some years ago to put up certain buildings. He was then opposed upon grounds which depended upon rights as shewn in the title both of the opponent and of himself, and at that time the Dean of Guild pronounced an interlocutor sisting the case, because he considered that the matter had better be determined in an action at law, and not by pronouncing an interlocutor upon the merits of the case in the Dean of Guild Court. The proprietor at that time acquiesced in that view, and did nothing. He gave up for the time his proposal to build, and he did not raise an action. He now comes back again to the Dean of Guild Court, and he repeats his crave to have a decree of lining granted, and the Dean of Guild of the present time has repeated the interlocutor of his predecessor. An appeal has been taken against that interlocutor by the person who wants to build. His counsel has urged

¹ Assets Co., Limited, v. Lamb & Gibson, March 6, 1896, 23 R. 569.

² Liddall v. Duncan, July 12, 1898, 25 R. 1119; Murray's Trustees v. St Margaret's Convent, July 20, 1906, 8 F. 1109, affd. 1907, S. C. (H. L.) 8; Morier v. Brownlie & Watson, Nov. 1, 1895, 23 R. 67.

³ Sandeman's Trustees v. Brown, Dec. 15, 1892, 20 R. 210; Assets Co., Limited, v. Ogilvie, Jan. 23, 1897, 24 R. 400.

⁴ Mearns v. Massie, Dec. 5, 1800, Hume, p. 736; More's Stair, note W, on Servitudes, p. ccxxi.; Gray v. Ferguson, Jan. 31, 1792, M. 14,513; Ersk. ii., 9, 35.

upon your Lordships that the Dean of Guild here has unduly withheld his own jurisdiction, and that the case ought to go back to him again with a behest from your Lordships that he should proceed to dispose of the merits of the case.

Oct. 31, 1907.
Macandrew v. Dods.
Ld. President.

Now, I am exceedingly far from laying down the proposition that it is not proper for the Dean of Guild to take up questions of legal restriction, where there is no proper competition of heritable right, and where the questions are merely whether the restriction applies or not, however hard and difficult these questions may be. The books are full of cases where the Dean of Guild in the first instance has had to decide difficult legal questions, and his decisions have come up for review in this Court. If this case had been one where the whole question turned upon the construction of a legal document, and upon construction alone, then I think your Lordships would have been probably inclined, either to send it back to the Dean of Guild or, as has been urged by counsel, to have proceeded at once yourselves to a determination of the case. But when the particular restrictions that we have to deal with here are brought before our notice, it is abundantly made clear to me that there is one of them at least that cannot be finally determined without settling a disputed question of fact, and accordingly there has got to be an inquiry.

Now, I am certainly not going to start the idea that parties, who want an inquiry into these matters, are entitled to come to the Inner-House and to ask the Inner-House to have an inquiry before themselves. Accordingly the only form of inquiry that should be allowed is either to send the case back to the Dean of Guild for inquiry or allow the matter to be raised at law. I do not say that if the Dean of Guild had chosen to take up an inquiry any objection would have been made. But he did not. It was a question of discretion, and it was a question of discretion in circumstances where he found that his predecessor had pronounced an interlocutor to that effect some years before, and that no opportunity had been taken to give effect to that interlocutor. That being so, I do not think it is expedient, in the circumstances of this case, to disturb the discretion of the Dean of Guild. I think, therefore, that as there are difficult questions here of construction, and also one question resting upon the determination of fact, they had better be determined by an action at law; all the more that the question of fact seems to me to be a question of fact which really will turn upon questions of evidence rather than upon questions of a practical character, such as the Dean of Guild is specially entitled to determine. We are told here that the plan upon which this matter turns is lost. It is, therefore, not a question of simply going to the ground with a plan—that is to say, it is not a surveyor's question, where the Dean of Guild certainly would be a very good person to determine it. It really comes to be a question of evidence. What sort of evidence I do not quite know, but I suppose it will either be whether certain adminicles will do instead of the plan, or whether these adminicles have been so lost that, the plan also being lost, the restriction, such as it is, must be held pro non scripto. All these things depend upon legal and not upon surveying considerations. I therefore think that in the whole circumstances of the case, which I look upon as a peculiar one, the Dean of Guild was right, and your Lordships should affirm

Oct. 31, 1907. his interlocutor; the case, of course, being sisted in order that the petitioner may raise the question by appropriate action at law.
 Macandrew
 v. Dods.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship.

LORD DUNDAS.—I also agree.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Affirm the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild dated 8th August 1907, and remit the cause to him: Find the appellant liable to the respondent in the expenses of the appeal. . . ."

MENZIES, BRUCE-LOW, & THOMSON, W.S.—WAUGH & M'LACHLAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

ARTHUR MACFARLANE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Hunter, K.C.—Lyon Mackenzie.

Nov. 1, 1907.

WILLIAM NEWBY COLAM, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Campbell—W. Thomson.

Macfarlane v.
 Colam.

Reparation—Negligence—Duty to public—Road—Horses shying at motor-car left unattended—Breach of statutory provisions—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 123, incorporating the General Turnpike Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43), sec. 96.—The driver of a motor-car drew up his car at the side of the road, leaving ample room for traffic to pass, stopped the engine, and left the car there unattended, while he paid a visit of fifteen minutes to a house near by. While he was away the horses of a passing wagonette shied at the motor-car, and got out of control, and damage was done to the wagonette and to the horses. The owner of the wagonette having raised an action of damages against the owner of the motor-car, the Sheriff-substitute held that the driver of the car was in breach of section 96 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831, in leaving the car unattended, and that the accident had resulted therefrom, and awarded damages.

In an appeal, the Court recalled that interlocutor, and assolized the defender, on the ground that the accident had not resulted from the car being left unattended, but through the shying of the horses and the inability of the driver to control them.

1ST DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Inverness,
 Elgin, and Nairn.

ARTHUR MACFARLANE, horsehirer, Kingussie, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Inverness against William Newby Colam, civil engineer, Newtonmore, praying for decree for £38, as reparation for damages sustained by a wagonette and two horses belonging to him. He averred that on 30th July 1906 the wagonette and the pair of horses were being driven from Glentruim to Kingussie; that at a point on the road between Newtonmore and Kingussie it approached a motor-car belonging to the defender, which had been left standing on the road without any person in charge*; and that "in consequence of

* The General Turnpike Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43), sec. 96, enacts, inter alia,—"If any person shall leave any waggon, cart, or other carriage whatever upon such road or upon the side or sides thereof without any proper person in the sole custody or care thereof longer than may be necessary to load or unload the same . . . or shall not place such waggon or other carriage during the time of loading or unloading the same, or of taking refreshments, as near to one side of the road as conveniently the car being unattended, and occupying so much of the road, the horses on approaching the car took fright, ran against a stone wall, and upset the wagonette," whereby the damage in question was occasioned. Nov. 1, 1907.

Macfarlane v.
Colam.

A proof was allowed and led. The facts established at the proof were thus set forth by the Sheriff-substitute (J. P. Grant) in his note :—

" The motor-car belonging to the defender in this case was left by his son upon the roadway of the public road between Kingussie and Newtonmore about 6 P.M. on the afternoon of 30th July 1906. No person was left in charge of the car, but Mr Colam junr. had stopped the machinery and disconnected it, in this complying with the Motor-Car Regulations on the point.

" A wagonette and a pair of horses belonging to the pursuer came from the direction of Newtonmore, and the horses taking fright at the motor-car, the wagonette was overturned and the horses and the wagonette damaged.

" The driver of the wagonette was a careful and experienced man, and in no way by his fault contributed to the accident.

" The available breadth of the roadway was a little more than 15 feet, of that the car occupied about one-third, leaving about 10 feet passage for the wagonette. There was a stone wall on the opposite side of the road to the car, so that there was no possibility of expanding the space by going on the verge.

" There was thus no absolute obstruction of the highway; ten feet of an opening are enough for the passage of a wagonette and pair, assuming the driver was of ordinary skill and the horses perfectly quiet.

" There was a grass verge to the road on the side on which the motor-car lay, but it was not a place where Mr Colam could have placed his car, having reasonable regard to its care, nor could he prudently have placed it on either of the approaches of the house which he was visiting, an unfinished house his father was building."

On 12th March 1907 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—" Finds in fact that about 6 P.M. on 30th July 1906 the defender's motor-car was left by the defender's son upon the public road without any proper person in the sole custody or care thereof: That a pair of horses, the property of the pursuer, drawing a wagonette, also the property of the pursuer, took fright at the said motor-car and upset the wagonette, causing damage to themselves and the wagonette: and in law that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer or his servant driving the wagonette, and that the defender is liable to the pursuer for the damage may be, either with or without any horse or beast of draught harnessed or yoked thereto," he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty shillings.

The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 123, enacts, inter alia, that the above enactment, in so far as the same is not inconsistent therewith, shall be and is incorporated with the Act, and in any county shall extend and apply to all the highways made or to be made within such county.

The Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 1 (b), enacts :—" A light locomotive shall be deemed to be a carriage within the meaning of any Act of Parliament, whether public general, or local, and of any rule, regulation, or bye-law made under any Act of Parliament"

Nov. 1, 1907. sustained, and assesses the same at £33, 10s. sterling, for which sum decerns against the defender: Finds the pursuer entitled to his expenses of process from the defender; allows," &c.*

Macfarlane v.
Colam.

The defender appealed to the First Division. On counsel for the appellant opening the case he was stopped by the Court and counsel for the respondent was called on.

Argued for the respondent;—The driver of the car was in breach of a statutory enactment in leaving his car on the road unattended, and as that had caused or contributed to the accident, he must be held liable in reparation. Such use, too, as had here been made of the high road was an unwarrantable use, and rendered the defender liable for any accident caused thereby.¹

* "NOTE.—(After the narrative of the facts quoted supra)—There remains the one point on which culpa may be inferred on the part of young Mr Colam, whether he acted in breach of the statutory regulations under the Road Acts in leaving his car unattended on the highway. Section 96 of 1 and 2 William IV. cap. 43, as incorporated in the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, section 123, inter alia, enacts—(The Sheriff-substitute quoted the sections printed ante).

"Mr R. L. Colam did leave the car in question on the road without any proper person in the sole custody or care thereof. I cannot doubt that the fact of the car being there was the immediate cause of the accident. The horses were skilfully driven; they had passed motors in motion eight times that day without becoming unmanageable, and no other cause can be suggested for this accident than this stationary and unattended motor-car placed where it ought not to be according to the Road Acts. There is thus, I consider, a direct relation between young Mr Colam's act and the damage that resulted.

"There remain to be considered the exceptions to the statute. During the time necessarily required for loading and unloading or for taking refreshments, a carriage may be left unattended if placed as near to one side of the road as conveniently may be, that is, on either side, not necessarily the proper side in passing. These particulars Mr Colam complied with. The car was practically close to the side on which his business lay. No allegation of 'refreshment' was raised, and all that is left is the question whether his absence was no longer than was requisite in 'unloading.' The object of his journey was to take some vases—fragile articles—to the new house; if that had been done expeditiously and he had returned to the car without delay, it might have been soundly maintained that this was 'unloading' in the sense of the Act, but the evidence shews, I think, that he stayed longer in the house than was absolutely requisite to deposit the vases. His return was occasioned by the accident itself—not actuated by the desire to return to his motor as soon as possible, and he admits having been ten minutes in the house, though the architect, Mr Cameron, puts it at a shorter period of time.

"I conclude, therefore, that the accident was occasioned by Mr R. L. Colam's breach of the statute, and that his father was responsible, as he was on his father's business. I think it is true, as some witnesses say, that horses are more ready to take fright on a country road than in a town street, where there are a variety of sounds and sights to distract their attention; but that does not enter into my reasons of judgment any more than what my private opinion may be as to the reasonableness of this section of the Act which I have to administer. I must hold that Mr R. L. Colam was in fault in leaving his car unattended, and the defender is liable for the direct consequences of his so doing."

¹ Harris v. Mobbs, (1878), L. R., 3 Ex. D. 268; Wilkins v. Day, (1883), L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 110.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my view this is really a most preposterous case. Nov. 1, 1907. The driver of a motor-car, in order to go up to a house, leaves it on a road, Macfarlane v. and he leaves it in such a position that there is plenty of room for other Colam. vehicles to pass. He goes up to the house, leaving the car standing, and is absent for about fifteen minutes. He had stopped the car and the machinery was not running, and therefore it was not an object of terror to anything else on the road by means of noise. It merely stood there on the side of the road. Another man comes along driving a pair of horses, and when he gets beside the car the horses shy and he has not sufficient control of them to prevent them getting into the ditch, whereby the carriage is injured and one of the horses is injured. He then brings an action against the owner of the motor-car.

The only ground upon which the Sheriff-substitute has allowed the case is that he finds that under a well-known section of the Turnpike Act no vehicle must be left unattended on the roadway, for which there is a fifty shilling penalty, and then he finds that this car was left unattended, and goes on,—“I cannot doubt that the fact of the car being there was the immediate cause of the accident.” It was the immediate cause in the sense that it was the object at which the horses shied. The car being unattended was, in the Sheriff’s view, a contravention of the statute. All I can say is that if that were so there would be a great many convictions. I will assume, however, that there could have been a conviction under the statute. But the fact of the car being unattended did not make it something which became more terrifying than it otherwise would have been, for this good reason, that while it is quite true that the presence of a man, and especially if he use his voice, calms horses, the car might have been well attended with the man sitting behind the car and not visible. In the whole circumstances I think the case is quite irrelevant. It would have been a different thing if the car had been placed so as to cause an obstruction to the highway, but upon the facts, agreeing with the Sheriff, I do not think there was any obstruction. I advise your Lordships to recall the interlocutor, find in fact that the leaving of the car in the position described did not constitute an obstruction of the highway; find that the leaving of the car unattended had no relation to the accident, and that the same happened through the shying of the horses and the inability of the driver to control them; find in law that the defender is not liable to the pursuer in damages, and assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

LORD DUNDAS.—I also concur. I observe that the Sheriff-substitute does not in his interlocutor make any finding of fault on the part of the defender, but in his note he “concludes” that “the accident was occasioned by Mr R. L. Colam’s breach of the statute.” I am unable to see any relation of cause and effect between the breach of the statute (assuming there was a breach) and the accident to the pursuer’s horses and wagonette.

LORD M’LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustain the appeal:
Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 12th

Nov. 1, 1907.

Macfarlane v.
Colam.

March 1907: Find in fact (1) that the leaving of the car in the position described did not constitute an obstruction to the highway: (2) that the leaving of the car for the time without a person in attendance had no relation to the accident; and (3) that the same happened through the shying of the horses and the inability of the driver to control them: Therefore find in law that the defender is not liable in damages to the pursuer: Assolzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the pursuer liable to the defender in expenses."

FLETCHER & BAILLIE, W.S.—PETER MACNAUGHTON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 16.

ANDREW KENNETH M'DOUALL, Complainer (Appellant).—Chree—W. T. Watson.

Nov. 2, 1907.

ARCHIBALD IRVINE, Respondent.—Moncrieff.

M'Douall v.
Irvine.

Game—Title to prosecute—Informer—Partridges Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 34).—Held that the Partridges Act, 1799, did not give a title to a private individual, as informer, to prosecute for a penalty under the Act, and that the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal did not supply the defect in the instance.

Question whether the Procurator-fiscal would have had a title to prosecute.

EXTRA
DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

ANDREW KENNETH M'DOUALL, of Logan, with concurrence of John Marquis Rankin, solicitor, Procurator-fiscal of Court at Stranraer, for the public interest, brought a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, in the Sheriff Court of Dumfries and Galloway, at Stranraer, against Archibald Irvine, labourer, Drummore.

The complaint set forth that the respondent did on 22d May 1907, on the public road leading from Stranraer to Drummore and on the seashore ex adverso of the said road, "kill and take a partridge in close time, that is to say, between 1st February and 1st September, both in the year 1907, contrary to the Partridges Act, 1799, section 3, whereby the respondent is liable to a penalty not exceeding £5." *

* The Partridges Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 34), enacts:—Sec. 3. "And be it further enacted, that, from and after the passing of this Act, no person or persons shall, on any pretence whatsoever, take, kill, destroy, carry, sell, buy, or have in his, her, or their possession or use, any partridge within the kingdom of Great Britain, between the first day of February and the first day of September in any year; and if any person or persons shall transgress this Act in the case aforesaid, every such person shall be liable to the same penalty as, by the" Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, "is laid and imposed on any person or persons transgressing the same; such penalty to be imposed, inflicted, recovered, applied, and disposed of, in such and the same manner, and under such and the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, as in and by the said Act is provided and directed with respect to the penalty thereby imposed on persons transgressing the said Act."

The Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, enacts:—Sec. 4. "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any person or persons shall transgress this Act in any of the aforesaid cases, and shall be lawfully convicted thereof by the oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses, every such person shall, for every partridge, pheasant, heath fowl, or grouse, so taken, killed, destroyed, carried, sold, bought, or found, in his, her, or their possession or use, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this Act, forfeit and pay the sum of £5 to the person or persons who shall inform or sue for the same: And it shall and may be lawful to and for any person or persons to

When the complaint had been read in the Sheriff Court the agent Nov. 2, 1907.
for the respondent stated, inter alia, the following objections:—(1) M'Douall v.
No jurisdiction. (2) No title or interest on the part of the complainer, Irvine.
Andrew Kenneth M'Douall, to sue.

The Sheriff-substitute (Watson) sustained the second objection, and dismissed the complaint.

The complainer appealed from this decision by way of stated case. The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Has the appellant, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, sufficient title to prosecute the present complaint?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, and 39 Geo. III. cap. 34, read together, gave the appellant a title to prosecute this complaint. It was true that it was provided in the Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, that it should apply only to England, and the terms of section 4 thereof were applicable to English procedure and referred to actions in the Courts at Westminster, but the Act 39 Geo. III. cap. 34, brought in that section by reference, and, accordingly, it must be held as applying in Scotland; and as the Scottish Courts had jurisdiction the terms of the Act must be adapted to the procedure in these Courts, and could not be treated as confined to the Courts at Westminster. The Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, repealed the above-mentioned Acts, but only as to England.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant founded on section 4 of the Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 as making an exception to the general rule that the public prosecutor has the sole title to prosecute in the public interest in Scotland. But that section was repealed by the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32, for although the repeal was limited to England, yet as the Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19 applied only to England, the result was that the Act was wholly repealed. Accordingly the reference to section 4 of the Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, in the Partridges Act was of no effect. Even if the section were held not to be repealed, it was limited in its terms to the Courts at Westminster, and could not be held to extend to Scotland.¹ Unless the right to prosecute in the public interest was expressly given to a private person such person had no title to do so, and if the private person had himself no title, the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal would not cure the defect.²

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this case my opinion may be stated in a few words. The complaint charges the defender with taking partridges in close time and prosecute for, and recover, the said penalty of £5, with full costs of suit, by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster; and in such action or suit, no essoin, wager of law, or more than one imparlance, shall be allowed."

Sec. 3 of the Act provides that nothing contained in it shall extend to Scotland.

The Game Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 32), sec. 48 of which provides that nothing in the Act contained shall extend to Scotland, by sec. 1 repeals "as to that part of the United Kingdom called England" the Acts 39 Geo. III. cap. 34, and 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

¹ Hutcheson's Office of Justice of the Peace (3d ed.), vol. ii., p. 566, note (c); Ness's Game Laws of Scotland, p. 123.

² Duke of Bedford v. Kerr, May 22, 1893, 20 R. (J. C.) 65, per Lord Adam, at p. 67.

Nov. 2, 1907. contrary to the Partridges Act, 1799, section 3, and lays claim to a penalty not exceeding £5. Now, on referring to this statute, we find that it prohibits the taking of partridges within a close time there defined, and prescribes that the penalty may be recovered under the powers of an earlier statute, 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

M'Douall v. Irvine.

Lord M'Laren.

The Partridges Act, 1799, applies to Scotland, but the Act of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, makes no provision for the recovery of penalties in the Courts of Scotland, but only provides for the recovery of penalties in the King's Courts at Westminster. The reference to 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, is therefore ineffective so far as Scotland is concerned—at all events, in cases where the penalty is sued for by a private prosecutor; and in my opinion the Sheriff-substitute has rightly dismissed the complaint.

The ground of judgment is want of title to sue, and in the stated case this is the only point brought under review. If the Sheriff-substitute had found that he had no jurisdiction, I should have been disposed to affirm the judgment. But I think the preferable ground of decision is want of title; because it may be that without any special statutory title the Lord Advocate or the Procurator-fiscal has a title to prosecute wherever an illegal act is penalised and no provision is made for recovery of the penalty. By sustaining the plea of want of title on the part of a private prosecutor we keep this question open. I, of course, give no opinion as to whether taking partridges in close time may be the subject of a prosecution or complaint under any statute other than the Partridges Act, 1799.

We answer the question in the negative, and affirm the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

LORD PEARSON.—I agree that this prosecution must fail; and I desire to explain very briefly the grounds of my opinion. The complainer is in the position of a common informer who has obtained the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal. The complaint is laid upon what is now styled the Partridges Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. cap. 34). That Act had for its main purpose to introduce a uniform close time for partridges in Great Britain, namely, from 1st February to 1st September. Unfortunately, in the matter of imposing and recovering the penalty, the Act referred to a statute of 1761 (2 Geo. III. cap. 19), which was a purely English statute providing for the recovery of the penalty "in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster" by any person who might inform or sue for the same. That procedure, or whatever its modern equivalent may be, would obviously be futile at the instance of a common informer complaining of a contravention of the Act within Scotland; and I have not heard any suggestion as to the source from which a private informer in Scotland can derive a title to prosecute in any Scotch Court without express statutory authority. It is otherwise with the Public Prosecutor, who, as a general rule, can prosecute before the Sheriff Court for penalties which a statute has imposed without expressly enacting how the penalty is to be recovered.

I would not, however, be held as expressing any opinion as to whether a prosecution in the present case under the Act 1799 would have been competent in the Sheriff Court at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal himself. It may be that the express reference back to the Act of 1761 in the matter of imposing and recovering the fine excludes any implied authority to the Nov. 2, 1907.

 Procurator-fiscal to take proceedings under the Act of 1799 in a Scottish ^{M'Donnell v.}
 Court. In determining that question which is not now before us, it would ^{Irvine.}
 be pertinent to consider whether there is any other remedy open; and in ^{Lord Pearson.} particular, whether the Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. cap. 54) does not apply, notwithstanding its partial repeal in 1796 by an Act which was itself repealed without any saving clause in 1799—(36 Geo. III. cap. 54; 39 Geo. III. cap. 34).

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree with both your Lordships. The complaint which initiated the proceedings giving rise to the appeal in the present case is founded solely upon the Partridges Act, 1799, 39 Geo. III. cap. 34, section
 3. Inter alia, the objection was taken that the complainer had no title or interest to sue, and this objection has been sustained by the Sheriff-substitute and he dismissed the complaint.

I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's decision is right.

The leading Scotch Act relating to close time for game is 13 Geo. III.
 cap. 54, and under this statute the close time for partridges was fixed to be from 1st February till 1st September. Under that Act (section 8) it was provided that all offences under it might be tried before two or more Justices of the Peace or the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute of the county, and that the prosecutions might proceed either at the instance of the fiscal of the Court at which the prosecution might be brought or by any other person who should inform or complain.

With respect to partridges, the period of close time formerly regulated by the above statute was altered by 36 Geo. III. cap. 54, which made it unlawful to kill partridges between the 1st day of February and the 14th day of September in any year, and it provided that any person doing so in Scotland should incur the same penalties and forfeitures as by the Act of 13 Geo. III.
 cap. 54, and under the same rules.

Matters remained in this situation until the year 1799, when the Act 36
 Geo. III. cap. 54, was repealed by the Act 39 Geo. III. cap. 34. The commencement of the season for killing partridges was then altered from the 14th to the 1st day of September, and this was declared to apply to the whole of the kingdom of Great Britain, and then the third section of the Partridges Act, 1799, proceeded to say that any person transgressing the Act should be liable to the same penalty, and to be recovered in the same way, as is provided by the Act of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19.

Referring now to the Act of 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, it does not appear that the penalty there prescribed is recoverable in any of the Courts in Scotland but only in any of the Courts of Record at Westminster. This view derives support from the observations of Mr Hutcheson in his work upon Justices of the Peace, volume ii., p. 566, note C, and a case was tried in the Sheriff Court of Dumfriesshire referred to in a Treatise on the Game Laws by John William Ness, 1818, p. 123, in which it was held that the statutory penalty of £5 could not be recovered in the Sheriff Court. It will be noticed that by the Act 2 Geo. III. cap. 19, it is declared that nothing therein "contained shall be construed to extend to that part of Great Britain called Scotland." I think it follows from these provisions of 2 Geo. III.

Nov. 2, 1907. cap. 19, that the provision to the effect that an informer may prosecute for a penalty under the Act cannot be held to apply to Scotland, because such an informer is only authorised to prosecute for a penalty in the Courts at Westminster. Now, without statutory authority a private informer is not in Scotland entitled to prosecute for penalties or fines, and if this is so the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal cannot supply the defect in the instance of a complaint brought by a private informer—Duke of Bedford.¹ In the present case the complainer prosecutes merely in the character of an informer, because it is not maintained that he had any other interest in the matter, the offence having been committed not on land belonging to the complainer but on the seashore.

M'Donnell v. Irvine.
Lord Ardwall.

I am accordingly of opinion that under the Act of 1799, which is the only Act we have to deal with in this case, the complainer had no title to prosecute the complaint in question, that the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal did not supply the defect in the instance, and that accordingly we should answer the question put in the stated case in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

E. A. & F. HUNTER & CO., W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 17. THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF GOVAN COMBINATION, First Parties.—D.-F. Campbell—Orr Deas.
Nov. 2, 1907. THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF GLASSARY, Second Parties.—Hunter, K.C.—Addison Smith.
Govan Parish Council v. Glassary Parish Council.

Poor—Settlement—Capacity to acquire Settlement—Puberty—Education (Scotland) Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 9), secs. 1 and 2.—The first section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1901, enacts, that it shall be the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education for his children who are between five and fourteen years of age, and the second section prohibits any person from taking into his employment any child between twelve and fourteen years of age who has not obtained an exemption from the School Board.

Held that the capacity of a female child to acquire a residential settlement on attaining puberty at twelve years of age was not affected by these enactments.

1ST DIVISION. JOANNA MARGARET ROBERTSON MACKENZIE was born at Lochgilphead, in the parish of Glassary, on 19th December 1885, and was the lawful child of John Mackenzie, who died in February 1894, without having a residential settlement in any parish. From 3d July 1894 until 15th April 1902 she resided continuously in the Orphan Homes, Whiteinch, in the parish of Govan, and during her residence there, up to the age of fifteen, she was sent out each day to a public school for her education. From the date on which she left the Orphan Homes at Whiteinch, until 8th May 1904, she was in domestic service, and on the latter date she was admitted to the Govan District Asylum as a lunatic pauper. Until about two weeks before her admission to the asylum, she was a bright and intelligent girl.

In these circumstances this special case was presented by (1) the Parish Council of the parish of Govan Combination, and (2) the Parish Council of the parish of Glassary, for the determination of the question whether the burden of supporting the pauper fell upon the parish of Govan, where she had resided for four years and four months after attaining the age of puberty, or upon the parish of Glassary, the parish of her birth. The case set forth the facts above narrated.

¹ 20 R. (J. C.) 65.

Nov. 2, 1907.

Govan Parish
Counoil v.
Glassary
Parish Council.

The first parties maintained that in consequence of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1901, sections 1 and 2, no child was now capable of acquiring an independent settlement until it attained the age of fourteen.*

The second parties maintained that no change had been made by the Education Act in the time at which a child became capable of acquiring a settlement.

Both parties admitted that, if no change had been made by the Act on the existing law by which a female child, whose father was dead, became capable of acquiring a settlement on reaching puberty at twelve years of age, then in the present case the pauper had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Govan, which was in that event the parish liable to support her; but if, on the contrary, it was now the law that no child could acquire a settlement until it was fourteen years of age, that no residential settlement had been acquired by this pauper, and that the parish of her birth was liable for her maintenance.¹

The questions of law were:—“(1) Did the said Joanna Margaret Robertson Mackenzie, the pauper, become capable of acquiring an independent settlement on attaining the age of twelve years? or did she become capable of acquiring an independent settlement only on attaining the age of fourteen years? (2) Are the first parties, the Parish Council of the parish of Govan Combination, liable for the maintenance of the said Joanna Margaret Robertson Mackenzie, the pauper, so long as she continues chargeable? or are the second parties, the Parish Council of the parish of Glassary, liable for such maintenance?”

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me that this is a very plain case. It is admitted that but for the Education Act this case falls directly under the

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 9), enacts:—

Sec. 1. “It shall be the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children who are between five and fourteen years of age.”

Sec. 2. “It shall not be lawful for any person to take into his employment any child . . . (2) who, being of the age of twelve years and not more than fourteen years, has not obtained exemption from the obligation to attend school from the School Board of the district in the manner provided in the next following section; nor shall any child . . . (2) who, being of the age of twelve years and not more than fourteen years, has not been exempted from the obligation to attend school in manner aforesaid, be employed in any casual employment as defined by section 6 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 78), after nine o’clock at night, from the first day of April to the first day of October, and after seven o’clock at night, from the first day of October to the first day of April.”

¹ The following authorities were referred to:—Craig v. Greig & Macdonald, July 18, 1863, 1 Macph. 1172; M’Lennan v. Waite, June 28, 1872, 10 Macph. 908; Inspector of Poor of St Cuthbert’s v. Inspector of Poor of Cramond, Nov. 12, 1873, 1 R. 174; Greig v. Ross, Feb. 10, 1877, 4 R. 465; Parochial Board of Elgin v. Parochial Board of Kinloss, June 1, 1893, 20 R. 763.

Nov. 2, 1907. decision in Craig v. Greig & Macdonald,¹ because here is a child, with her father dead, who, since the time of the father's death, and at her puberty, acquired a residential settlement. Now, the only thing that is said to prevent the application of the decided case is that, since the time of the decision, the Education Act of 1901 has been passed. The Education Act of 1901, by the first section thereof, makes it the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children who are between five and fourteen years of age. Accordingly, the second section prohibits persons from taking into their employment children being of the age of twelve and not more than fourteen, who have not obtained an exemption from the School Board. It is argued that, because of that Act, there is, therefore, a disability upon a female child who, although of the age of puberty, that is to say over twelve, is still under fourteen, doing those things which really go to the acquiring of a residential settlement.

Govan Parish
Council v.
Glassary
Parish Council.
—
Ld. President.

It would be a very curious result if it were so, because undoubtedly I think it is easy to say that the Legislature, in passing the Education Act of 1901, had not the remotest notion that they were dealing with the poor-law. I do not think any such result follows, for a very simple reason. It has been said again and again—alas, too truly—that all these poor-law rules embodied in the decisions are artificial to the highest degree. How artificial in cases of this sort can easily be gathered when one thinks how practically impossible it is for a female child of twelve years of age to earn its own livelihood. But there is the rule, artificial as it is, that when the father is dead, and the child is emancipated and comes to the age of puberty, it is in a position in which it is theoretically supposed to be earning its own livelihood. Therefore, I think the answer to the argument is a very easy one, that although the Act imposes certain duties upon parents to provide the child with elementary education, it does not affect the theoretical capacity of the child to earn its own livelihood. The practical capacity, as I understand, in 999 cases out of 1000 is not there, although, theoretically, it is. One can conceive of a child, who, for some reason or other, was so gifted as to be able to perform upon an instrument such as the violin, and who, at such tender years, could make sufficient money to earn her own livelihood, and who, at the same time, might have quite enough hours of the day which she might devote to reading, writing, and arithmetic. But the answer is a simple one—that the Act which has been quoted has really nothing to do with the subject which is before us. Accordingly, I am for answering the first branch of the first question in the affirmative and the first branch of the second question in the affirmative also.

LORD DUNDAS.—The question raised in this special case is a very short one, and (although it has to deal with a poor-law settlement) I think it is a very simple one. The first parties maintain that, in consequence of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1901, no child can now be held to become capable of acquiring an independent settlement until it has attained the age of fourteen; and they seek to apply that doctrine to the effect that, in the case of females, the age at which they become capable of acquiring such a settlement has been altered from twelve to fourteen. I think that contention is unsound. The Act 1 Edw. VII. c. 9, is entitled "An Act to regulate the Employment and Attendance of Children at School in Scotland." It is an Education Act pure and simple. It does not profess in any way to deal with the poor-law, nor can it, in my judgment, be held to do so by any reasonable implication. I think it is plain, as your Lordship has pointed out, that the statute relied upon has nothing at all to do with the subject of the poor-law. We must therefore, in my opinion, negative the contention of the first parties, and I agree that the questions should be answered as your Lordship proposes.

¹ 1 Macph. 1172.

Nov. 2, 1907.
Govan Parish
Council v.
Glassary
Parish Council.
Lord Dundas.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT answered the first branch of each question in the affirmative.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—R. ADDISON SMITH & Co., W.S.—Agents.

LEGGAT BROTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Hunter, K.C.—Macmillan.

No. 18.

GEORGE GRAY, Defender (Respondent).—M'Clure, K.C.—Constable.
MOSS' EMPIRES, LIMITED, Arrestees.

Nov. 5, 1907.

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

Arrestment—Arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem—Arrestment of debt paid by cheque received before but cashed after arrestment—Bank Cheque—Payment.—A Glasgow firm brought an action in Scotland against Gray, an Englishman, after having used arrestments to found jurisdiction in the hands of a Scotch company, Moss, who were alleged to be due a sum of money to Gray. Gray had already received from Moss a cheque on a Glasgow bank for the amount due, which he indorsed for value prior to the arrestment. The cheque was not presented for payment by the indorsee till the day after the arrestment. It was then duly paid.

Held that delivery of the cheque by Moss to Gray operated as instant payment of the sum due to him by Moss, that consequently, at the time when the arrestments were used, there was no fund in the hands of Moss which could be attached, and that jurisdiction had not been effectually constituted.

Observed that although an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem, after creating jurisdiction, leaves no nexus over the property arrested, yet such an arrestment to be effectual must be laid on property which would be arrestable in execution.

In June 1906 Messrs Leggat Brothers, printers, Glasgow, raised an action of payment in the Court of Session against George Gray, residing in London, after having, on 14th June, in order to found jurisdiction, used arrestments in the hands of Moss' Empires, Limited, a Scottish registered company. On 10th July 1906 decree in absence was pronounced against Gray, and on 8th September 1906 Leggat Brothers having used arrestments in the hands of Moss' Empires in execution of the decree, raised the present action of furthcoming, to which they called as defenders Moss' Empires, Limited, arrestees, and George Gray, principal debtor.

1st Division.
Lord Ardwall.

Nov. 5, 1907.

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

The action was defended by Gray on the ground that the arrestments to found jurisdiction in the original action were inept, and that consequently the decree therein obtained, upon which the arrestments in execution proceeded, was also inept.

The defender's averments were to the following effect: During the week ending Saturday 16th June 1906 he was fulfilling an engagement with Moss' Empires in Glasgow, and he applied to the chief accountant of the Company in London for payment of his salary in advance. In response to this request the chief accountant, by letter, dated 13th June, forwarded to the manager of the Company in Glasgow a cheque on the Commercial Bank, Limited, Glasgow, directly in favour of the defender for the amount of his salary, which was the only sum due to him by the Company. The defender received the cheque from the Glasgow manager on the morning of Thursday, 14th June, and before 2.30 P.M. on the same day indorsed the same and handed it for onerous consideration to a friend, Edward Cosens, who cashed it on the following day. The arrestment to found jurisdiction was not laid on until 4.20 P.M. on the afternoon of Thursday, 14th June, by which time there were no funds belonging to the defender in the hands of the arrestees, and consequently nothing which could be attached by diligence.

The pursuers did not deny that the arrestments were laid on at the time stated by the defender, and that he received a cheque from Moss' Empires, but they denied that he received the cheque on the morning of Thursday, 14th June, and on the contrary averred that it did not reach him until the morning of the following day, and that consequently, when the arrestment was laid on, he had not received payment of his salary, which still remained in the hands of the arrestees.

The pursuers pleaded;—In virtue of the decree and arrestments libelled, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—The decree libelled having been pronounced, and the arrestments libelled having been used by the pursuers without effectually constituting jurisdiction over this defender, and being therefore wrongous and inept, this defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) assoilzied the defender, holding that the arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem had been inept in respect that the cheque was received and indorsed before the arrestments were laid on, and that they did not attach any fund belonging to George Gray.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—Upon the evidence it was proved that the defender did not receive the cheque till the 15th, and that when the arrestments were used on the 14th, his salary was still in the hands of the arrestees. But even assuming it to be the case that the defender received the cheque on the morning of the 14th, it was not cashed till the following day, until which date the defender's salary remained unpaid. The receipt of a cheque did not of itself operate payment to the effect of extinguishing the debt, which, on the contrary, remained due until the cheque was cashed.¹ There was no assignment of the funds of the granter until the cheque was presented for payment, and till then it was no more than a means of Nov. 5, 1907.

* As the legal questions raised in the Inner-House were not argued before the Lord Ordinary, it is unnecessary to refer to his note.

¹ Cohen v. Hale, 1878, 3 Q. B. D. 371.

 procuring payment, not payment itself.¹ Accordingly, when the arrestment in question was laid on, there was, in the full sense of the ^{Leggat} term, a debt due to the defender, which could have been taken in ^{Brothers v.} execution. In any event, even after the cheque was received, there ^{Gray.} remained in the arrestees a contingent liability in the event of the cheque being dishonoured; the indebtedness had not been wholly and irrevocably extinguished, and this was sufficient to validate the arrest-ment. An arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem created no nexus over the property arrested,² and consequently it was immaterial whether or not the subject arrested ultimately proved worthless. It was enough if, at the moment of arrestment, there was even a potential relationship of debtor and creditor between the arrestee and the principal debtor. The arrestment in question was accordingly valid, and, if so, the pursuers were admittedly entitled to decree.

Argued for the defender;—On the evidence it was established that the cheque was received on the 14th June, and, in law, this amounted to payment of the debt. A debt could be discharged in other ways than by payment in legal tender. According to the ordinary course of mercantile dealings, and according to the intention of parties in the present case, payment by cheque was equivalent to payment in cash, and extinguished the debt.³ In any event, after the defender had indorsed the cheque to Cosens, which he did before the date of the arrestment, it could not be denied that he had received payment of his debt by means of the cheque, seeing that he had parted with it for valuable consideration, and had no longer any claim under it, a cheque being a negotiable instrument, and the title to sue upon it having passed to the indorsee.⁴ Admittedly, if the cheque was dishonoured, the debtor's liability revived, this being the resolute condition upon which payment by cheque was considered to satisfy the debt.⁵ Further, if the cheque were stopped by the debtor—a thing which he was under no obligation to do even if the debt were arrested in his hands before the cheque was cashed⁶—it might be that the arrestment would attach funds still in the hands of the debtor,—and that was all that was established by the case of *Cohen*⁷ relied on by the pursuers. But that had no bearing on the case where, as here, the cheque was not stopped, but, on the contrary, was duly presented and cashed.
 The liability of the arrestees to make repayment of the debt in an event which never occurred, was not a subject which was capable of arrestment, seeing that, had it been made the subject of an arrestment

¹ Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), secs. 53 and 74.

² North v. Stewart, July 14, 1890, 17 R. (H. L.) 60.

³ Carter v. Johnstone, March 5, 1886, 13 R. 698; Glasgow Pavilion, Limited, v. Motherwell, Nov. 18, 1903, 6 F. 116; Bell's Comm. ii. 202, 203; Bell's Prin., sec. 2327; Pearce v. Davis, 1834, 1 Moody & Rob. 365; Carmarthen, &c., Railway v. Manchester, &c., Railway, 1873, L. R., 8 C. P. 685; Chitty on Contracts (14th ed.), 628; Byles on Bills (16th ed.), 24.

⁴ M'Lean v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, March 2, 1883, 10 R. 719, aff. Nov. 27, 1883, 11 R. (H. L.) 1.

⁵ Belshaw v. Bush, 1851, 11 Scott's C. B. Rep. 191, at p. 207; Currie v. Misa, 1875, L. R., 10 Ex. 153, at p. 163; Stott v. Fairland, 1883, 53 L. J., Q. B. 47; cf. Hall v. Pritchett, 1877, 3 Q. B. D. 215.

⁶ In re Palmer, 1881, 19 Ch. D. 409; Elwell v. Jackson, 1884, 1 Cab. & El. 362.

⁷ 3 Q. B. D. 371.

Nov. 5, 1907. in execution, it would have produced nothing which could have been made available to the creditor using the arrestment. That was the true test in the question whether a subject was arrestable to found jurisdiction, even though it is true that an arrestment to found jurisdiction created no nexus over the subject arrested.¹

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mr Gray, who is the defender in this action of furthcoming, granted a guarantee in favour of Messrs Leggat Brothers, the pursuers, for a debt due to them by one Mussett. Mussett had not paid his debt, and Messrs Leggat were anxious to raise an action against Gray upon the guarantee, Gray having refused to pay without legal process. Gray was an Englishman, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts, and accordingly Messrs Leggat sought to subject him to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of Moss' Empires, Limited, a Scottish registered company, who owed Gray money from time to time in respect that Gray was a person who took engagements with Moss' Empires. With that purpose Messrs Leggat used arrestments in the hands of Moss' Empires, Limited, at 4.20 P.M. upon Thursday, 14th June. The arrestment was immediately followed by service of the action, and in that action Messrs Leggat eventually obtained a decree in absence. They subsequently on the dependence of the action arrested other sums of money, and the present action is one of furthcoming as regards the sums of money so arrested. The defence to the action is that there was no jurisdiction in the action in which decree was got, and the defence of no jurisdiction admittedly depends on whether the arrestments ad fundandam were good or not. There is a good deal of controversy as to the precise state of the facts, but in order to see the questions that arise, I may take first what is common ground between the parties. There is no doubt that during the week, which began on Monday the 11th and ended on Saturday the 16th of June, Gray was fulfilling an engagement for which Moss' Empires would owe him a salary, and in ordinary course the salary would have been paid at the end of the week. There is no doubt also that Gray, having had a hint that it was possible that he might be proceeded against under this guarantee, had telegraphed to Moss' head office in London requesting that his salary might be paid before the usual day; and there is no doubt that, acceding to that request, Moss' Empires' office in London sent, during the course of the week, a cheque made out directly to Gray, which they addressed to the Glasgow manager, Mussett, with directions to him to hand it over to Gray.

Now, the controversy on the facts is when that cheque arrived and was handed over. Gray says that it arrived on the morning of Thursday the 14th, and that it was then handed over by him to a certain friend of his, Cosens, for value, the value consisting partly in a sum which he had already received from Cosens, and partly in an undertaking on Cosen's part to give him the balance of the cheque. Leggat Brothers, the pursuers, on the other hand, contend that the cheque was not received until the morning of Friday the 15th, and was then handed to Gray. It is common ground between Nov. 5, 1907. the parties that the cheque, as a matter of fact, was cashed in the early morning of Friday the 15th, although there is again a discrepancy of statement, the pursuers saying that it was cashed by Gray himself, and the defender saying that it was cashed by Cosens. As I have already said, the arrestments were laid on at 4.20 on Thursday afternoon, and the question arises whether at that time there was anything to arrest.

¹ North v. Stewart, 17 R. (H. L.) 60; Craig v. Brunsgaard, Kjosterud & Co., Feb. 7, 1896, 23 R. 500.

We had a very satisfactory and good argument from the bar in this case, and a point has been raised in the Inner-House which does not seem to have been argued before the Lord Ordinary, and which logically comes first, because if the decision on it were to go in a certain way it would make inquiry as to the disputed facts unnecessary. The pursuers who, of course, are contending for the validity of the arrestments, say that even supposing the defender's story were correct, i.e., that the cheque arrived on Thursday morning and was indorsed or handed to someone else even for value on that Thursday, yet, inasmuch as it was admittedly not cashed until Friday, therefore at a quarter past four on Thursday afternoon there was still a debt owing by Moss to Gray. In other words, they say that the effect of handing the cheque by the debtor to the creditor is not to operate payment, but that the relation of debtor and creditor still exists until the cheque is cashed and the creditor, either directly or through someone else, gets possession of the money.

In order to investigate that question I think it is first of all necessary to clear one's mind upon the true nature of an arrestment. There is a great deal of authority, and there has, at one time or another, been a good deal of controversy upon the precise nature of an arrestment ad fundandam. I am not going through all these authorities to trace the development of the doctrine, but I think I am correctly summarising them when I say this. All admit that the proceeding is exceedingly anomalous. Nobody exactly knows what was its historical origin, but I think that while there has been perhaps a vacillation of opinion as to whether an arrestment ad fundandam does or does not create a nexus upon the property arrested, the opinion has come to be quite settled that although no nexus is created—at least after jurisdiction is founded and the action has commenced—yet the origin of the whole proceeding can be traced to the idea that, when the arrestment was laid on, there was some property to be taken in execution.

I think the authority which most directly supports what I am now saying is the case of Trowsdale's Trustee v. Forcett Railway Company.¹ The question there was as to the class of subject that was arrestable. The Lord Justice-Clerk there says²:—"It is perfectly true that in point of fact an arrestment ad fundandam does not fix the subject arrested within the jurisdiction, for the arrestee may safely part with it, and it so far differs from an arrestment in execution; but it does not follow, and is not in my opinion the law, that there is any difference between the two kinds of arrestment in regard to the subjects arrestable. I know no better statement of the law than is to be found in the opinion of Lord Corehouse (concurring in by a

¹ Nov. 4, 1870, 9 Macph. 88.

² 9 Macph., at p. 92.

Nov. 5, 1907. number of other Judges) in the case of Cameron v. Chapman,¹—‘If,’ says Lord Corehouse, ‘an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa was, as the defenders assume, a process by which a moveable subject is fixed down in this country, and rendered, in so far as jurisdiction is concerned, the same in all respects as a heritable subject, there might be some plausibility in their argument. But assuredly that is not the case. . . . It is not necessary to inquire on what principle the custom is founded of arresting moveables to found the jurisdiction against their owner, being a foreigner. It is plainly in opposition to the general doctrine both of the Roman law and modern jurisprudence, both of which admit the maxim actor sequitur forum rei. It was borrowed in Scotland from the law of Holland, where, as Voet observes, it had been introduced, contrary to principle, from views of expediency, and for the encouragement of commerce. We are of opinion, therefore, that it must not be carried further in any case than is expressly warranted by authority and precedent.’” In the same case of *Trowsdale’s Trustee*² Lord Neaves, after also observing that this arrestment is an exception to the rule that a creditor must go to the forum of his debtor, and that it had been introduced gradually, says³:—“The principle rests on the fact that there is something within the jurisdiction of the Court which can be specifically taken in execution of any decree which may be pronounced.” And accordingly the Court held in that case that there could not be an arrestment ad fundandam founded on the arrestment of books and papers, because these were not articles which could be taken by diligence.

I do not find that there is any subsequent authority which in any way infringes the authority of Trowsdale,² and in particular, I do not find anything inconsistent with that in a judgment, which is, of course, of paramount weight and authority—the judgment of the House of Lords in North v. Stewart.⁴ Lord Watson there also refers to the earlier history of arrestments, and says:—“The sole purpose and effect of an attachment”—that is the modern form of arrestment ad fundandam—“is to fix the locality of the subjects arrested in Scotland, and thereby to render their foreign owner liable to be convened in a process issuing from the Court of Session at the instance of the arrester for recovery of a personal debt. As soon as the foreign owner has been duly made a party to that process, the arrestment is spent, and the arrestee is no longer, as in a question with the arrester, under any obligation to retain in his hands the moveables which it affected.” But that is entirely consistent. In other words the doctrine, which after a certain amount of doubt, especially, I think, as shewn in the case of Malone & M’Gibbon v. The Caledonian Railway Company,⁵ may now be held to be firmly established by the case of *North*⁴—the doctrine, namely, that an arrestment ad fundandam does not create a nexus as against the arrestee which prevents him from parting with the subjects—that doctrine is perfectly consistent with the other doctrine that the origin of the process was the idea that there should be property which could be taken in execution; and consequently, when you are considering whether a subject is arrestable

¹ 16 S. 907, at p. 918.

² 9 Macph., at p. 95.

³ 11 R. 853.

⁴ 9 Macph. 88.

⁵ 17 R. (H. L.) 60.

to found jurisdiction, as was being considered in the case of Trowdale's Nov. 5, 1907. Trustee,¹ the true criterion is whether the subject is something which, if it were arrested in execution and the diligence were worked out, could be made available by the creditor in the debt. Leggat Brothers v.
Gray.

Now, I find the same idea developed in the dictum of Lord Kinnear in the case of Lucas' Trustees.² His Lordship there says³:—"An arrestment and furthcoming is an adjudication preceded by an attachment, and the essential part of the diligence is the adjudication. It follows that an arrestment is futile unless it can be followed up and the diligence worked out by a decree effectually transferring from the common debtor to the arresting creditor the obligation which was originally prestable to the former by the arrestee. The proceedings for this purpose may vary according to the nature of the debt." Now, no doubt, in that case his Lordship is speaking of furthcomings upon arrestments which had been used in dependence. But if, as I have submitted to your Lordships, the origin of the arrestment ad fundandam rested upon the same principle, then the test, which is a good test for an arrestment in execution, is an equally good test for an arrestment ad fundandam. That being so, and assuming the facts to be as stated by the defender, I come to the question whether there was anything in this case which could have been made available to a creditor by the arrestee. That is to say, Moss' Empires having by the time when the arrestment was laid on sent a cheque in payment of their debt which had been received by Gray, was there anything resting owing by Moss to Gray which could have been made available in execution? I am bound to say I think clearly not. I think that really the question here resolves itself into one of ordinary mercantile dealing. In one sense, there can be no payment except in legal tender duly received, but in another sense there can be payment, and there is payment every day, which is made otherwise than by legal tender. The most familiar instance is payment by bank-notes—by any bank-notes in Scotland, and by bank-notes other than Bank of England notes in England. That is an ordinary and common form of payment. Well, in modern times I think it is an equally common form of payment to pay by a cheque upon the debtor's own bank account. A cheque, after all, is merely an order on a third person to pay, and it is very analogous to an order on a third person to hand over hard cash. It is perfectly true and quite obvious that when a creditor takes a cheque he takes it on the hypothesis that the cheque is going to be honoured, but if when he goes to the bank the cheque is not honoured, either by the bank refusing to pay, or by the bank being unable to pay, as would be the case if it had stopped payment in the interval, then there is no question that he would still have an action against his original debtor. But I do not think that that very obvious consideration creates any difficulty or alters the state of affairs when a cheque is ordinarily taken in payment. I do not know that it is necessary to refer the matter to any particular legal category, but if it is, I should rather suppose that the honouring of the cheque was a condition resolute,

¹ 9 Macph. 88.

² Lucas' Trustees v. Campbell & Scott, July 20, 1894, 21 R. 1096.

³ 21 R., p. 1103.

Nov. 5, 1907. and that if payment of the cheque failed to be made, the effect would be that no payment had been made, and the original debt would be set up again. But I am really not concerned as to whether that, which is after all a mere theory, is right or not. The point remains that according to ordinary commercial practice payment by cheque is recognised, and it seems to me that payment is complete the moment that the creditor has accepted the cheque as in payment, subject always to the condition that the cheque will be met when presented.

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

Ld. President.

I have put the matter upon what I think are the ordinary rules of mercantile dealing, but such authority as there is points in the same direction.

I refer particularly to two cases which were quoted to us at the Bar. The first case was that of Carter v. Johnstone,¹ where a distinction is made most markedly between the handing over of a person's own cheque and the indorsing of other people's cheques in which he was the payee, and it was held that one was struck at by the Bankruptcy Act, while the other was saved as a cash payment. Lord Shand after speaking of actual cash payments says:—"It is quite true that certain equivalents to cash payments have been recognised, and in practice at least have been understood to be effectual and not struck at by the statute. A draft or order purchased from a banker and transmitted to a creditor in another town, and a debtor's cheque on his own banker . . . have all been regarded as equivalents for cash payments, or different forms of making cash payments." And Lord Adam in the same case says:—"It is said that these indorsements were granted in the ordinary course of trade, and that a bank cheque on a man's own bank being equivalent to cash, the rule should be extended to such a case as the present. The two cases, however, are very different; in the first place, in actual business a draft on a man's own banker is universally held to be equivalent to a cash payment." The second case was that of the Glasgow Pavilion, Limited,² where Lord Young says:—"Now, that payment by a cheque which is accepted and duly honoured is a payment in cash, as the expression is used in our law, is, I think, a question not capable of being easily disputed. No creditor is bound to receive payment of a debt due to him by cheque or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm. A creditor may even refuse to accept Scottish bank-notes, and insist on his debtor bringing him current coin of the realm to the amount of his debt. Nevertheless, if he choose to accept these bank-notes in payment, I do not think it is capable of being disputed that he would be held, according to our law and practice, to have been paid in cash. In the same way if he receives, although not bound to do so, a cheque from his debtor, and gives him a receipt for the sum contained in the cheque, that is regarded as a payment in cash if the cheque is duly honoured, and the payment in cash is not at the date of the honouring of the cheque, but at the date of its receipt by the creditor." That seems to me precisely to meet the case in point. Although there the Court was dealing with the application of the principle to a different matter—namely, the question whether the directors of a company before proceeding to allotment had received payment of the requisite sum in respect of the shares applied for, yet I do not think that the difference of application makes any difference to the doctrine. Nov. 5, 1907.

¹ 13 R. 698.

² 6 F. 116.

Certain English authorities were quoted to us. One of them seemed at first sight to be adverse to the opinion I have expressed—I refer to the case of *Cohen v. Hale*¹—but I have come to be satisfied that it is not. That was a case where there was a garnishee order, which is very analogous to an arrestment. The question came to be whether the garnishee order had attached anything. In that case the garnishees had granted a cheque in payment of the debt, but the cheque was stopped before it was presented. The whole point of the judgment is that when a cheque is stopped it is as if it had never existed, and that does not of course touch the question of what is the effect when the cheque is not stopped, but, on the contrary, passes into the hands of the person to whom it is made out and is eventually cashed. I think the matter is made quite clear by the decision in the case of In re Palmer,² where it was held that there was no duty in a person who had given a cheque to stop it in the interests of any other creditors. As little can there possibly be a duty in the interests of those who wish to do diligence. Accordingly, upon this part of the case I am clearly of opinion that, assuming the cheque to have been received by Gray on the morning of Thursday the 14th, that paid the debt subject to the condition that the cheque should be honoured, which it was. Accordingly, at twenty minutes past four on Thursday afternoon there was no debt due by Moss to Gray, and therefore nothing which could have been made available in a forthcoming if there had been an arrestment in execution in Moss' hands. That being the proper criterion to apply in considering whether or not there was a good arrestment ad fundandam, it follows that the arrestment which was laid on was inept.

Now, that being so, it becomes necessary to consider the facts of the case, because it is obvious that if as a matter of fact the cheque did not reach Gray till the Friday morning, then at the time of the arrestment on Thursday afternoon there was something which was due to Gray by Moss. Nobody supposes that payment is made simply by drawing out a cheque and putting it into the post; there must be reception by the creditor as well as despatch by the debtor. The case here is one that I confess is full of difficulty, and it is full of difficulty because there are very trenchant criticisms which can be made either upon the one story or upon the other; and these criticisms very nearly balance. As I said already we have had a most excellent argument from the Bar which gave us great assistance. I do not disguise that I have had considerable difficulty in making up my mind upon the matter, but in the end I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right.—(His Lordship proceeded to examine the evidence regarding the date at which the cheque was received.)

I therefore come to the conclusion that it would certainly not be wise to disturb the findings in fact of the Lord Ordinary, who after all has seen the witnesses and heard the evidence. If Cosens and Gray are speaking the truth, there can, of course, be no question as to what is the true state of the case. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that we should adhere.

¹ 3 Q. B. D. 371.

² 19 Ch. D. 409.

Nov. 5, 1907.

Leggat
Brothers v.
Gray.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question of difficulty in this case is one of fact, and as that depends on a conflict of testimony, in the course of which each side charges the witnesses of the other with perjury, I should be very slow to differ from the Lord Ordinary, who heard the witnesses, and has given us his opinion upon their credibility. But looking at the evidence independently as we are bound to do, as if it were brought before us for the first time, I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship, and for the same reasons. I agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship, and do not repeat the considerations upon which, I think, that conclusion is justified. I, therefore, take the fact to be that the defender received a cheque from the arrestees in payment of the debt on 14th June, and that the arrestments founding jurisdiction were not used until a later hour of that day. The question therefore is, on that assumption as to fact, was there anything arrested, and I am of opinion with your Lordship that there was nothing. We had a very interesting discussion as to whether the delivery and acceptance of a cheque really extinguished the debt during the interval between its acceptance and the payment of the money by the bank ; but I confess to thinking that the interest of the question is rather abstract and logical than practical. As between a debtor and a creditor the delivery of a cheque payable on demand is, according to the intentions of both parties, payment of the debt ; and it is in fact as well as in intention payment, if there is in truth money in the bank to pay it, and it is cashed. It is beyond all question that Moss intended to pay the defender, and the defender intended to take payment, by cheque payable on demand, and, further, that when the cheque was presented it was duly cashed. As between the debtor and the creditor that seems to make an end of the whole matter. I do not think it is material to consider whether, according to one argument, the payment by cheque is a conditional payment suspended in its full operation until the cheque is cashed, or whether, according to the other view, it merely suspends the creditor's remedies until it is seen whether the cheque will be honoured or not. In either view, there may be a contingent liability still in the debtor if it should turn out that the cheque is not cashed. The question is whether that contingent liability is a proper subject for the diligence of arrestment or not. Now, it appears to me to be perfectly clear that if the arrestment now in dispute had been an arrestment in execution, it would have been inept. There was no interest of the defender's in the hands of the arrestees except, if it be an exception, a potential claim against them on a contingency which did not happen, and which was dependent upon conditions of fact which it is now certain never existed. He might have had a claim if the cheque had been dishonoured, but it was not ; and if that potential claim had been arrested it would have attached nothing, because it would have been perfectly obvious as soon as the arresting creditor proposed to carry his diligence into operation by forthcoming that there was nothing in the hands of the arrestee at the time, the possible contingency on which there might have been something not having happened.

I, of course, keep in view what your Lordship has explained—the distinction between arrestments in execution or on the dependence and arrestments for founding jurisdiction, and we must take it as now settled in law that an arrestment for founding jurisdiction really attaches nothing. But, Nov. 5, 1907. then, it does not follow that such an arrestment will be good if, in fact, ^{Leggat} there is nothing to attach. I think the contrary is the law, because, although ^{Brothers v. Gray.} there is no actual nexus laid upon moveables or debts that are arrested for founding jurisdiction, still in order to make the arrestment effectual at all, ^{Lord Kinnear.} it must bear to attach something which is properly subject to diligence. I cannot find in any of the cases that it has ever been suggested that an arrestment for founding jurisdiction will be good although the subject which it bears to attach was not attachable by arrestment in execution. I think the authority of the case of Trowsdale's Trustee,¹ to which your Lordship referred, is conclusive to the contrary. The doctrine is that, whatever be the origin of arrestment for founding jurisdiction, it proceeds upon the hypothesis that there is in fact something within the jurisdiction of the Court which can be specifically taken in execution of any decree which may be pronounced. I think it is a good test of the validity of an arrestment for founding jurisdiction to inquire whether it purports to affect any property or fund which could be taken in execution.

Now, as I have said, it seems to me perfectly clear that if the arrestment now in question had been an arrestment in execution, or if it had been followed up by arrestment on the dependence of the action, nothing would have been attached, and for that reason and others which your Lordship has given, I am of opinion that this arrestment is altogether inept. If there be any novelty in the question as actually raised (and I think there is, because so far as direct authority goes it is a new point whether this was or was not an effectual arrestment ad fundandam), then I think the rule for our decision is furnished by the opinion of the whole Court in Cameron v. Chapman,² in which Lord Corehouse, after pointing out the opposition between the doctrine of a jurisdiction founded on the arrestment of moveables and the general principles of jurisdiction both in our own law and in the Roman law, goes on to say that while an artificial method has been so established, the Court are of opinion that it must not be carried further in any case than is expressly warranted by authority and precedent. Now, I think we are asked to carry it further in this case than it has ever been carried in any previous decision, so far as I know or counsel at the Bar were able to inform us. I therefore agree that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am entirely of the same opinion and upon the same grounds. Your Lordships have dealt with the case so exhaustively both as regards the law and as regards the facts, which I think present more difficulty than the law, that it would be idle for me to attempt to add further words on my own behalf.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT adhered.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.O.—BLAIR & CADELL, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 9 Macph. 88.

² 16 S. 907.

No. 19.

MARMOR, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—Dickson, K.C.—J. G. Jameson.

Nov. 7, 1907.

WILLIAM HENRY ALEXANDER, Defender (Reclaimer).—Hunter, K.C.—
*Horne.*Marmor,
Limited, v.
Alexander.

Company—Directors' Remuneration—Directors' Expenses—Expenses of travelling to and from Board Meetings—Illegal Payments.—The articles of association of a limited company, after providing for the remuneration of the directors, further provided that the directors "shall be indemnified out of the funds of the company against all costs, charges, losses, damages, and expenses which they shall respectively incur and be put to in the execution of their respective offices."

In an action at the instance of the company against a director for repayment of sums paid to him as his expenses in travelling from his home in Scotland to attend the meetings of the board in London, held that these expenses were not incurred by the director in the execution of his office, and that consequently the payments made to him were illegal and fell to be refunded.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

ON 19th June 1907 Marmor, Limited, a company incorporated under the Companies Act and having its registered office in Finsbury Square, London, brought an action against William Henry Alexander, merchant, Glasgow, one of the directors of the Company, in which they concluded for payment (1) of the sum of £279, 6s., and (2) of the sum of £100. The sum first concluded for—viz., £279, 6s.—consisted of payments made by the Company to Mr Alexander on account of his travelling expenses between Glasgow and London, incurred in attending meetings of the board of directors in London. The sum second concluded for (with which this report is not concerned)—viz., £100—was alleged to be due upon certain shares that had been allotted to Mr Alexander. This action was raised by way of counter action to proceedings at the instance of Mr Alexander against the Company.

The pursuers averred that at a meeting of the directors, on 16th July 1902, at which Mr Alexander was present, a resolution was passed that travelling expenses should be paid to directors. Mr Alexander claimed travelling expenses for his attendance at thirty-eight meetings, at £7, 7s. for each attendance, amounting in all to £279, 6s., and this sum was subsequently paid to him. They further averred:—"The said resolution and the said payment were irregular, ultra vires, and illegal. The Company, its directors, and officers had no power to authorise or make any such payments. The board of directors acted in breach of their duty in sanctioning the said payment of travelling expenses. . . . The defender was not entitled to receive the said sum, and was acting in breach of his duty to the Company in accepting the same." In answer the defender averred:—"Denied. Explained that even if said payment was ultra vires of the Company, the action of the directors in authorising said payment is protected under the articles of association of said Company."

By article 77 of the articles of association of the Company it was provided that,—“The remuneration of the directors shall be a sum of £250 to the chairman and £200 per annum to each other director”; and by article 92 it was further provided that “the directors, trustees, and officers of the Company shall be indemnified out of the funds of the Company against all costs, charges, losses, damages, and expenses which they shall respectively incur and be put to in the execution of their respective offices, or by reason or on account of any contract, Nov. 7, 1907. act, deed, matter, or thing which shall be made, done, permitted, entered into, or executed by them respectively on behalf of or bona fide Marmor, Limited, v. Alexander. in the interest of or with the view of benefiting the Company, notwithstanding that the same may be ultra vires in point of law."

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defender, while acting as director of the Company, having taken payment out of the Company's funds of the sum of £279, 6s. to which he was not entitled, the Company is entitled to repayment of the said sum, in respect that the said payment was illegal, ultra vires, and unauthorised.

The defender pleaded;—(5) The payment now challenged not being illegal or ultra vires of the Company, et separatim being protected by the articles of association of the said Company, the pursuers are not entitled to repayment of the sum claimed.

On 19th October 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced an interlocutor repelling, inter alia, the 5th plea in law for the defender, decerning and ordaining the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £279, 6s., and allowing proof before answer with respect to the conclusion for £100.*

Leave having been granted, the defender reclaimed, and argued that in terms of the articles of association the payment in question was not illegal. He also maintained that in any event the interlocutor, in view of the claim in the counter action, should have taken the form of a finding only.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are here two actions. The leading action was at the instance of Mr Alexander against a company called Marmor, Limited, and in it Mr Alexander sued for fees due to him as director. The defence was that he had already been paid, except as to a certain balance

* "OPINION.—The matter involved in the first conclusion of the summons may, I think, be disposed of upon the pleadings without the necessity of inquiry by way of proof. Payment to the defender of travelling expenses, though made and accepted in perfect bona fides, was, in my opinion, illegal. I find no warrant for it in the articles of association of the Company (No. 20 of process). By article 77 the 'remuneration' of each director (except the chairman) is declared to be £200 per annum. But the defender founds upon article 92, which, under the head of 'Indemnity to Officers,' provides that—[His Lordship quoted the passage from article 92 printed supra]. These words of indemnification are wide; but I do not think that expenses incurred by a director in arriving at the Company's board room to attend meetings (be the distance long or short) can be held to be expenses incurred by him in the execution of his office. Such expenses must, in my judgment, be included in the remuneration for which he agreed to give his services. The director, I take it, executes his office in the board room, but not on the way thither. It is, I consider, part of his ordinary duty, for which he is paid, to go to the place where the meetings are held. I should have come to this conclusion apart from authority, but I am fortified in it by the opinion of Farwell, J. (now L. J.), in the case of Young, 1905, 1 K. B. 687. The clause there under consideration is not, I think, materially different from article 92 of this Company's articles, and I assent to the general observations made by his Lordship as to the position and duty of directors in this matter. The case seems to be a hard one from the defender's point of view. But if my conclusion is sound, it follows that the Company is entitled to recover the sum (first) sued for. . . ."

Nov. 7, 1907. which was tendered ; but the true matter of dispute between the parties was whether, in an accounting between the parties, the Company were entitled to get back from Mr Alexander a sum of £279, 6s., which he had been paid in the name of travelling expenses, and also whether they were entitled to get from him a sum of £100 due upon certain shares which had been allotted to him. The Lord Ordinary held that these questions could not be raised by way of mere defence, but must be raised by counter action, and accordingly a counter action was raised by the Company against Alexander for these two sums. It is in that action that the operative decree of the Lord Ordinary has been pronounced. What his Lordship has done is, he has decerned against Mr Alexander for £279, 6s., and he has allowed a proof as to the £100. In the reclaiming note parties have agreed that there must be a proof about this matter of the £100, as to whether it has been paid or not ; but they are not at one about the £279, 6s.

Now, the first question that arises upon the £279, 6s. is whether the payment as originally made was an illegal payment. It is common ground that the travelling expenses in question are not travelling expenses incurred in any particular journey on which Mr Alexander was sent by the other directors, such as a visit of inspection to quarries or anything of that sort, but simply represent Mr Alexander's own expenses in arriving at the scene of the Company's meetings, the Company's meetings being held in London, whereas Mr Alexander lived in Scotland. It is also common ground between the parties that these expenses were authorised to be made by the directors, and that they have never been submitted to one of the authorising meetings of the Company. In these circumstances Mr Alexander pleads article 92 of the articles of association of the Company, which is in these terms :—"The directors, trustees, and officers of the Company shall be indemnified out of the funds of the Company against all costs, charges, losses, damages, and expenses which they shall respectively incur and be put to in the execution of their respective offices, or by reason or on account of any contract, act, deed, matter, or thing which shall be made, done, permitted, entered into, or executed by them respectively on behalf of or bona fide in the interest of or with the view of benefiting the Company, notwithstanding that the same may be ultra vires in point of law." I am clearly of opinion that these expenses do not come under either of these heads. I do not think that a payment to a director, in order to get from his own dwelling-house to where the Company has its meetings, is an expense which he is put to in the execution of his office. He only begins to execute his office for the Company at the directors' meetings. I am not doubting that a payment of travelling expenses could be perfectly well made to a director where the director, at the request of the other directors, undertakes any special visit of inspection, or undertakes to go anywhere where he would not naturally be in the interests of the Company. If, for instance, this Company had wished any of these quarries inspected, even if these quarries had been in Greece or any other far away part of the world, I do not doubt that it would have been a perfectly good charge to charge the travelling expenses of the director who was sent out there. But the ordinary expense which a man incurs in getting from where he himself chooses to live to the seat of the Company's business does not seem to me to be expense that is incurred in the execution of his office at all. As little Nov. 7, 1907. could it be expense that falls under the second head, which truly deals Marmor, with another and different class of matter altogether. That means that Limited, v. if the directors or officers of the company have done something in the Alexander. interests of the Company bona fide they should be paid for the expenses Ld. President. that they have incurred in that, even although it may be afterwards found to be ultra vires of the Company. That has to do with a different category of circumstances. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion, without any difficulty, that we should start the matter by finding that these expenses were illegally paid by the directors to the particular director, and the consequence is that in a question with the Company he is bound to refund this illegal payment.

(His Lordship proceeded to consider another point raised in the case, and concluded)—Accordingly I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion. As regards the actual form of the judgment he has made a decerniture for payment, which, of course, is not what was meant. I would advise your Lordships to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it decerns the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £279, 6s., and in lieu thereof find that the defender is bound to make payment, and quoad ultra adhere to the interlocutor.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordship in the chair. On the first branch of the case I think it is perfectly clear that directors' duties in general are to be performed at board meetings, for the business of directors of companies necessitates meetings for consultation, and the fees allowed to the directors cover the expenses of going to the board meetings. Of course, if a director is sent anywhere on a delegated duty, it is equally clear that he has to be paid his expenses, because I do not think that his colleagues would be able to secure the services of one of their number to go upon a distant journey except under the condition that he should be relieved of the expenses that he incurred in the interests of the company.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it decerned against the defender for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £279, 6s., and in lieu thereof found that he was bound to make payment of the said sum, and quoad ultra adhered.

BOYD, JAMESON, & YOUNG, W.S.—MORTON, SMART, MACDONALD, & PROSSER, W.S.—
Agents.

No. 20. BARCLAY, CURLE, & COMPANY, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Dickson, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

Nov. 7, 1907.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

SIR JAMES LAING & SONS, LIMITED, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—Clyde, K.C.—C. D. Murray.

Sale—Transference of property—Ship—Property in ship in course of construction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71)—Arrestment—Recall.—A shipbuilder contracted to build a ship for an Italian firm of shipowners. The purchase price was to be paid by instalments at certain stages of the construction. The contract bore that the vessel should not be considered as delivered and finally accepted by the firm until it had passed a certain trial trip. When the ship was completed, and the greater part of the purchase price had been paid, but before the trial trip, the ship was arrested in the hands of the shipbuilders for a debt alleged to be due by the Italian firm to the arresters.

The shipbuilder presented a petition for recall of the arrestments, alleging that the property in the ship had not passed to the Italian firm.

Held that, under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the passing of the property depended on the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract, and, on a construction of the contract, that it was not the intention of the parties here that the property in the ship should pass until it was finally handed over to the shipowners, and arrestments recalled.

Arrestment—Recall—Recall at instance of arrestee—Process—Competency.—A petition for recall of arrestments at the instance of the arrestee is not competent (1) where the subject arrested is a debt or a sum due, or (2) where the subject arrested is a corporeal moveable which the arrestee admits is the property of the common debtor, but over which he alleges that he himself has claims; but such a petition is competent at the instance of the arrestee (3) where the subject arrested is a corporeal moveable which the arrestee does not admit is the property of the common debtor; and the arrestee will be entitled to have the arrestments recalled unless the arrester can establish a prima facie case that the subject arrested is the property of the common debtor.

Duffus & Lawson v. Mackay and Others, Feb. 13, 1857, 19 D. 430, commented on.

1ST DIVISION. ON 1st November 1907 Messrs Barclay, Curle, & Company, Limited, shipbuilders, Whiteinch, near Glasgow, presented a petition for recall of arrestments whereby Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, Deptford Yard, Sunderland, on the dependence of an action by them against the Lloyd Sabaudo Società Anonima di Navigazione of Turin, had arrested in the hands of the petitioners two ships, the one designated by the No. 468, at that time lying in the graving dock at Glasgow, the other designated by the No. 469, at that time in the petitioners' ship-building yard, and also the sum of £221,000 stated to be due by the petitioners to the Lloyd Sabaudo Società, as well as all goods, gear, &c., in their hands belonging to the said Lloyd Sabaudo Società.

The ships in question were being constructed by Barclay, Curle, & Company for the Lloyd Sabaudo Società under a memorandum of agreement entered into between these firms, and dated 11th February and 11th March 1907. That agreement, after providing for the construction of the ships according to certain specifications, and fixing the dates for their delivery, contained the following provisions:—
“7. The vessels when completed to have steam trial or trials at sea off the Port of Greenock and adjacent coast. The cost of such steam trial or trials shall be at the builders' expense, they finding crew for the safe navigation of the vessels and for the engine department, also coal and engine stores, but the purchasers shall provide any cargo which they consider necessary for the trial or trials, and shall pay any expenses incidental to loading same. Nov. 7, 1907.

"Delivery to be considered completed after the satisfactory official trial provided for, as follows :—

"After the steam trial off the coast of Greenock, mentioned above, the boats are to again undergo the official trial off the Italian coast, but all the cost of transporting the ships from Greenock, the costs of the official trial, including insurance, coals, oils, stores, port and harbour dues, and any further expenses attached thereto, to be borne by the purchasers.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.

Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

"The vessels will not be considered as delivered to, and finally accepted by, the purchasers until the said ships have passed the official trial trip in Genoa, have been approved in Genoa by the Italian Emigration Authorities, and all conditions of the contract have been fulfilled.

"8. On completion of each of the steamers at Greenock upon the terms and conditions aforesaid, the builders shall, in exchange for the purchase money due to them up to and including delivery instalment, and for a bank guarantee for the final instalment, hand over to the purchasers or their representative, the Builders' Certificate, British Lloyd's Certificate and Classification, Suez Canal Certificate, also Chain and Anchor, and other certificates as usual or necessary, or shall give an undertaking to hand over such certificates to the purchasers as soon as they are respectively received.

"9. The builders shall pay the British Lloyd and Registro Italiano classification fees, Italian Board of Trade measurement fees, and the launching dues, if any, as usual.

"10. The purchasers are entitled to appoint an expert to superintend the construction of the vessels and the machinery, and it is hereby agreed that no alterations or extra work are to be made or done or charged for without the consent in writing of the said purchasers, per their representative, specifying the extra sum to be paid, and the additional time agreed, for such alteration or addition.

"This clause is subject to special clause of the specifications.

"11. The steamers shall be at the risk of the builders until they finally leave the port of Greenock, up to which date the builders shall keep them insured against fire and other risks to an amount equal to the purchase money paid in advance."

The agreement also contained a provision that the ships should be constructed "with the midship section, profile, and deck plans approved by the British Lloyds and Registro Italiano and by the purchasers' expert."

The following statement was annexed to the agreement :—

"Statement of Prices of Steamers referred to in Contract of this date.

"First steamer, £——

"Second steamer, £——

"Payable in cash instalments as follows for each steamer :—

1. — on the signing of the contract.
2. — of balance when keel is laid.
3. — of balance when framed.
4. — of balance when plated.
5. — of balance when launched.
6. — of balance when handed over to owners after steam trials at Greenock.
7. — of balance, being the final instalment 6 months after delivery to owners at Genoa; this final instalment to

Nov. 7, 1907.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

bear interest from the date of delivery in Genoa until paid at the rate of 4 % (four per cent) per annum.

“ When the vessel is handed over to the owners at Greenock, the builders to give owners the builders’ and other certificates in exchange for the sixth instalment and a bank guarantee from the Società Bancaria Italiana or other bank of equal standing, to be mutually agreed upon, for the payment of the seventh instalment when it falls due.”

In their petition the petitioners averred :—“ The said ship No. 468 is due to leave the said graving-dock not later than the morning of Wednesday, the 6th November 1907, in order to undergo her trials off the port of Greenock, as provided for in article 7 of the agreement above set forth, and to leave the Clyde not later than Friday, the 8th day of November 1907, so that after her official trial at Genoa she may be delivered to and accepted by the Lloyd Sabaudo Company at Genoa ready to proceed on voyage, after time for loading, &c., by the 25th of November 1907. The ship No. 469 will, the petitioners anticipate, be completed about the month of January next. In terms of the said agreement, the said two ships are the property of the petitioners. The petitioners are not indebted in any sum to the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company, nor have they any goods, gear, &c. belonging to that Company.”

The petition was served on Sir James Laing & Sons only, and answers were lodged for them in which they averred that their claim against the Lloyd Sabaudo Società amounted to over £220,000, and further averred that “ by the agreement between the petitioners and the said Lloyd Sabaudo Company it is provided that the purchase price of the said vessels, Nos. 468 and 469, should be payable and paid by cash instalments at successive stages of their construction, all as therein set forth. It was further provided that the vessels should be constructed under the inspection and superintendence of a representative to be appointed by the purchasers. The above provisions of the contract have been duly carried out, and, in particular, the purchasers have made payment to the petitioners of the stated instalments as these became due. The amount of said instalments so received by the petitioners, viz, £221,000 or thereby, is presently in the hands of the petitioners. The respondents aver that under said agreement between the petitioners and the Lloyd Sabaudo Company it was the intention of parties, and it was agreed, that the property of the vessels under construction should vest in the purchasers during the progress of their construction, and that the property in said vessels, so far as constructed, is presently vested in the Lloyd Sabaudo Company. Said Company are not called hereto as respondents. In these circumstances the respondents submit that the petition is incompetent and ill-founded, and should be dismissed.”

The respondents objected to the granting of the petition, and argued ;—The petition was incompetent. A petition for recall of arrestments at the instance of the arrestee could not be considered unless the petitioner was able instantly to produce clear evidence that the property in the subject arrested was in himself. If there was a question as to the property, that question could not be appropriately tried in a petition for recall, but must be brought before the Court in an action of furthcoming.¹ Not only had the petitioners failed to produce clear evidence that the property was in themselves, but the Nov. 7, 1907. contrary appeared from the terms of the contract. The contract provided for the inspection of the work done and the payment of instalments, and when that was so the property in the ship, so far as completed, passed on the payment of each instalment.¹ The effect too of the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856,² was to give to a purchaser a jus ad rem, and such a right was arrestable.

¹ Duffus & Lawson v. Mackay and Others, Feb. 13, 1857, 19 D. 430 ; Bildstein v. Bock & Co., June 15, 1872, 9 S. L. R. 512 ; Vincent v.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

Argued for the petitioners;—The property in these ships still remained with the petitioners. The mere payment of instalments did not cause the property to pass. The decision of the majority of the Court in *Simpson v. Duncanson*³ did not really turn on the question of property, and the erroneous view that had formerly been taken of that decision was commented on and corrected in *Seath v. Moore*⁴ and M'Bain v. Wallace.⁵ The materials used here were all the property of the petitioners, and that property remained with them unless clearly transferred.⁶ The law as to the passing of property now depended on the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893,⁷ in this case on secs. 5, 16, 17, 18, and 62 thereof. This was really a case of "future goods" as defined in that statute. In any event, the "intention" of the parties to this contract was clearly that the property should not pass till the ship was completed. The whole terms of the contract pointed to the fact that it was a contract for the sale of a completed ship only, and not for portions of a ship. If the contrary had been intended it should have been made clear in the contract. It was a great hardship that the petitioners should be prevented from handing over these ships when completed, and so getting payment of the large instalments still due. The arrestments therefore should be recalled, and, in view of the enormous sums claimed, without caution.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, an English registered company, having an alleged claim against an Italian company called the Lloyd Sabaudo Società Anonima Di Navigazione of Turin, arrested two ships which were being built for that company by Barclay, Curle, & Company, Limited, a Scottish Company, the said ships being one in their yard in the Clyde, and the other in a graving dock in Glasgow; and the present petition is a petition at the instance of Barclay, Curle, & Company for the recall of the said arrestments, Barclay, Curle, & Company averring that the ships at this present moment are theirs, and do not as yet belong to the Italian Company, although they are admittedly being constructed upon the orders of that Company. So far as one of the ships is concerned, it is very Chalmers & Co.'s Trustee, Nov. 2, 1877, 5 R. 43; Brand v. Kent, Nov. 12, 1892, 20 R. 29.

¹ Simpson v. Duncanson's Creditors, Aug. 2, 1786, M. 14,204, commented on in Bell's Com. i. 189; Orr's Trustee v. Tullis, July 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 936; Spencer & Co. v. Dobie & Co., Dec. 17, 1879, 7 R. 396; M'Bain v. Wallace & Co., July 27, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 106, per Lord Salborne, at p. 109, Lord Watson, at p. 116; Seath & Co. v. Moore, March 8, 1886, 13 R. (H. L.) 57; Reid v. Macbeth & Gray, March 4, 1904, 6 F. (H. L.) 25.

² 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60.

³ M. 14,204, and Bell's Com. i. 189.

⁴ 13 R. (H. L.) 57.

⁵ 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

⁶ Wylie & Lochhead v. Mitchell, Feb. 17, 1870, 8 Macph. 552.

⁷ 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71.

Nov. 7, 1907. near delivery ; all that it still requires is to pass its trial in the Clyde, and afterwards to pass a trial at Genoa.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

The authorities upon this matter are not very numerous, but I think it is well that we should on this occasion lay down, with perhaps somewhat more precision than has hitherto been employed, the rules which I opine must obtain as to the recall of arrestments. Two cases were quoted to us

Ld. President. in somewhat recent times—the case of Vincent v. Chalmers,¹ and the case of Brand v. Kent.² Those were both cases where the petition for recall was presented by a third party—and by a third party I mean one who was neither the arrestee nor the common debtor—and it was laid down in these cases, and I have no doubt whatsoever laid down perfectly rightly, that such questions as he wished to raise could not be raised and determined in a petition for the recall of arrestments. If a creditor, whom we will call A, arrests in the hands of the arrestee B in respect of the debt of the common debtor C, it may very well be that the thing or the debt arrested is not really due to C, but is due to somebody else ; and if that somebody else, D, wishes to raise the question he cannot raise it by a petition for the recall of the arrestment, he must raise it by some other appropriate form of process. As to that law I do not think there is any doubt. There is as little doubt that the common debtor may always petition for the recall of the arrestments upon the ground that they are nimious and oppressive, and that in such circumstances the arrestments may be recalled, in some cases simpliciter, but much more generally on caution.

But there remains the case with which we are going to deal—the case of where the person who wishes to get rid of the arrestment is the arrestee. There have been cases where the arrestments were recalled at the instance of the arrestee, and in particular we had cited to us the case of Duffus.³ The facts in Duffus' case³ were these :—A ship was arrested as belonging to B. At the moment of the arrestment the ship was registered in the name of A, and A petitioned for the recall of the arrestment. It was argued for the arrester that the ship really belonged to B. Historically it had belonged to B, because it had been registered in B's name before it came to be registered in A's name. Their Lordships held, and I think quite rightly, that that question could not be tried in that process ; that they were bound to take the register as it stood as being the proper evidence of title to a ship ; and that, consequently, as the ship, according to the register, belonged to A, it could not be arrested as if it had belonged to B. But I am bound to say, with great respect, although I think the judgment is perfectly right, I do not think that the criterion as laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk in that case can, on further consideration, be supported. His Lordship there makes a distinction between moveables to which there is no written or statutory title, and moveables to which there is a written title, and he says—"In the ordinary case of moveables, to which there is no written or statutory title, it is no objection to the competency of an arrestment that the arrestee says he has no funds of the common debtor, or that the same thing belongs to himself by virtue of preference, compensation, or otherwise. For, in a furthcoming, he can appear and assert and make good his right ; and, if he is confident of his right to the money, may use it in the meantime." But Nov. 7, 1907. then he says that when there is an actual written title, "no arrestment can competently be used, according to rules applicable to such diligence, in direct contradiction to that title."

¹ 5 R. 43.

² 20 R. 29.

³ 19 D. 430.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

I am afraid that distinction will not do, and for this reason: So long as the thing arrested is a claim for money or a debt, it is quite true, as his Lordship says, that in a furthcoming the arrestee can appear and make good his right, and in the meantime no prejudice is created. The arrestee could not be made to pay the alleged debt till the furthcoming, and in the meantime his general funds are laid under no embargo. It is quite obvious that that is not so in the case of a corporeal moveable, and for this very good reason that, if a corporeal moveable is arrested, and the arrestee wishes to say that it is his own, the arrestee has no power of either starting himself or getting others to start a furthcoming; and, accordingly, if he had not some other way of getting rid of the arrestment, he would be in this uncomfortable position that a nexus would be upon the subject which would put him in danger to deal with it, and at the same time he would have no possible means of starting a furthcoming in which he could appear to vindicate his right. It seems to me that the true distinction is between the arrestment of debts or sums due and the arrestment of corporeal moveables. In the case of the arrestment of debts or sums due, I think that the rule as laid down by Lord Justice-Clerk Hope holds perfectly good. There is no reason why a question of whether a sum is due or is not due should be taken up in the inconvenient form of a petition for the recall of arrestment, and for the very simple reason that the arrestee is not in any way hurt or damaged by waiting until a furthcoming is raised. An arrestment in the hands of A of all moneys due by him to B does not put a nexus upon any particular money in A's hands, it does not prevent A from going on with his business, and using any money that he has got; it only attaches such sum as A is due to B, and it leaves A perfectly free in the furthcoming that is directed against him to say that he is due no sum to B. As your Lordships will remember, a furthcoming really first of all defines the sum that is due by the one to the other, and then it transfers it for the benefit of the creditor who has made the arrestment by way of adjudication. Accordingly, as long as it is a debt, there can be no expediency in trying to unravel these questions in a petition for recall, and there can be no harm in allowing them to stand over until a furthcoming is raised, if it is ever raised.

But when it comes to a corporeal moveable then the position seems to me quite different. When a corporeal moveable is arrested in the hands of A as truly belonging to B, and A wishes to say that it is his own and not B's at all, then, I think, he has an immediate interest to get that question decided. What would then happen I think depends upon circumstances. It may be that A, the arrestee, admits that the article in question belongs truly to B, but at the same time says that he has certain claims over it. Take for instance the case of a person who has had a corporeal moveable entrusted to his care for the purpose of performing some operation upon it, and has a good lien upon it for his charges—in such a case as that the question of how much he is entitled to by way of lien could perfectly well be tried in the furthcoming. There you have practically the admission

Nov. 7, 1907. of the arrestee that the subject does belong to somebody else, and is therefore well arrested, subject only to the fact that he has certain claims upon it. But when he makes no admission of the sort it seems to me that the general position is that the possession of a moveable is prima facie evidence that it is his property, that is to say it is prima facie evidence except with regard to a certain class of people, such as warehousemen and so

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

Ld. President. on, whose business it is to have in their possession the property of others. Accordingly, it seems to me that if a person arrests a corporeal moveable in the hands of somebody else, alleging it to belong to a third person, he has got at least to make a prima facie case for saying so; and if he cannot make a prima facie case then it seems to me that the arrestee, who has had the corporeal moveable in his hands arrested, is entitled to say:—"No prima facie case has been made out; therefore, I am entitled to have the arrestment recalled." But, when a prima facie case is made out, then I hesitate to give any general definition, because I think each case will depend upon circumstances; it will depend upon circumstances in each case whether there should be an immediate determination of the question, or whether there might not require to be an inquiry—I mean, that although I think a petition for recall of arrestments is always, so far as may be, a summary process, yet I can imagine a case in which it would be right to have an inquiry.

Now, applying these doctrines to the present case what I find is this—an uncompleted ship, that is to say, a ship that has not come into the position of being registered—when, of course, the proper title is the title of registration—but is still in the builder's yard. Prima facie it seems to me that ship belongs to the builders. Accordingly, if anyone arrests the ship upon the ground that it does not belong to the builder, but that it belongs to somebody else, I think he is bound to give a prima facie reason for that assertion. In this case the respondents table what they say fulfils my desire. They table the contract under which, admittedly, the ship is being built; and accordingly this case is one of those cases where it is possible to give a judgment without further inquiries. We have here, admittedly, the document on which, and on which alone, the transference of the ship from the builders, who created it, to the third party, to whom it is now said to belong, depends.

Accordingly the question of whether this ship should be allowed to be arrested, as it has been, or whether the arrestment should be recalled, seems to me to turn upon the interpretation of the contract. I think the onus, so to speak, rests upon the person who wishes to shew that the ship belongs, not to the builder, to whom it would what I call naturally belong, but to someone else. We have the contract before us, and that brings one to the consideration of that branch of the law which has been much discussed in recent years, I mean the branch of the law which was illustrated in the case of Simpson v. Duncanson.¹ I do not think it is necessary for your Lordships to try to add anything more to the elucidation of what was really originally decided in Simpson v. Duncanson.¹ Probably a sufficient word, if not the last word, has been said about it in the judgment of Lord Watson in Seath v. Moore.² One cannot help feeling that probably the doctrine of Simpson

¹ M. 14,204.

² 13 R. (H. L.) 57.

*v. Duncanson*¹ had its origin in an endeavour to secure an equitable result Nov. 7, 1907. in the teeth of what at that time was the very strict Scottish doctrine of the transfer of property, because there is no doubt that at the time of *Simpson v. Duncanson*¹ you might contract in what terms you pleased—you might contract that property should pass—and yet it was impossible to make the property really pass without delivery—I mean delivery in the fullest sense of the word, including all forms of what may be called constructive delivery. But all that has now been altered. It was altered to a large extent by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act,² although, as has been often pointed out, that Act did not really alter the true conception of where the property was, but merely interfered with the rights which sellers and purchasers in old times would have had. But the whole matter has been really altered by the Sale of Goods Act,³ and now it is quite clear that, by the law of Scotland, if people choose so to contract they can pass the property of a thing which is being sold without delivery. That being so, it seems to me clear, and I think it should be clearly laid down, that if people want these consequences to happen they must really say so. There is not the slightest difficulty in so framing a contract, if it is wished, as between a shipbuilder and the person who is buying the ship, that the property in a gradually constructed ship shall be held to pass at certain stages; but if so, I think it must be clearly said.

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

Ld. President.

In the contract under discussion not only is that not clearly said, but I think the other thing is said. I think that the only sale that is found in this contract is the sale of a completed ship. It seems to me to resemble in that respect the contract in Reid v. Macbeth.⁴ Accordingly I am of opinion, upon the construction of this contract, that the property of the ship was not passed from Barclay, Curle, & Company—to whom undoubtedly it originally belonged—to the purchaser bit by bit, as it came into existence. That question we cannot decide in this process as in a question between Barclay, Curle, & Company and the Italian purchaser; but we can decide it to the effect of saying whether the arrester has made out a prima facie case. I hold, accordingly, that the arresters here have not made out any case for the ship being the property of the common debtor, and that the arrestments fall to be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have followed with much interest the exposition of this branch of the law given by your Lordship in the chair. I shall not attempt to go over the ground again, because I feel quite sure the various points of the case could not be put more clearly. But having regard to the large sum of money involved in this case, it may be right that I should state my opinion upon the point in which the parties to this dispute are chiefly interested. First, I think a distinction, a clear distinction, may be drawn between the arrestment of a sea-going ship, under maritime law, and such an arrestment as we are here dealing with. In the ordinary case of the arrestment of a ship within the jurisdiction,—it may be in a harbour afloat,—there is no arrestee. The ship is simply arrested by description for a debt of the owners, and this particular form of arrestment was, I think,

¹ M. 14,204.

² 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71.

³ 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60.

⁴ 6 F. (H. L.) 25.

Nov. 7, 1907. originally confined to the Admiralty Courts who exercised jurisdiction in rem. But this is a case of an arrestment of a ship which, although finished—because I think she was to make her trial trip yesterday or to-day, —is still in the hands of the builders, physically undelivered. In such a case, and it may be in the case of other corporeal moveables, if the builder of the vessel admits that it is not his property, if he admits that according

Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

Lord M'Laren. to his contract it has passed to the purchaser, he would not be in a position to raise any objection to the arrestment, and we should not have the case that is now before us. But if he says that this ship is his property I see no reason why he should not be allowed to determine that question in a petition for the recall of arrestments, because I do not see how it can be determined in any other process; and even if it could be done, he is put to the inconvenience of having his property meantime under an embargo until the issue of a case which it is supposed will determine the question of right. Accordingly, where the person in whose hands the ship is arrested, in this case the builder, claims that the ship is his own property, then, agreeing with your Lordship, I should hold that his possession, physical possession, raises a certain presumption in favour of his claim, and that it lies with the arresting creditor to shew by the contract or documents of title that the true ownership is vested in the common debtor.

In this case, when we examine the contract of sale under which this ship was built, and apply to it the principles of the Sale of Goods Act,¹ under which this particular principle of the law of England was practically extended to Scotland—that property may or may not pass to the purchaser according to the wishes of the parties—I say when we apply that principle to this case then, as a matter of intention, I see no reason to doubt that it was the wish of both the seller and the purchaser that the ship should remain the property of the seller until payment of the penultimate instalment of the price and the completion of the trials. If it had been intended that there should be partial transfers of the property at the successive stages of payment of the instalments, it would have been easy to express that in the contract of sale. As it was not expressed, I presume that the parties did not desire that the property should pass in stages, but that on the contrary the Italian Company, being perfectly convinced of the ability and willingness of the builders to fulfil their obligations, were content to wait until the ship was ready for use before claiming or desiring delivery. For these reasons I agree that these arrestments should be recalled; and I only add that this is not a case where they should be recalled upon caution. That is one reason why it has been necessary to consider the matter as one of contract right, because the idea of finding a cautioner for £200,000 is altogether absurd.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree entirely with all your Lordship has said, and I have only a few words to add. I think it is very material to observe in the outset that the arrestment we are asked to recall is a real diligence, that is to say, it is a diligence affecting two vessels specifically described in the petition by numbers and description, and has the effect of laying an embargo upon these ships, so that, whatever the interests in the property of the ships may be, they cannot be removed from the dock and shipbuilding yard in Nov. 7, 1907. which they are at present. That this is a totally different thing from the arrestment of a debt, and that the true owner of the ship has a perfectly good interest and a good title to say that the arrestments should be recalled, so that he may deal with his own property in the ordinary course of his business, is, I think, for the reasons your Lordship has already given, perfectly clear. I do not think that we can in this process decide any question of right as between the petitioners and the firm for whom they were building the ships, so as to form a res judicata as between these two parties, and for this plain reason that the competing interest or competing right, if there be any such right or interest, is not really represented by any of the parties to the process. If the ships do not belong to Barclay, Curle, & Company, and do belong to the Italian Society, the Italian Society is not here, and therefore we cannot decide the question of property. But I think we can decide whether the ships can be effectually arrested as the property of the Italian Company, and, if they cannot, then the arrestments must be recalled.

¹ 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71.

My reason for deciding that question in the way your Lordship has explained is put, I think, briefly, and also very clearly and decisively, by Lord President M'Neill, in the case of Duffus.¹ His Lordship's opinion does not proceed upon the distinction taken in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk upon which your Lordship has commented. The Lord President says:—"The case of a ship is a peculiar one. It is peculiar as affects the nature of the property itself, and peculiar also as regards the nature of the title to that property. It is peculiar as to the manner in which the arrestments once laid on are to be followed up. Therefore, it is a case in which we are not to be led into the ordinary course of in dubio requiring caution. We must see our way more clearly in regard to the arrestment of a ship than in the ordinary case of arrestment,"—and then he says that in such a case persons outside the jurisdiction ought not to be required to find caution. The doctrine with which he starts is that in reference to this very peculiar arrestment we must see clearly that the thing arrested is really subject to the diligence. Then he goes on to consider the question of title, and he says that upon the face of the title the ship is not the property of the common debtor for whose debts it is proposed to arrest it, and that the Court ought not to enter into an inquiry for the purpose of subverting the inference from the prima facie condition of the title. He says:—"If we were to enter into an inquiry as to the nature of the right in this ship, and to have proof of the facts adduced from Halifax and then to inquire as to the law of that country, and its effect upon this transaction, we would in effect expose these petitioners to all the evils which could arise from this vessel being detained till an ordinary action should dispose of this question." Therefore, he declined to enter into that question for the purpose of setting up a right to use diligence against the prima facie fact of the title of property in the ship.

Now, although we have here a ship that has not yet arrived at the stage at which we can have the same kind of prima facie title as in the case of a registered ship, yet the principle upon which the Lord President proceeds

¹ 19 D., at p. 442.

Nov. 7, 1907. appears to me to be perfectly applicable, because we have in this case clear prima facie evidence of property in the petitioners and not in the common debtors. I agree with your Lordship that if it had not been for the Sale of Goods Act¹ we might have had some difficulty in considering how far the question of property in a ship might or might not be affected by the decision of the case *Simpson v. Duncanson*² and of subsequent cases. The authority of *Simpson v. Duncanson*² has been very much shaken, if not completely destroyed, by the observations that have been made upon it in the House of Lords, and it is extremely difficult to ascertain from the state of the record what was really decided. But the conclusive consideration to my mind upon that branch of the argument is that the law affecting the completion of rights of property by a contract of purchase and sale has been entirely altered by the Sale of Goods Act.¹ At the date of that decision the law was that property could not pass without delivery, and the Court had to consider whether there had been, or had not been, something equivalent to delivery in a case where it was plain upon the face of the facts that no actual delivery had taken place. Now, that is not the law. We have to seek the law as to the transference of property upon a contract of purchase and sale from the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act,¹ and that makes it clear that the question is one of intention upon the contract. What is the intention of the contract? The particular rule of the Sale of Goods Act¹ which is said to apply, besides the general provision that the intention of parties as to the time at which the property of the goods is to pass to the buyer is to be determined by the contract, is Rule 2 of section 18, that unless a different intention appears from the terms of the contract, "where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods and the seller is bound to do something to the goods, for the purpose of putting them into a deliverable state, the property does not pass until such thing be done, and the buyer has notice thereof." Now, it appears to me that the operation of that clause in the particular question in hand is this, that where a contract has been made for the sale of a ship which is still in course of construction, although the ship may be so specifically identified as to fix it as the subject of the particular contract, still no property passes until it is in a deliverable state, or, in other words, until it is either delivered in a finished state or is so completed as to be ready for delivery, and is approved of by the buyer upon notice to him. Applying that rule to the terms of the particular contract in hand, I agree with your Lordship that upon the face of the contract there was no intention of delivery until the ship should be completed and sent to Genoa. Therefore there is under the contract no delivery, and the property still remains in the hands of the shipbuilder.

I do not depart from the observation with which I began, that we cannot decide the question of property as between the shipbuilders and the company with whom they had the contract; but we can decide, and I think we ought to decide, that there is a prima facie right of property in the shipbuilders, and that they ought not to be subjected to the extreme hardship and inconvenience of having their ship stopped in dock at the instance of a creditor of the firm for whom they are building, who cannot instantly verify a preferable title to the ship. I agree especially with the observation made by Lord M'Laren that to make it a condition of recalling the arrestments in this case that the shipbuilders should find caution would be altogether unjust and unreasonable. Therefore I agree that the arrestments should be recalled, so far as regards the ship, simpliciter.

¹ 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71.

² M. 14,204.

Nov. 7, 1907.
Barclay,
Curle, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Sir James
Laing & Sons,
Limited.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the arrestments simpliciter.

H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—STEEDMAN, RAMAGE, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE TURNBULL M'KECHNIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—

Morison, K.C.—Munro—Mair.

JEMIMA WHITE AND OTHERS (M'Kechnie's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Watt, K.C.—Macmillan.

JEMIMA WHITE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Watt, K.C.—Macmillan.

Undue Influence—Testament—Reduction—Paramour.—Held that the relation existing between a man and a woman who had lived with him as his mistress was not of such a character as to support a plea of undue influence in an action for reduction of a will by which he left the bulk of his property to her and their illegitimate son, to the detriment of his legitimate family.

In March 1906 George Turnbull M'Kechnie, youngest lawful son of the late John M'Kechnie, ladies' dressmaker in Edinburgh and Glasgow, raised an action concluding for reduction of a trust-disposition and settlement which had been executed by his father on 11th January 1904, and of a codicil thereto executed on 16th September 1904. The defenders were Miss Jemima White and others, being the trustees under the settlement, and Miss White as an individual.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 9) "The foresaid pretended trust-disposition and settlement and codicil thereto were impetrated from the said John M'Kechnie through the fraud and circumvention and undue influence of the defender Jemima White, at a time when the said John M'Kechnie was in a weak and facile condition, and easily imposed upon. The said deeds are not the true deeds of the said John M'Kechnie. They were impetrated from him by said defender Jemima White, who took advantage of the position of ascendancy and domination which she had acquired over the said John M'Kechnie, and which she exercised over him down to the date of his death, in order to procure the execution of the said deeds."

The defenders denied these averments.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The said trust-disposition and settlement and the codicil thereto not being the deeds of the testator, decree of reduction should be pronounced. (2) Or otherwise, the pursuer is entitled to reduction as concluded for in respect that at the time of executing the said trust-disposition and settlement, and the said codicil thereto, the said John M'Kechnie was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon, and that the defender Jemima White, taking advantage of his said weakness and facility, obtained the said deeds from the said John M'Kechnie by fraud and circumvention, to the lesion of the pursuer. (3) Or otherwise, the pursuer is entitled to reduction as concluded for in respect that the said trust-disposition and settlement, and the said codicil thereto, were procured from the said John M'Kechnie by the defender Jemima White by undue influence, to the lesion of the pursuer.

No. 21.

Oct. 30, 1907.

M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Ardwall.

Oct. 30, 1907.

M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

A proof was allowed and led. At the conclusion of the proof the pursuer stated that he abandoned his first plea in law.

The following were the leading facts in so far as material to the purposes of the present report:—

The testator was born in 1848, and died on 16th October 1905.

In 1873 he married Miss Elizabeth Turnbull. In 1884 the spouses separated under a contract of separation. Mrs M'Kechnie became an inmate of an asylum in 1895, and she was in an asylum at the date of the present proceedings.

Four children were born of the marriage, namely, John, Jane, David, who predeceased his father, and George, the pursuer.

In 1888 the testator, who had previously been a partner in a ladies' dressmaking firm, began business on his own individual account, the firm having been dissolved, by opening a ladies' dressmaking shop in Princes Street, Edinburgh. He subsequently acquired other shops in Edinburgh and in Glasgow.

The defender Miss White, who had been in the employment of the testator's former firm, was appointed manageress of his Princes Street shop.

From 1896 the testator and Miss White lived together as man and wife. On 10th January 1897 a son was born to them.

In 1903 the testator was possessed of property of the value of about £12,000. In August 1904 he executed a contract of copartnership with Miss White, by which he gave her as a free gift one half of the capital in his businesses, and this, together with other gifts to her, reduced the value of his estate as at his death to about £8400.

By the trust-disposition and settlement under reduction Miss White received the liferent (about £90 a year) of two heritable properties. The fee of these properties, together with the fee of certain other properties, some of which were to be liferented by the testator's daughter, was left to Miss White's son. The total value of the properties left to her son was about £5850. A heritable property of the value of £420 was left to the testator's brother Alexander, and another of the value of £650 was left to his two sisters in liferent and fee respectively. The residue, amounting to about £1000 (after deducting debts, &c.), was left in specified proportions to the testator's legitimate children, subject to a liferent of two-thirds to their mother.

By the codicil the testator revoked the gift of the heritable property to his brother Alexander, and gave that property to Miss White's son, making the total left to him about £6270. The codicil otherwise left the trust-disposition and settlement untouched.

The evidence shewed that a few days before his death the testator was making preparations for having a new trust-disposition and settlement made out, and certain jottings, Nos. 51 and 52 of process, were produced. No. 51 was in pencil in the testator's own handwriting, and the evidence of Miss Peter, the cashier of the Edinburgh business, was to the effect that No. 52 was dictated to her by the testator, he having No. 51 before him. The effect of these jottings was, inter alia, to give the testator's brother Alexander a heritable property of about the same value as that originally given to him by the settlement.

On 2d February 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons for reduction in so far as regards the pretended codicil to the trust-disposition and settlement of John M'Kechnie, warehouseman, No. 99 Princes Street, Edinburgh, now deceased, and bearing date 16th September 1904: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns." * Oct. 30, 1907.

M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

* "OPINION.— . . . I shall now proceed to state shortly what I consider the result of the very voluminous proof which was led. . . .

"The next point to be considered is the state of Mr M'Kechnie's health after his illness in May 1903. . . . It is, I think, pretty clear, that after his illness there was a great apparent loss of physical energy on the part of Mr M'Kechnie, partly due, no doubt, to the change wrought in him by his illness, but still more due to the fact that having been seriously alarmed as to the state of his heart, he took much greater care of himself, and this was, of course, accentuated by the defect in his eyesight, which seems to have troubled him more or less for a considerable time. His weakened physical condition undoubtedly would affect his disposition more or less, and might make him more amenable to pressure on the part of others, and especially of Miss White, who was constantly with him, and whose presence and assistance were invaluable to him in his impaired state of strength.

"As to his mental capacity, I do not think it has been proved that that was impaired in the sense that he was less capable of understanding business of any kind, although it is possible that he may have been unable to seize ideas as rapidly as he had done before, or to carry them out as promptly and energetically. . . . The strongest evidence upon this I consider to be the evidence of Miss Peter, which is completely borne out by the documents Nos. 51 and 52 of process, and which shews how capable he was up to within a few days of his death of making a settlement of his affairs, to meet certain main ideas which he had himself jotted down in his own hand, and wished to carry out. The conclusion I arrive at, therefore, as to his mental condition is that possibly owing to failing bodily strength and the condition of his heart he may have been less able to resist any pressure brought to bear on him by others than he was before his illness, yet I cannot say that it is proved that generally he was weak and facile in mind, although it is possible that he might be more or less facile in the hands of a person who had very strong influence over him.

"This leads me to the consideration of the question as to alleged undue influence of Miss White over the testator.

"Miss White, as the whole of her history in this case shews, is an exceedingly capable, clever, and managing woman, and I have little doubt that Mr M'Kechnie spoke the truth when he said, as he repeatedly did, that he owed his success in business very much to her. His business was one in which a great many young women were employed, both in the dressmaking department and in the shop, and the principal customers were ladies. In a business of that kind, accordingly, it was all-important to have a capable managing lady both to look after the employees and to interview customers. Miss White was, owing to her ability, experience, and tact, in a position of commanding influence in relation to Mr M'Kechnie as regarded his business. But besides that, she was really in the position not merely of a mistress but of a wife, and possessed the influence attached to both these positions, because while she managed his household, looked after himself, and was his companion at bed and board, just as a wife would have been, she was, as being only his mistress, in the position of being able to leave him whenever she liked, being under no legal obligation whatever to remain with him longer than she chose. I think that she only spoke the truth when she signified to two or three of the employees who speak to the matter that she could twirl Mr M'Kechnie round her little finger, and from various things that she is reported, I think truly, to have said at different times, it is apparent that she was quite conscious of the influence she had with Mr M'Kechnie, either to prevent him doing what she did not want done or to

Oct. 30, 1907. The defenders reclaimed. The undernoted authorities were cited.¹

M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had a very full and elaborate debate in this case. There are two questions involved. The first question is with regard to the will, and the second question is with regard to the codicil. As regards the will, the Lord Ordinary has held that the pursuer has no case for reducing it, and in that opinion I entirely concur. I do not think it is necessary, because it is very much a matter of verdict, to enter into the question at length. All I say is this, that the pursuer has failed to prove any case entitling him to a verdict upon the facts. That being so, I am for affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as regards that part of the case. As regards the codicil, I confess I do not quite appreciate what the Lord Ordinary has done, or the reasons he has given for doing it.

We have had an argument upon the law as applicable to such a case. I am not of opinion that the cases which are founded upon by the pursuer—the case of *Strain*² and similar cases—have any bearing upon this case what-do what she did want. I attach no importance to her denials of what these witnesses say, for while she struck me as a very clever witness, I observed that when a crucial question was put to her, she several times either pretended that she did not hear it or did not understand it, while she was thinking hard all the time what answer it would be best for her case to give. In short, she conveyed to my mind the impression that she was a very clever witness, but not a very reliable one.

“But however strong an influence one person may possess over another, especially when holding such close personal relationship as Miss White did to Mr M'Kechnie, that will not suffice to reduce a will unless it is proved that that influence was exercised unduly in order to impetrate the will from the testator, or failing such evidence of connection between the person possessed of such influence and the preparation or execution of the deed complained of, it would require to be shewn that the will was so outrageously against the presumed intentions or clear moral duty of the testator as to make it incredible to suppose that it could have been executed except under the pressure of undue influence on the part of those who were taking the principal interest under it. Now, there is not a particle of evidence to shew that Miss White had anything whatever to do with the giving of the instructions for the preparation of the deed under reduction or the execution of it. . . .

“It is always of importance in a case of this sort to consider the terms of the deed itself, and if, as I have already said, the terms of such deed are in conflict either with the known or presumed intentions of the testator, or are so entirely contrary to ordinary moral obligations as to make it incredible that it should have been executed by him voluntarily, that may have the effect of opening the door for the plea of undue influence.”

(After considering the provisions of the will)—“On the whole I cannot say that the will is either an irrational or absurd one, or one the terms of which, looking to the history of the family, were not consistent with what may be ever. These are cases of persons who having, from an official position towards Oct. 30, 1907. another person, some capacity for influence over him, misuse that position ^{M'Kechnie v.} for the purpose of inducing him to do, or abstain from doing, something that ^{M'Kechnie's} he has right to do, or abstain from doing, in the exercise of his rights as ^{Trustees.} regards his own property. The essence of the matter is that the persons in Lord Justice- Clerk. that official position, such as clergyman, or doctor, or lawyer, are people who have not only a duty but a right to advise and urge those with whom they have to deal in certain directions ; and it is natural and right that a person who is so dealt with should give effect to or at least be greatly influenced by the advice of those persons and what is urged upon him by those persons. Therefore the person who has that influence, and ought to have it, in dealing with a person who ought to be influenced by it, must take the greatest possible care that he does not outstep the bounds of his official presumed to have been the wishes and intentions of the testator ; nor is it a will which ignores his obligations to his lawful wife and family, and even his collateral relations. I need hardly say that, granting all this, I consider that it was, when taken along with the contract of copartnery and other deeds, a most unfair disposition of his property as regarded his lawful children.

¹ Gilchrist v. Morrison, Feb. 28, 1891, 18 R. 599; Duncan v. Duncan, Dec. 14, 1892, 20 R. 200; Swanson v. Manson, 1907, S. C. 426; Harris v. Robertson, Feb. 16, 1864, 2 Macph. 664; Munro v. Strain, Feb. 14, 1874, 1 R. 522; M'Callum v. Graham, May 30, 1894, 21 R. 824; Weir v. Grace, Dec. 13, 1898, 1 F. 253; Bell's Prin., sec. 14 B; Hargreave v. Everard, 1856, 6 Ir. Ch. Rep. 278; Clunie v. Stirling, March 11, 1854, 17 D. 15; Gray v. Binny, Dec. 5, 1879, 7 R. 332; Fearn v. Cowpar, March 14, 1899, 1 F. 751; Morley v. Loughnan, L. R., [1893] 1 Ch. 736.

² 1 R. 522.

“While, therefore, I think there is no evidence to justify me in reducing the will on the ground that it was impetrated by undue influence on the part of Miss White, I think the matter is different with regard to the codicil under reduction. That codicil deprives Alexander M'Kechnie, the testator's brother, of the fee of the property 13 Annandale Street, and gives it to C. J. M'Kechnie. I regard this codicil as being directly the work of Jemima White and her alone. The incident out of which the matter arose was a sufficiently absurd one. Miss White, on her way to Edinburgh one morning, had requested Alexander M'Kechnie to get a cap for her boy, and to send it by the porter to the Pollokshields train along with other parcels in the afternoon. In the bustle of business Alexander M'Kechnie forgot this commission till the porter had started with the parcels for the train. On recollecting this, he rushed out and bought a cap, and sent one of the shop girls down to the train with it, telling her to give it to Miss White. I must here notice that Miss White was known by that name in all the shops, but at Westminster Terrace and at Shawfield she was known as Mrs M'Kechnie, and was visited by a number of people, including the Free Church minister and his wife, who supposed her to be Mr M'Kechnie's wife. When the girl got to the station Mr M'Kechnie and Miss White were seated in a carriage for Pollokshields, and in the same carriage was a gentleman from Pollokshields who lived right opposite them, and who had known and visited them as Mr and Mrs M'Kechnie. The girl, when she saw them, rushed forward with the parcel, and said quite loudly, ‘Here's a parcel for Miss White,’ to whom accordingly it was handed. Mr M'Kechnie and Miss White, but I expect especially the latter, were much disconcerted, it is said, by this occurrence. Miss White says that Mr M'Kechnie was very angry at Alexander, and on getting home resolved to dismiss him from the shop, and sent her in to tell him so ; that she, after getting her tea, went back to Glasgow to the shop and did not dismiss Alexander from the shop as she had been told to do, but talked a lot to him and told him how angry his brother was. Alexander says about Miss White when she came into the shop, ‘She told me that I had a lot of consideration for her, and she would have as much consideration for me, and would pay me back and make me suffer for it.’ Miss White denies this, but I believe Alexander M'Kechnie, who appeared to me to be an exceptionally candid and honest witness, and I do not believe Miss White's denial, and I further believe that it was

Oct. 30, 1907. position and endeavour to get other things done, under that influence which he has, with which he has no right whatever to interfere. The clergyman and the doctor may have cause to strongly advise a person with whom they have to deal officially, but their advice must not be tainted by any motive not within their own border. As regards the lawyer, in a question of property, the position is somewhat different from the position of a clergyman or the position of a doctor, because it may be his duty to advise his client, and even sometimes to urge his client, in a particular direction, when the client desires to make a disposal of his affairs; and if in doing so he urges anything in his own favour, or urges anything in favour of a particular individual who gets him to do it, then of course he is in a corrupt position, in which anything that is done under his influence cannot receive effect. These cases are clear enough. Most of these cases do not turn either upon the question whether a person has capacity to make his will or not, or upon the question whether he is weak and facile. Of course, if there is anything of the nature of weakness or facility in such cases, the weakness or facility will make it much more easy to hold that a person acted under undue influence. But as regards the relatives of a man, and particularly as regards the people who are living in close relationship, practically of husband and wife, such rules do not apply. Such persons are entitled to use influence to induce entirely due to her influence that Mr M'Kechnie, on the 16th September 1904, made the codicil he did. I do not believe Miss White's story. I have the gravest doubts whether Mr M'Kechnie told her to dismiss Alexander, but, if he did, I think that with her usual acuteness in business matters, she thought Alexander was very useful where he was in the Argyle Street shop, and where I may observe he still remains under Miss White's management, and that she thought a better way of punishing him would be to get him taken out of the will and her own son substituted. I do not think Mr M'Kechnie would have done this himself. It was much more like a woman's trick, and not what Mr M'Kechnie would have done of his own free will when he heard how innocent his brother Alexander had been in the matter, which was a pure accident so far as he was concerned. I am confirmed in this view by the fact that in the jottings which represent Mr M'Kechnie's last intentions he again makes a bequest to Alexander, though not of the same nature as formerly. It is also noticeable that Miss White knew what had been done by Mr M'Kechnie, for she told Alexander the moment he went out to the house after Mr M'Kechnie's death that he had been cut out of the codicil in consequence of the incident above referred to. On the facts, therefore, I am of opinion that Miss White, being very much enraged with Alexander M'Kechnie, though with no good reason, exercised the strong influence she had with Mr M'Kechnie in order to carry out her threat to pay Alexander back and 'make him suffer for it.' We have here the position which is familiar in criminal law of an evil threatened and an evil perpetrated, the person who made the threat having it in her power to accomplish the perpetration by the hand of another person. I am of opinion that in such circumstances a judge or jury is entitled to infer that the person who made the threat was the person who truly carried it out.

"I accordingly propose to grant decree of reduction of the codicil, on the ground that it was impetrated by undue influence on the part of Miss White, Mr M'Kechnie being at the time facile in mind in relation to her, in consequence of the commanding influence she had obtained over him and his entire dependence upon her."

the man to do what he may be expected to do himself, namely, to make provision for those whom he has placed in the position of being dependent upon him, and particularly in the case of a person who is placed in the position of being the mother of his child. In such circumstances there may be grounds for setting aside a will made by a person if, being on the face of it an absolutely unjust and wrong will, it can be proved that he had not the mind to make a will, or if it can be proved that his mind had got into a weak and facile condition, so that he was a person who could be easily imposed upon, and the person accused, taking advantage of his weakness and facility, did impose upon him, and impetrated from him the deed which is complained of.

Oct, 30, 1907.
M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Now, that matter again is a question of fact. Two questions of fact are involved. First, was the late Mr M'Kechnie weak and facile and easily imposed upon? If that question be answered in the affirmative, then we must consider the second question, whether advantage was taken of his condition, and whether he was imposed upon. Now, as regards the first question, giving the best consideration to the evidence which has been put before us and to the argument upon it, I am unable to say on the jury question that I can find that he was weak and facile and easily imposed upon. I find no evidence of that. There is no doubt that after he had a certain illness he was weaker than he was before. His body had suffered, and to a certain extent his sight had suffered. But I think the evidence read fairly leads to the conclusion that he was quite as capable of making up his mind about his own affairs as he ever had been in his life. I come without any difficulty to the conclusion that he was not a man who was weak and facile or easily imposed upon. That being so it is unnecessary to go any further, because the first answer to that part of the issue applicable to such a case must be in the negative. But I shall assume that influence was used for the purpose of obtaining this deed. I confess I agree with the view that was taken by the solicitor that what he was doing was going too far in the direction of providing for this woman with whom he was living, and to whom he had been attached for many years, and for the child whom she had borne to him. On the other hand, I think it was a case in which he himself was of opinion, and I assume rightly of opinion, because it is not said that later in life he had ceased to have the opinion which he had held for so long, that to a very great extent his success in life and the fortune he had accumulated was due to the energy of this defender with whom he lived. I assume also that when he was spoken to about it by the solicitor, the solicitor did impress upon him the importance of what he was doing in the way of dealing with his property. He seems to have made up his mind distinctly to do what he had expressed his desire to do before his agent urged him in the opposite direction, and he carried that out. I think in doing so he carried out his own will. It is not to be left out of view that he was not a man who rushed into these matters wildly, but that he was giving consideration to them from time to time. That is I think conclusively proved by the pencil jotting we have in the large print of the proof. We have ascertained from an unimpeachable witness, namely, Miss Peter, that that was a pencil jotting made to his dictation in which he shewed a perfect knowledge of his own affairs, and was jotting down his

Oct. 30, 1907. own note as to what he meant to do. Death prevented his doing anything to complete his intentions as indicated in these jottings.

M'Kechie v.
M'Kechie's
Trustees.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

As regards the codicil, I have no doubt that that codicil was granted at a time when he was in an irritated state, perhaps not wisely, for people get very irritated sometimes about small matters. This was in itself a small matter, but most certainly very trying to the parties concerned, namely, that, owing to the blunder of Alexander this mistake had been made in exposing the nature of the relations between Miss White and him, at the railway station. He acted upon that, but he was evidently considering the matter later in a calmer state of mind, as is shewn by the pencil jotting, and it was because of the unfortunate circumstance that he died before giving effect to that jotting, that matters are in their present state. On the whole matter I find myself unable to say that I am satisfied with the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. I think he has drawn inferences which were not justified, and that therefore his interlocutor must be recalled in so far as it reduces the codicil. The only remaining question is the question of expenses, and I think the trustees should be found entitled to their expenses.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I agree with your Lordship. This case has been very fully and carefully argued. There can be no doubt, I think, that the pursuer of the action, who was the youngest son of the testator, has, as indeed all the family have, good reason to complain of the deeds which he here challenges, because the provision which the testator made as between his legitimate family and his paramour and the child which she bore to him was most disproportionate and unfair. But that, I need hardly say, is no reason for reducing a settlement. That can only follow if, in the first place, it is a case of testamentary incapacity, which is not here alleged, or if it can be brought under the category of facility and circumvention, coupled with impetration by some person who takes advantage of that facility. This case is brought alternatively on that latter head, and on the further head, which I rather think is the real ground of action, of undue influence exercised towards the testator by the person who impetrates the will. I admit that that is a third ground of reduction, which has in some cases been held sufficient to warrant reduction, though I rather think no instance exists of such an issue being sent to a jury. But I agree with your Lordship that that principle has only been hitherto applied to cases either of transaction, of which *Gray v. Binny*¹ is an example, or in the much rarer case of wills, where a position of trust and confidence is held by the person who impetrates the will towards the testator, and where that position of trust and confidence has been abused. The only illustrations which Mr Mair, in his exhaustive examination of the evidence and authorities, was able to give us were cases of the well-known categories of such trust and confidence being reposed in law-agents, or doctors, or clergymen, or some person in a position of being trusted by the testator himself—that is to say, trusted that they would not ask him to do anything inconsistent with his duty, or anything wrong in itself. I need hardly say that is not the case here. Mr Mair, with all his ingenuity, was not able to adduce a single instance of undue influence exercised by a paramour towards the man with whom she was living, and for the very good reason, I think, that she is not in the position of owing any duty towards him or, so far as I can see, towards anybody but her own child. I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary where he says that Miss White did possess very considerable influence over this testator, but then I thoroughly agree with the Lord Ordinary when he goes on to say,—“However strong an influence one person may possess over another, especially when holding such close personal relationship as Miss White did to Mr M’Kechnie, that will not suffice to reduce a will unless it is proved that that influence was exercised unduly, in order to impetrate the will from the testator; or failing such evidence of connection between the person possessed of such influence and the preparation or execution of the deed complained of, it would require to be shewn that the will was so outrageously against the presumed intentions or clear moral duty of the testator as to make it incredible to suppose that it could have been executed except under the pressure of undue influence on the part of those who were taking the principal interest under it. Now, there is not a particle of evidence to shew that Miss White had anything whatever to do with the giving of the instructions for the preparation of the deed under reduction or the execution of it.” I quite agree with that passage. There is not a particle of evidence, literally not a particle of direct evidence, to shew that Miss White took any part in the preparation or execution of this will; and the whole evidence of the pursuer consists of inferences, which he asks us to draw from the relationship of the parties towards each other. I find myself wholly unable to draw these inferences without a great deal more than there is in this proof. The influence was undoubted, but it fails altogether in the necessary requisite of being undue—that is to say, it was just what might be expected, and what the testator was bound to expect, from the relationship of the parties. It was a very strong interest no doubt, but interest by itself is not enough in a case of undue influence, because here it could not be said that confidence has been betrayed. The actual facts being as they are, I agree with your Lordship that there is nothing to justify us in drawing the inferences which we are asked to make. I further think, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that there is no reason for making a distinction between the will and the codicil, and I do so for the reasons which your Lordship has given. I also agree with your Lordship’s proposal as regards the expenses of the case.

¹ 7 R. 332.

LORD LOW.—I have felt this case not to be altogether free from difficulty, and I have listened most anxiously to the able argument which we heard on both sides. I am not surprised that the settlement in this case was challenged, because it is evidently a most unfair disposition of the testator’s property so far as the claims of his legitimate children were concerned—indeed, so unfair as to suggest from its very terms either that Mr M’Kechnie, who we know had been a shrewd man of business, and who seems to have been an affectionate parent, was not in a condition in which he was able to make his will when he executed the settlement in question, or that some outside influence had induced him, when suffering from the effects of serious

Oct. 30, 1907.

M’Kechnie v.
M’Kechnie’s
Trustees.LdStormonth-
Darling.

Oct. 30, 1907. illness, to do that which he would not have done if left to the guidance of his own sense of what was right and just. Therefore there was a pretty good foundation for an action such as we have here. It seems to me, however, that the only possible issue in this case is whether the will was executed when he was in a facile condition, and easily imposed upon by circumvention on the part of Miss White. I say I think that is the issue, because the question that was raised in the record, as originally framed, whether the deed was the deed of the testator or not, has not been pressed.

M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

Lord Low.

It was, however, argued that the pursuer did not require to go so far as to shew that the testator was facile and easily imposed upon, and that Miss White impetrated the will from him by fraud or circumvention when he was in that condition, because it was sufficient to shew that she had strong influence over him which she unduly exercised. I am of opinion that this case does not fall within that category of the law at all. I think that the doctrine of what is called undue influence is confined to cases where the relationship between the two persons is such that the natural and legitimate consequence is influence upon the one side, and trust and confidence upon the other. It is quite clear that the relationship which exists between a woman and a man with whom she has lived in concubinage is not of that kind, and therefore the issue here is the issue of facility and fraud or circumvention.

No doubt after his illness Mr M'Kechnie was not the man he had formerly been, but the evidence, read as a whole, shews very clearly that down to the last he was fully capable of taking the management of his own affairs, and of understanding matters of business even of a complicated nature. I am quite satisfied that there was no facility in this case. If that be so, then, as your Lordship in the chair has pointed out, there is an end of the case, because if there is no facility one part of the issue on which the case depends has not been established. Upon the whole question I have in the end come to the conclusion—I confess, without much difficulty latterly—that the pursuer has not made out his case.

In regard to the codicil I cannot think that the evidence is really different from the evidence in regard to the settlement itself, because the circumstances as regards the testator's condition are the same, and if there was no facility in the one case there was no facility in the other. But then, if I had agreed with the Lord Ordinary that there were grounds for setting aside the codicil which did not apply in the case of the will, I should not have thought that that entitled the pursuer to decree. When the pursuer brought his reduction of the settlement, it was, of course, quite right that he should also bring a reduction of the codicil. The two together constituted the will of the deceased. If the pursuer had been found entitled to reduce the settlement, the codicil also would necessarily have fallen, because the codicil could not stand without the settlement. If, however, it is once established that the will is not reducible, I think it is very clear that the pursuer has no interest to insist upon reduction of the codicil. If he had brought an action for the reduction of the codicil alone, I think it would have fallen to be thrown out, upon the ground that he had no interest, because he had nothing whatever to gain by setting aside the codicil. For this same reason, if the will is not to be reduced, I think that the pursuer cannot insist upon reducing the codicil. On the whole matter therefore I agree with your Oct 30, 1907. Lordships.

LORD ARDWALL was sitting in the Extra Division.

M'Kechnie v.
M'Kechnie's
Trustees.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the defenders' reclaiming note against the interlocutor of Lord Ardwall dated 2d February 1907, recall the same: Assoilzie the whole defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the pursuer liable to the defenders John M'Kechnie's trustees in expenses, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and report: Quoad ultra find no expenses due."

J. FARQUHARSON MACDONALD, Solicitor—WILLIAM GEDDES, Solicitor—
DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT LANG, Pursuer (Respondent).—Kennedy, K.C.—M. P. Fraser. No. 22.
ST ENOCH SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—
Hunter, K.C.—Spens. Nov. 12, 1907.

Ship—Seaman—Carriage of contraband of war—Refusal of seaman to proceed to belligerent port—Discharge of seaman by master—Wages—Damages—“Final Settlement”—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), secs. 134 and 186.—In 1905, when Russia and Japan were at war, British seamen signed articles to serve on board a British ship for a voyage from Cardiff to Hong-Kong, and, if required, to any port or ports within certain limits of latitude specified. At Cardiff the ship took on board a cargo of coal. Coal had been notified by both belligerents as contraband of war. On arrival at the signal station, about eight hours' steaming from Hong-Kong, the master received orders to proceed to Nagasaki, in Japan—a port within the limits specified in the articles. The crew refused to work the vessel to Nagasaki, but were not ordered and did not refuse to work her to Hong-Kong. She was worked to Hong-Kong by the officers alone. At Hong-Kong the members of the crew were each sentenced, at the instance of the master, to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour, for refusal to obey the lawful orders of the master.

Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

In an action by one of the crew against the owners of the vessel for wages at the stipulated rate from the date of the articles down to "the time of final settlement" within the meaning of section 134 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and also for damages, held (1) that the pursuer, having been engaged for an ordinary commercial voyage, was not bound to incur the risks involved in serving on board a vessel carrying contraband of war to a port of one of the belligerents, and was therefore justified in disobeying the order of the master to proceed to Nagasaki; (2) that, the delay in paying the wages being due solely to the wrongful act or default of the master, the pursuer was entitled to wages at the stipulated rate down to "the time of final settlement," and that "the time of final settlement" was the date of the interlocutor of the Court; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to a sum in name of damages.

Caine v. Palace Shipping Co., Limited, L. R., [1907] A. C. 386, followed.

ON 24th January 1905 Robert Lang, ship's fireman, Glasgow, signed articles to serve as a fireman on board the s.s. "St Helena," belonging to the St Enoch Shipping Company, Limited, Glasgow. By the articles Lang bound himself to sail in the St Enoch Shipping Company's employment on a voyage from Glasgow to Hong-Kong via

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

Nov. 12, 1907. Cardiff, "and/or if required to any port or ports within the limits of 75 degrees north and 60 degrees south latitude. Trading to and from as may be required until the ship returns to the final port of discharge in the United Kingdom or to outward loading port if required. Probable period of engagement two years."

Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

The "St Helena," which took on board a cargo of Welsh steam coal at Cardiff, arrived on 16th April 1905 at Gap Rock Signal Station, about eight hours' steaming from Hong-Kong, where the master received orders to proceed to Nagasaki, in Japan. Nagasaki was within the limits specified in the articles.

Lang and other members of the crew declined to proceed to Nagasaki on account of the war then going on between Russia and Japan, coal having been notified as contraband of war by each belligerent. Eventually the vessel was worked to Hong-Kong by her officers.

At Hong-Kong Lang and the other members of the crew who had declined to go to Nagasaki were charged in the Police Court, at the instance of the master, with wilful disobedience to lawful orders. They were found guilty, and were each sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour, but after three days' imprisonment they were released by order of the Governor.

In September 1905 Lang brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the St Enoch Shipping Company, Limited, praying for decree for payment of (1) the sum of £4 per month from 24th January 1905 till date of settlement, less £4, 12s. 5d. paid to account, and (2) the sum of £100.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 9) "To order said ship to a port in Japan with a cargo declared by Russia to be contraband of war was a breach of pursuer's agreement with defenders. It . . . exposed pursuer to serious dangers which he had not in contemplation when he signed on, and was not bound to undertake. . . ." (Cond. 10) "On receiving intimation at Gap Rock that the intended destination of the ship was a port in Japan, and knowing of the King's proclamation, and that the cargo had been notified by Russia as contraband of war, pursuer, with the other members of the crew, justifiably declined to proceed further on the voyage. In consequence thereof, instead of dealing with the men under section 186 of the" Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,* "the ship was put into Hong-Kong, where pursuer with

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), enacts:—

Sec. 134. "In the case of foreign-going ships (other than ships employed on voyages for which seamen by the terms of their agreement are wholly compensated by a share in the profits of the adventure)—

"(a) The owner or master of the ship shall pay to each seaman on account, at the time when he lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement, two pounds or one-fourth of the balance of wages due to him, whichever is least, and shall pay him the remainder of his wages within two clear days (exclusive of any Sunday, fast day in Scotland, or Bank holiday) after he so leaves the ship:

"(b) If the seaman consents, the final settlement of his wages may be left to a superintendent under regulations of the Board of Trade, and the receipt of the superintendent shall in that case operate as if it were a release given by the seaman in accordance with this part of this Act:

"(c) In the event of the seaman's wages or any part thereof not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned, then, unless the other members of the crew was apprehended, taken before a magistrate, and falsely charged by the master with wilful disobedience to lawful orders. After being remanded for two days they were each sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour. About a week after their incarceration, however, they were all liberated. . . .

Nov. 12, 1907.
Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

(Cond. 11) "Pursuer received no wages at Hong-Kong, and has not yet signed clear of the ship. His wages are £4 per month, and in terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, section 134, are payable to date of final settlement. To account, however, he has received advances of £4 and 2s., and stores were supplied to him to the extent of 10s. 5d." Then followed averments of loss and damage in support of prayer (2) of the petition, being maintenance; loss incurred through the refusal of the shipping master to sign the pursuer's continuous discharge sheet; and injuries due to his having to go home as a distressed seaman.

The defenders answered:—(Ans. 10) "Denied as stated, and explained that on arrival at Gap Rock, when it became known that the vessel was to proceed to Japan, the pursuer, along with the rest of the crew, declined to perform any work. The master thereupon intimated that he would take the vessel to Hong-Kong, and ordered the crew, including the pursuer, to discharge their duties for that purpose, but they all refused duty of any kind, and the steamer had to be worked into Hong-Kong by means of her officers. On arrival at Hong-Kong the master reported the matter to the authorities, with the result that the crew, including the pursuer, were sentenced delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability, or to any other cause not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof."

Sec. 186. "(1) In the following cases, namely—

"(a) . . .

"(b) Where the service of any seaman or apprentice belonging to any British ship terminates at any port out of Her Majesty's dominions, the master shall give to that seaman or apprentice a certificate of discharge in a form approved by the Board of Trade . . .

"(2) The master shall also, besides paying the wages to which the seaman or apprentice is entitled, either—

"(a) provide him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in Her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped, or to a port in the United Kingdom agreed to by the seaman, or

"(b) furnish the means of sending him back to some such port, or

"(c) provide him with a passage home, or

"(d) deposit with the consular officer . . . such a sum of money as is by the officer . . . deemed sufficient to defray the expenses of his maintenance and passage home.

"(3) . . .

"(4) If the master fails without reasonable cause to comply with any requirement of this section, the expenses of maintenance or passage home

"(a) if defrayed by the seaman or apprentice shall be recoverable as wages due to him; and

"(b) if defrayed by the consular officer or by any other person shall . . . be a charge upon the ship . . . and upon the owner . . . and may be recovered against the owner . . ."

Nov. 12, 1907. to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour. Explained further that the master was quite justified in reporting the occurrence as he did, and that the pursuer was properly tried by a competent tribunal in Hong-Kong for wilful disobedience to orders." (Ans. 11) "Admitted that pursuer's wages were £4 per month, and that advances to the extent of £4, 12s. 5d. were received by him. Quoad ultra denied, and explained that on the pursuer being sentenced to imprisonment, and thereby unable to proceed with the vessel, the master immediately made out a statement of the balance of wages due to him as at that date, and paid the same to the Superintendent of Shipping in Hong-Kong in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, all claims competent to the pursuer against the ship or her owners being thereby discharged. The balance of wages so paid amounted to the sum of £6, 8s. which will no doubt be paid or accounted for to the pursuer on application to the Board of Trade. In any event, there being a dispute between the parties regarding the wages, the pursuer is not entitled to a continuance of his wages during the dispute."

Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having signed articles to sail as fireman on board defenders' s.s. "St Helena," and having all along been willing to implement his agreement, is entitled to wages at the stipulated rate to date of final settlement, in terms of section 134 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. (2) The defenders having broken said articles as within condescended on, in consequence of which pursuer suffered loss and injury, pursuer is entitled to damages from them therefor.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer himself being in breach of his contract is not entitled to wages, or, at all events, to wages beyond the date when his services terminated. (4) The pursuer having been tried and sentenced by a competent tribunal in Hong-Kong, and being thereby unable to proceed with the steamer, and as his wages up to that time have been paid by the master to the Superintendent of Shipping in Hong-Kong in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Stormonth-Darling.

On 9th June 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) pronounced an interlocutor in which, inter alia, he found, "(6) That the pursuer along with the majority of the crew refused to go to Nagasaki with the cargo; that the master determined to put into Hong-Kong and lay the case before the authorities; that he summoned the crew to communicate this to them, but they, including the pursuer, refused to obey, and the master and officers were obliged to work the vessel to Hong-Kong: (7) That the master charged the crew before the magistrate at Hong-Kong with refusing duty at sea, the charge including both the refusal to go to Nagasaki and the refusal to obey the summons aforesaid; and on the magistrate's sentence the pursuer and crew suffered certain imprisonment: . . . Finds in law (1) that under the articles the pursuer undertook the ordinary risks incidental to seamanship: (2) That the voyage from Gap Rock to Nagasaki with coal was not a risk which the pursuer was bound by the articles to undertake, and that he was entitled to refuse to serve on such a voyage, and this refusal was no competent ground for the charge before the magistrate: (3) That the refusal to work the vessel into Hong-Kong was a breach of duty undertaken by the pursuer under the articles, and competently fell within the charge laid before the magistrate; and (4) that the pursuer being thus in breach of his contract is not entitled to the wages or damages sued for"; and assoilzied the defenders.

Nov. 12, 1907;
Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie), on 22d November 1906, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor; found "that it is not proved that the pursuer and the rest of the crew of the 'St Helena' refused to obey orders, and to work the ship from Gap Rock to Hong-Kong, but that it is proved, on the contrary, that the master of the 'St Helena' refused to have more to do with them when they declined to go to Nagasaki, and elected to take the ship to Hong-Kong, and did so, by the officers alone: Finds that the engagement of the pursuer was thus terminated at Gap Rock." The Sheriff decerned for £6, 8s. as the unpaid balance of his wages up to his arrival at Hong-Kong on 24th April, and for £40 in name of damages.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—After the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of *Caine v. Palace Steam Shipping Co.*¹ the defenders could not maintain that the pursuer was not entitled to disobey the order to go to Nagasaki, but he and the rest of the crew were not entitled to disobey the order to go aft, and on the evidence the Sheriff-substitute had rightly held that that was what they had in fact done. Possibly the reason for the order—viz., to inform them that the vessel was now going to Hong-Kong—was not communicated to the men, but discipline would be at an end if a master was bound to give reasons for his orders, and the men could see for themselves that the vessel was making for Hong-Kong. The Sheriff-substitute therefore had rightly assoilzied the defenders. If, however, the Sheriff-substitute was wrong and the Sheriff was right on the question of fact, in no view was the pursuer entitled to wages down to the date of the interlocutor to be pronounced by the Court; the utmost to which he was entitled was wages down to the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor, which corresponded to the date of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of *Caine*¹—the date there adopted by the House of Lords. That was the "time of final settlement" within the meaning of section 134 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, if it applied here, which it did not. There was here "a reasonable dispute as to liability" in the sense of section 134. Further, the pursuer was not entitled both to wages and to damages; that was the fair meaning of sections 134 and 186, read together. The pursuer had been earning wages since he left the "St Helena," and the amount of these wages ought to be deducted from such sum as he might be found entitled to from the defenders.

The pursuer argued;—The Sheriff was right on the question of fact upon which he and the Sheriff-substitute differed, and that being so, the case was indistinguishable from the case of Caine.¹ Every argument advanced by the defenders here was answered there. The reason why the judgment of the Court of Appeal was taken to be "the time of final settlement" was that an arrangement was come to and was sanctioned by the Court of Appeal after the judgment was pronounced.² Here there had not been any such arrangement; hence

¹ L. R., [1907] A. C. 386.

² L. R., [1907] A. C. 386, per Lord Macnaghten, at p. 393.

Nov. 12, 1907. the pursuer was entitled to wages down to the date of the interlocutor to be pronounced by the Court.

Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer seeks compensation under the following circumstances: He was a fireman—one of the crew of a vessel called the “St Helena.” The vessel being on the way to Hong-Kong, which by her papers was her port of destination on the voyage she was making at the time, was signalled, when still at sea, from the signal station on the coast near Hong-Kong, to proceed to Nagasaki, in Japan, and her course was altered accordingly. The war between Russia and Japan being in progress at the time, and the cargo, which was coal, having been declared contraband by both belligerents, the crew in a body refused to work the ship in the direction of Nagasaki. They had various interviews with the master, in which they consistently refused to serve the ship in a voyage to Nagasaki, and accordingly they remained on board idle. That being the position, the master, after consultation with his officers, who in the meantime were navigating the vessel, altered her course, and made for Hong-Kong. He says that he summoned the men aft to inform them that he was going to Hong-Kong, but that they refused to come aft. The crew say that the delay in coming aft was only a few minutes, while they cleared away their dinner things, and that when they came aft he waved them back, saying he “wanted nothing more to do with them.” Whoever is right as to what happened, the important point is that the master did not take proper steps to test whether the crew would assist in taking the vessel to Hong-Kong, but navigated the vessel by the officers only for some time. No new order was issued. The crew were under the order to go to Nagasaki, or if that order was one that the master had no legal right to enforce, it was for him to cancel it and issue other orders. It therefore becomes the crucial point in the case, whether from the time when the order to set the course for Nagasaki was given until the time when the crew were landed at Hong-Kong, any order was given by the master which the crew were bound to obey and which they refused to obey. The occasion was an important and a serious one, the master having maintained that the crew were bound to give their services to go to Nagasaki, in which he was wrong. It lay with him to take proper measures to bring the working of the vessel into normal conditions if he could do so. In testing this, one naturally looks to the log to see what was recorded at the time, that being the official statement made on the responsibility of the master, when the events were recent, and by which the position must be judged in any question with him. Now, the log records the abandonment of the voyage to Nagasaki, and gives the details of the duties undertaken by the officers, plainly upon the footing that the master had not then informed the crew or called on them to return to duty. The day after this entry was made there appears an entry which is of great importance in the case. It is in these words:—“The foregoing entry had been read over to the members of the crew interested, who replied as follows, that they refused to go to Nagasaki as ordered, but they professed their willingness to take the ship into Hong-Kong.” That entry follows immediately on the entry mentioned above. It is very difficult to see how in the face of that entry it can be said that the crew ever refused to assist in navigating the vessel into Hong-Kong. That being so, the sole question between pursuer and defender is narrowed down to this: Had the master the right to demand that the crew should work the ship on a course for Nagasaki? That is the question which was raised by the master before the magistrate in Hong-Kong, and on which the master succeeded in having the men imprisoned. It is plain that the master proceeded throughout upon the footing that the crew were bound to obey his order to work the vessel to Nagasaki, and that, they refusing to do so, he did not put them to the duty they were willing to undertake, viz., to navigate the vessel to Hong-Kong.

Nov. 12, 1907.
Lang v. St.
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

The conviction in Hong-Kong was plainly wrong, and cannot be maintained. The risk of sailing into waters in which capture for carrying contraband of war was probable was not a risk which the men in signing articles had undertaken. Therefore the men were in no default in refusing to go to Nagasaki, and it is plain that had that been accepted they might have been used to do what they had undertaken to do, namely, to work the vessel on the course for Hong-Kong.

In these circumstances the pursuer sues for wages in so far as not paid down to the date of final settlement, and for damages. The damages found are not impugned, but the Sheriff has not given wages down to the date of settlement. In that I think the Sheriff has erred. I am clearly of opinion on section 134 (c) of the Merchant Shipping Act, that the wages under that clause run to the date of final settlement, there being no ground for attributing the delay in the settlement to the pursuer or anyone else than the master or owners.

The view I take in this case is strongly confirmed by the case of Caine v. The Palace Shipping Company,¹ recently decided in the House of Lords.

Accordingly, my view is that the pursuer is entitled to the damages as found in the Court below, and to his wages, as far as not already paid, down to the date of settlement.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—In my opinion this case is indistinguishable in point of principle from the case of Palace Shipping Company, Limited, v. Caine and Others,¹ decided by the House of Lords on 29th July last. If so we are bound to follow that case.

There, as here, the question arose out of the war between Russia and Japan, and out of a demand by the master that the crew (including in this case the pursuer, who was a fireman and therefore a "seaman" in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894), should go with the cargo of coal, which had been declared contraband of war by both belligerents, to a port in Japan. The information as to the destination of the ship was communicated to the crew for the first time in this case when the ship reached Gap Rock, the signal station for Hong-Kong, while in the House of Lords case the information was given at Hong-Kong itself. But it is not contended that this trifling variation in the facts makes any distinction in principle. The only difference which the defenders represent as material is that the

¹ L. R., [1907] A. C. 386.

Nov. 12, 1907. refusal of the pursuer and the rest of the crew to obey a lawful order applied, as they say, to an order to take the vessel to Hong-Kong, and had nothing to do with the orders to go to Nagasaki in Japan. But this, though quite distinctly averred by the defenders on record (Ans. 10) is not borne out by the proof. The master nowhere says that he ever asked the pursuer and the others to take the vessel to Hong-Kong. On the contrary, he says that after he had twice asked the men, first collectively and then individually, to "continue on the voyage," the course being at that time set for Nagasaki in accordance with orders which had been received at the signal station, and they had twice refused in the face of his remonstrances, he had a conference with the chief officer and the chief engineer as to the possibility of continuing the voyage, and it was then for the first time decided to go into Hong-Kong with the aid of the officers and engineers, the course being changed for Hong-Kong in consequence of this decision. The Sheriff-substitute discusses the precise sequence of events and prefers the evidence of the officers examined to that of the men, but the Sheriff, on the other hand, accepts the evidence of the men, which is to the effect that they were in the act of going aft in response to the master's command delivered by the third officer, when he held up his hand on the bridge and "said he wanted nothing more to do with us." Though personally I am disposed to agree with the Sheriff, I do not think that it is necessary to decide absolutely between these two slightly different versions of what occurred, seeing that there is no attempt on the part of the defenders to prove that any order or even suggestion was ever made to the pursuer and the others, that whether they were willing to go to Nagasaki or not, they were at least bound to work the vessel into Hong-Kong. The most that is attempted on the part of the defenders by way of suggestion is to say that the men must have seen that the ship was turned towards Hong-Kong, and might then have offered to do their duty. But if the men were right in their refusal to carry contraband of war to a port of one of the belligerents, their legal position could not be reversed or affected so long as this order was never withdrawn or a new order substituted. And that this was the truth of the case sufficiently appears, I think, from the log-book of the ship on the two critical days. After the entry about the refusal of the crew "to do any more work or continue the voyage" (i.e., to Nagasaki) there is an entry—"In consequence of the above refusal we were compelled to abandon the voyage and take the ship into Hong-Kong"—and then there is a description of the several duties undertaken by the officers. That again is followed by an entry made next day, and signed not only by the master and the chief officer but also by the chief engineer, in the following terms:—"The foregoing entry has been read over to the members of the crew interested, who replied as follows, that they refused to go to Nagasaki as ordered, but they professed their willingness to take the ship into Hong-Kong." I regard this statement not only as a de recenti record made by the officers of the ship of the true position of the contending parties, but it squares with all that followed. Acting on his erroneous views of the crew's rights, the master had the men tried before the Police Magistrate at Hong-Kong, and sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour for refusal of duty. After three days of the sentence had elapsed the Governor of Hong-Kong, in the exercise

Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

of his discretionary powers, released the men because, as appeared from sub-^{Nov. 12, 1907.}sequent correspondence with the Colonial Office, there had been an opposite decision in Hong-Kong on a similar charge. In that opposite decision it had been held that in view of the proximity of belligerent ships, special risks not covered by the crew's agreements did exist. It is therefore plain that the whole question turned, not on any minor point connected with the few hours' steaming from Gap Rock to Hong-Kong, but on whether the crew, having signed an agreement to serve on an ordinary commercial voyage subject only to perils of the sea, were justified in refusing to serve after the agreement had been broken by the shipowner requiring them to serve on a voyage which, although within the geographical limits of the articles, was yet attended with risks not contemplated by the articles. The consequences, as regards the pursuer, were that when he was released the ship was gone, and that he had to accept a passage home as "a distressed seaman." He accordingly now sues the defenders (1) for wages at the rate of £4 per month from the date of the articles till the date of final settlement, in terms of section 134 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, less a small sum paid to account, and (2) for the sum of £100 of damages. The Sheriff deals with the claim for wages merely by giving decree for the sum of £6, 8s., admitted in the defences as the amount of the pursuer's wages up to his arrival in Hong-Kong. The damages he assesses at £40.

Lang v. St.
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.
LdStormonth-
Darling.

The pursuer is satisfied with this latter award as covering maintenance and every other claim except money wages. But I am of opinion that we must follow the rule applied by the House of Lords with regard to wages; and to that extent we must recall the Sheriff's interlocutor. In other words we must hold that the master acted wrongfully in procuring the imprisonment of the pursuer on an unlawful ground, and in bringing his engagement to an end without making any provision for his passage home, in terms of section 186 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. In these circumstances it follows that the matter is regulated by section 134 (c) of that Act, which declares that the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof. There has been no final settlement thereof down to the present time, and the delay is not due to any cause other than the wrongful act or default of the owner or master. We must therefore give decree for the pursuer's wages at the admitted rate of £4 per month down to the date of our judgment hereon, under deduction of the sum of £4, 12s. 5d. admitted to have been received by him in Cond. 11, but without any reference to the sum of £6, 8s. alleged to have been paid by the defenders to the Superintendent of Shipping in Hong-Kong as the balance of wages due to the pursuer, and quoad ultra we must affirm the Sheriff's award of damages (including maintenance), with which the pursuer declares he is satisfied.

This does not mean that we dissent from the main findings of the Sheriff. On the contrary we agree with them; but it is necessary formally to recall his interlocutor and to vary his findings in order to bring his judgment into harmony with a later decision of the House of Lords.

LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL at the hearing was sitting in the Extra Division.

Nov. 12, 1907.

Lang v. St
Enoch
Shipping Co.,
Limited.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff of Lanark, dated 22d November 1906, as also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 9th June 1906: Find in fact (1) that on 24th January 1905 the pursuer agreed to serve as a fireman on board the defenders' steamship 'St Helena' under articles which are admitted on record; (2) that the said steamship loaded at Cardiff a cargo of Welsh coal, and on 16th April 1905 she arrived at Gap Rock, the signal station for Hong-Kong; (3) that the master there received orders to take the vessel to Nagasaki in Japan; (4) that the master in accordance with these orders altered the ship's course for Nagasaki and communicated the change to the crew; (5) that at this time a state of war existed between Russia and Japan, while towards them Great Britain maintained an attitude of neutrality; (6) that some time previously Russia had notified as contraband of war every kind of fuel, including coal; (7) that the pursuer along with the majority of the crew refused to go to Nagasaki with this cargo, and was entitled under the articles so to refuse; (8) that it is not proved that the pursuer and the rest of the crew refused to work the ship from Gap Rock or the vicinity thereof to Hong-Kong; (9) that the defenders thereafter wrongously charged the pursuer and the rest of the crew before the Police Magistrate at Hong-Kong with refusal of duty, and that the said magistrate convicted each of them of the said offence, and sentenced them to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour; (10) that while they were still undergoing imprisonment the said ship was dispatched from Hong-Kong, and that the defenders having made no provision for the passage home of the pursuer in terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, he was sent home as a distressed seaman: Find in law that in these circumstances the defenders are liable to the pursuer in damages; and also that under and by virtue of section 134 (c) of the said Merchant Shipping Act the pursuer's wages continue to run, and are payable, until the time of the final settlement thereof: Therefore assess the damages at £40 (including maintenance); find the pursuer entitled to wages at the admitted rate of £4 per month from 24th January 1905 until the date hereof, under deduction of the sum of £4, 12s. 5d. received by him to account (£134, 9s., less said £4, 12s. 5d); and accordingly decern against the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the said sums of £40 and £129, 16s. 7d., being together the sum of £169, 16s. 7d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date hereof until payment," &c.

D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL FAILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

MISS MARGARET NAIRN AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—

No. 23.

Sol.-Gen. Ure—Kennedy, K.C.—Munro—Mair.

THE UNIVERSITY COURTS OF THE UNIVERSITIES OF ST ANDREWS AND EDINBURGH AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Campbell—Macmillan.

Nov. 16, 1907.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

Election Law—University Franchise—Right of women graduates to vote—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48), secs. 27 and 28—Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 2 (3), (10), and (16)—Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 14 (6).—Women graduates of a Scottish university are not entitled to vote in the election of a Member of Parliament for the university.

The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 20, enacts as to the franchise for universities that “every person whose name is for the time being on the register . . . of the general council of such university, shall, if of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, be entitled to vote in the election of a Member” of Parliament for the university.

By sec. 28 of the same Act, it is enacted that persons holding certain university degrees shall be members of the general council.

The Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, section 2 (3), enacts, that in case of a poll the registrar of the university shall issue a voting paper “to each voter to his address as entered on the register of the general council.”

The Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 14, empowers the Commissioners thereby appointed to make ordinances for the purpose, inter alia, of enabling each University to admit women to graduation; and in virtue of an ordinance in 1892 women were admitted to graduation in, and their names were placed on the register of the General Councils of, the Universities of St Andrews and Edinburgh.

In an action brought in 1906 by certain women graduates against the University Courts and officials of St Andrews and Edinburgh Universities, held that as it was a principle of the unwritten constitutional law of the country that men only were entitled to take part in the election of representatives to Parliament, women graduates were not entitled to vote for a Parliamentary representative of a university, and that the registrar of the university was not bound to issue voting papers to them although their names appeared on the register of the general council of the university.

In 1906 Miss Margaret Nairn, M.A., and certain other women, brought this action against the University Courts of the Universities of St Andrews and Edinburgh, and the Chancellors, Vice-Chancellors, and Registrars of the said Universities, in which they concluded for declarator that “(1) prior to 31st December 1905, and at the date of the demand for a poll at the election of a Member of Parliament for the Universities of St Andrews and Edinburgh, the pursuers were and have since been and now are on the register of the General Council of the University of Edinburgh; (2) while and so long as the pursuers are on the said register they are entitled at the present and on the occasion of any and every future Parliamentary election for the said Universities, (a) to receive voting papers from the registrar, (b) to vote by duly marking the same, and (c) to have their votes so given duly recorded.”* (It was explained for the pursuers that the word “recorded” was used in the sense of “counted.”)

The pursuers were graduates of the University of Edinburgh, and

EXTRA
DIVISION.
Lord Salvesen.

* The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32

Nov. 16, 1907. Nairn v. University Courts of St Andrews and Edinburgh. their names were entered in the register of members of the General Council of that University. By ordinance No. 18 passed by the University Commissioners in virtue of the powers given to them by section 14 (6) of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, women had been admitted to graduation in several of the faculties of the Scottish Universities, and the names of women graduates had been placed on the general councils, and such women graduates had attended and voted at the meetings of the respective general councils. In terms of section 9 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, the University of Edinburgh has the privilege of returning, jointly with the University of St Andrews, a Member of Parliament. A contested election of a Member of Parliament for the Universities of St Andrews and Edinburgh, the first since the admission of women to graduation, took place in February 1906. Voting papers were not issued to the pursuers.

Vict. cap. 48), enacts:—Sec. 27. "Franchise for Universities . . . Every person whose name is for the time being on the register, made up in terms of the provisions hereinafter set forth, of the General Council of such University, shall, if of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, be entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in any future Parliament for such University in terms of this Act."

Sec. 28. "Under the conditions as to registration hereinafter mentioned, the following persons shall be members of General Council of the respective Universities, viz.:—(1) All persons qualified under the 6th or 7th section of the Act 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 83; (2) all persons on whom the University to which such General Council belongs has after examination conferred the degree of doctor of medicine, or doctor of science, or bachelor of divinity, or bachelor of laws, or bachelor of medicine, or bachelor of science, or any other degree that may hereafter be instituted. . . ."

The Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 40), enacts:—Sec. 2, subsec. (3). "In case of a poll the registrar of the University, as soon as he conveniently can after the day of demand for a poll, and not later than six clear days thereafter (exclusive of Sundays), shall issue simultaneously through the post a voting paper in the form or to the effect set forth in Schedule (A) annexed to this Act to each voter to his address as entered on the register of the General Council of the University, who shall appear from said address to be resident within the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands. . . ."

Subsec. (10). "It shall be lawful for any candidate, or the agents of the candidates who may be in attendance, to inspect any voting paper before the same shall be counted, and to object to it on one or more of the following grounds . . . (2) that the person giving a vote by the voting paper is not qualified to vote . . . and the Vice-Chancellor or one of his Pro-Vice-Chancellors shall have power to reject or receive, or receive and record as objected to, any voting papers. . . ."

Subsec. (16). "Provided always that no person subject to any legal incapacity shall be entitled to vote at any Parliamentary election, or exercise any other privilege as a member of the General Council of any University."

The Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 55), enacts:—Sec. 14. "The Commissioners shall have power . . . after making due inquiry, to make ordinances for all or any of the following purposes as shall to them seem expedient:— . . . (6) To enable each University to admit women to graduation in one or more faculties, and to provide for their instruction."

Ordinance No. 18, dated 22d February 1892, provides:—"It shall be in the power of the University Court of each University to admit women to graduation in such faculty or faculties as the said Court may think fit."

The pursuers averred that they had applied to the Registrar of the University to issue to them voting papers, but that the Registrar had declined to do so. Nov. 16, 1907.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers, as members of the General Council of the University of Edinburgh, and duly enrolled on the statutory register, are entitled (a) to receive from the Registrar voting papers, and (b) to return the same to the Registrar, duly marked, signed, and attested. (2) The pursuers, as registered members of the said General Council, are entitled to have the votes so tendered by them recorded as votes in the election; et separatim, the pursuers are entitled to have the said votes recorded unless the same shall, on objection taken by one of the candidates or his agent, be rejected by the returning officer. Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent. (3) The pursuers being incapacitated by reason of their sex from voting at the election of a Member of Parliament for the said Universities, the defenders should be assoilzied from the declaratory conclusions of the summons, with expenses. (4) In respect that the statutes and ordinances founded on by the pursuers do not confer upon them any right to vote at the election of a Member of Parliament for the said Universities, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor from the declaratory conclusions of the summons.

By interlocutor dated 5th July 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—This case raises the important question whether women graduates are entitled to vote at the election of a Member of Parliament for the Universities of St Andrews and Edinburgh. The question is a new one, and the earliest opportunity has been taken of raising it, as the election which took place in 1906 was the first contested election for these two Universities since women have been admitted to graduation. All the pursuers are members of the General Council of the University of Edinburgh, and their names are duly entered in the register of such members.

"The pursuers' claim is rested primarily on the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48). By section 27 of that Act it is, inter alia, provided that 'every person whose name is for the time being on the register, . . . of the General Council of such University, shall, if of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, be entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in any future Parliament for such University in terms of this Act.' The pursuers' argument on this section may be stated thus: They say that 'person' is a word which ordinarily includes all human beings without distinction of sex; that therefore the words 'male or female' may be inserted after it in the section in question; and, if so, it would be meaningless to suggest that the clause 'not subject to any legal incapacity' should be supposed to infer any incapacity on the ground of sex. They point to the fact that in Part I. of the Act, where all the other franchises are dealt with, the word used instead of person is 'man,' that the difference in the phraseology cannot be assumed to be accidental; but that, even if it were accidental or mistaken, effect must be given to the plain language of the Act. They further found on section 2, subsection 3, of the Universities Election Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, which provides for the registrar, in case of a poll, sending voting papers through the post to each voter to his address as entered on the register of the general council of the university, who shall appear from said address to be resident within the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, and especially on the proviso in the last clause of subsection 16, which is to the following effect: 'Provided always that no person subject to any legal incapacity shall be

Nov. 16, 1907. The pursuers reclaimed.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

The case was heard in the Extra Division on 22d and 23d October 1907.

Argued for the pursuers and reclaimers ;—(1) The pursuers were entitled to declarator in terms of the conclusions of the summons down to and including 2 (b). Their names were on the registers, and by the Universities Elections (Scotland) Act, 1881, section 2 (3), every person on the register was entitled to receive a voting paper. The Registrar had no power to decide to whom he should send voting papers, but was bound to issue them to all whose names appeared on the register. It might have been provided that there should be one register for the purpose of voting at elections and another register with reference to the other privileges of graduates, just as there was a provision for separate registers in the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), but there was no such distinction, entitled to vote at any Parliamentary election, or exercise any other privilege as a member of the General Council of any university.' Women having now, by the Ordinance of 1892 following on the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 14, subsection 6, been admitted to graduation, and the names of women graduates having been placed on the register of the General Council, they contend, with great force, that the legal incapacity dealt with in the above proviso must be construed as excluding any incapacity on the ground of sex, otherwise they would be equally disqualified from exercising other privileges as members of the General Council—privileges to which they have been admitted without objection and which they have regularly exercised.

"The whole of this argument depends for its validity on the construction which is put on the word 'person' in section 27 of the 1868 Act. I agree with the argument of the pursuers that, in any ordinary statute, this word would be presumed to include individuals of both sexes, but it is equally true that the word is open to construction ; and if it sufficiently appears from the context, or on other grounds, that it must be construed as meaning male person, the case for the pursuers entirely fails. Acts of Parliament, no doubt, constitute, for the most part, alterations on the common law ; but when the language used is ambiguous, that construction will ordinarily be preferred which is consistent with the common law, rather than a construction which would override it. Now, in 1868 and 1881, women were legally incapacitated at common law from voting at the election of Members of Parliament. That was decided in England in the case of Chorlton v. Lings, L. R., 4 C. P. 374, and in Scotland in the case of Brown v. Ingram, 7 Macph. 281. That being so, it is scarcely conceivable that women should be entitled to vote at elections of a university member when they were debarred from the same privilege in county and burgh elections. It was said that they are expressly so debarred by the 1867 and 1868 Acts, which deal with the representation of the people in England and Scotland respectively, by the use of the word 'man' instead of 'person,' and that this does not apply to the university franchise. The alteration in language is, at first sight, curious ; but I think it may be explained on the footing that in 1868 and 1881 there were many women who had the necessary qualifications for the occupier and ownership franchise ; while at these dates women were not admitted to the university at all, and it was no doubt thought unnecessary to limit the university franchise expressly to males, when males alone could, at that time, obtain the necessary qualification. Holding, therefore, that the word 'person' is open to construction, I feel constrained, for the reasons I have stated, to construe it as equivalent to 'male person.' An alternative view would be to construe the word as of common gender, and to hold that, as women were, at common law, legally and one register only was kept with reference to both the voting and the academic privileges of graduates. If any question arose as to the qualification of a person whose name appeared on the register, that question fell to be determined, not by the Registrar, whose functions were only ministerial, but by the Vice-Chancellor, who, by section 2 (10) of the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, alone had power to decide such questions. In this case the Registrar was in error in refusing to send voting papers to the pursuers, and by his error they had been deprived of the opportunity of obtaining a decision on their claim to vote from the Vice-Chancellor. (2) On the question whether the pursuers were entitled to have their votes counted, section 27 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, gave the vote to "every person" whose name was on the register, and who was "not subject to any legal incapacity." Two questions arose on this section, viz.:—(a) Does "person" include

Nov. 16, 1907.
Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

incapacitated from exercising the Parliamentary franchise, their claim is excluded by the clause 'not subject to any legal incapacity,' which strikes at peers and aliens equally with women.

"The construction of the proviso in subsection 16 of section 2 of the 1881 Act is, I think, somewhat more difficult, on the assumption that women graduates are legally entitled to be placed on the register as members of the General Council, and to exercise the privileges, other than the franchise, which belong to such members. It is enough, however, to say that that subsection conferred no franchise on members of the General Council, and that it can scarcely be used for the purpose of construing an Act of Parliament passed thirteen years before. Besides, it may be inferred here, as in the earlier Act, that the Legislature had within its purview only male persons, as the doors of the universities had not then been opened to women. I think, moreover, it is extravagant to assume that when Parliament in 1889 conferred powers on the University Commissioners to make ordinances 'to enable each university to admit women to graduation in one or more faculties, and to provide for their instruction,' it was introducing so important a constitutional change as the extension of the franchise to women in university constituencies. What the Act of 1889 was dealing with was provision 'for the better administration and endowment of the Scotch universities, and for improving and regulating the course of study therein,' and it was not an Act which had the remotest bearing on election law. If the proviso on which the pursuers found so strongly is to be interpreted literally, it might lead to the conclusion that women graduates ought not to be on the Register of the Council of the University at all.

"The only other matter which was argued was that, in any event, the pursuers were entitled, so long as they were on the Register of the General Council of the University of Edinburgh, to receive voting papers from the Registrar, and that the Registrar in refusing to issue such papers to them was in breach of his statutory duty. The short and, to my mind, conclusive answer to this contention is that the Registrar is only bound to issue voting papers to persons who are qualified to vote. If he makes a mistake by refusing to issue the voting paper to such a person, he may render himself liable in a penalty; but it would be neither good sense nor good law to hold that he should be compelled to issue voting papers to persons whose votes, when given, he would be compelled to reject. I am, therefore, of opinion that this separate ground of action also falls.

"I hope it may console the pursuers for their want of success if I remind them that the legal incapacity of women to vote at Parliamentary elections did not in the opinion of that very learned Judge, Mr J. Willes, 'arise from any underrating of the sex either in point of intellect or worth,' but was 'an exemption, founded on motives of decorum, and was a privilege of

Nov. 16, 1907.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

women? and (b) Do the words "not subject to any legal incapacity" refer to disqualification by reason of sex? The Lord Ordinary based his decision on the ground that the word "person" was ambiguous, and was not to be construed as over-riding the common law. But in the ordinary use of language "person" was not ambiguous, and included both men and women. In sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, which dealt with the county and burgh franchise, the expression used was "every man"; and this distinction between the term used in these sections and the term used in section 27 indicated a difference in the meaning of the terms. A similar distinction was observed in the Representation of the People (Ireland) Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 88), which was the first Act dealing with the representation of universities, for the words "male person" appeared in sections 2 and 7 of that Act, which contained the provisions as to the general franchise, whereas "person" alone was used in sections 60 and 61, which dealt with the representation of Dublin University. Further, in other statutes "person" had been held to include women. Thus the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), in Schedule B enacted that "the electors shall consist of all persons being of lawful age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, whose names are entered in the latest Valuation-roll," and it was decided in the Sheriff Court by Sheriff (afterwards Lord) Fraser that women were entitled to vote at a School Board election.¹ They were also entitled to vote in municipal elections. And in *Queen v. Crosthwaite*² it was expressly decided that "person," as used in the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854, gave women the right to vote. The only other case in which the word "person" was construed—*Wilson v. Town-Clerk of Salford*³—was not applicable, because the words were "said persons," and the words to which "said" referred were the words "male persons" previously used in the statute there under construction. Accordingly, as "person" included women the franchise was expressly conferred by the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, taken with the subsequent Acts and Ordinance, on women whose names were on the register of the general council of the universities, and any reference to the common law for the purpose of defeating the grant was inadmissible. The university franchise was unique; it depended not on a property qualification, but on education, and it was not confined to specified geographical limits, and, therefore, no argument or inference could be legitimately drawn from the common law which could affect the question of the university franchise. If "person" included women it could not be held that the words "not subject to any legal incapacity" had the effect of excluding them, for if "person" included all without reference to sex it would be absurd immediately to adject a condition which should debar parties on the ground the sex (honestatis privilegium); and again that 'the absence of such a right is referable to the fact that in this country in modern times, and chiefly out of respect to women and a sense of decorum, they have been excused from taking any share in the department of public affairs.' If this be so, I am afraid this action, if it has served no other purpose, has at least demonstrated that there some members of the sex who do not value their common law privileges."

¹ 20 Journal of Jurisprudence, 483.

² 17 Irish Com. Law Rep. 157.

³ L. R., 4 C. P. 398.

of their sex. The condition referred to peers, minors, and aliens—persons who were disqualified independent of sex. Thus in the Representation of the People Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 45), the same phrase was attached to the words "male person," and therefore in that case could not imply disqualification in respect of sex. The meaning of the words in that Act was the same as their meaning in the Acts under consideration in this case. Further, section 2 (16) of the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, applied to all the privileges conferred on graduates, and it was impossible to hold that the words meant one thing with reference to the franchise, and another thing with reference to other privileges. The Lord Ordinary mentioned *Charlton v. Lings*¹ and Brown v. Ingram,² but these cases referred to the general franchise, and the question was whether the names of women should be placed on the register. Here the franchise to be exercised was different, and the pursuers were already on the register, and rightly on the register. Further, there was no authority for saying that by the common law women were under a legal incapacity. If they had not possessed the franchise this was due to the fact that the statutes conferring and regulating the franchise used terms which limited the right to males, and not to any common law disability.

Nov. 16, 1907.
Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

Argued for the respondents ;—(1) The question whether the women graduates were entitled to receive voting papers depended upon the question whether they were entitled to vote. The Court had jurisdiction to decide as to the validity of votes cast in the election of a representative of the universities. The Election Judges had no jurisdiction ; and, in any event, the jurisdiction of the Court of Session would be ousted only by the creation of a Registration Court with reference to university constituencies. As no such Court had been created, the jurisdiction of the Court of Session remained. By section 2 (10) of the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, the Vice-Chancellor might reject votes, but this provision would not debar a person whose vote had been wrongly rejected by the Vice-Chancellor from bringing an action of declarator, and obtaining decree declaring that he was entitled to vote ; and similarly, if votes given by disqualified persons were allowed to pass, no objection being taken to them—and the Vice-Chancellor could decide on votes only if objection were taken by the candidates or their agents—it would be possible for anyone having an interest to apply to the Court of Session to have the votes thus admitted rejected. Accordingly, as the Court was vested with the right to determine the question whether the pursuers were entitled to vote, the conclusion that the pursuers were entitled to receive voting papers could not stand apart from the other conclusions of the summons. It would be absurd to find that the pursuers were entitled to receive voting papers if their votes fell to be rejected when given. The provision in section 2 (3) of the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, was that the Registrar should issue a voting paper to each "voter." The mere fact that a person's name appeared on the roll of voters did not make him a voter, if he were disqualified³ ; and, therefore, the question whether the women graduates were entitled to papers depended on

¹ L. R., 4 C. P. 374.

² Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 281.

³ Stowe v. Jolliffe, L. R., 9 C. P. 734 ; Oldham Case, 1869, 1 O'Malley and Hardcastle, p. 151 ; Marquis of Bristol v. Beck, 1907, 23 T. L. R. 224.

Nov. 16, 1907.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

the decision as to their right to vote. (2) On the main question, the pursuers had no right to vote. By the common law the Parliamentary franchise was confined to the male sex, and it had been decided that women could not vote in burgh and county constituencies.¹ If the Legislature had intended that this rule should not hold in the case of University constituencies it would have made this clear by means of an express provision to that effect. In none of the Acts founded on by the pursuers was there any such provision. The Ordinance of 1892, on which the pursuers' case depended, was made in virtue of the powers given to the Commissioners to make ordinances to enable the universities to admit women to graduation; and any ordinance made under this power could not affect the Parliamentary representation of the universities. As to the use of the word "person" in section 27 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, at the date of the Act the names of women did not appear on the register. The word must be construed according to the subject-matter with reference to which it was used, and it did not necessarily include women.² The contrast between the use of the words "male persons" in the earlier sections and the use of "person" in this section was explained by the fact that the former sections dealt with a property qualification, and it was necessary to use words exclusive of women, for women might possess that qualification, whereas the latter section dealt with the university franchise, and as at the date of the Act women could not qualify for that franchise it was unnecessary to exclude them expressly. Further, women being disqualified at common law from exercising the franchise, the words "subject to any legal incapacity," included them as well as peers and aliens.³

At advising on 16th November 1907,—

The opinion of the Court (LORD M'LAREN, LORD PEARSON, and LORD ARDWALL) was read by LORD M'LAREN.—Apart from the right to university representation which is now claimed, it is an incontestable fact that women never have enjoyed the Parliamentary franchise of the United Kingdom. Prior to the Reform Acts of 1831 and 1832 there were many varieties of the Parliamentary franchise. The vote in counties was confined to freeholders. In Scotland the borough members were elected by town-councils. Some of the English boroughs had a representation as wide as that of the present law; in the greater number the franchise was more or less restricted, but not always in the same degree or on the same type.

All varieties of the Parliamentary franchise had this element in common, that its exercise was confined to men; and even in the cases where the right of election was confined to a few burgage tenures, or even to a single tenement, if the owner was a woman she was not entitled to vote. In view of Nov. 16, 1907. these facts, we must conclude that it was a principle of the unwritten constitutional law of the country that men only were entitled to take part in the election of representatives to Parliament.

¹ Brown v. Ingram, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 281; Charlton v. Lings, L. R., 4 C. P. 374.

² Wilson v. Magistrates of Salford, L. R., 4 C. P. 398.

³ Earl Beauchamp v. Madresfield, L. R., 8 C. P. 245; Beresford-Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, L. R., 23 Q. B. D. 79; Wilson v. Magistrates of Salford, L. R., 4 C. P. 398; Stowe v. Jolliffe, L. R., 9 C. P. 734; Oldham Case, 1 O'Malley & Hardcastle, 151; Marquis of Bristol v. Beck, 23 T. L. R. 224; Charlton v. Lings, L. R., 4 C. P. 374; and Brown v. Ingram, 7 Macph. 281.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

All ambiguous expressions in modern Acts of Parliament must be construed in the light of this general constitutional principle. We are not to be understood as invoking any merely technical rule of construction in this matter; what is meant is that if Parliament had intended to subvert an existing constitutional law in favour of women graduates, the intention would naturally be expressed in plain language, and therefore if ambiguous language is used it must be construed in accordance with the general constitutional rule.

Lord M'Laren.

By sec. 27 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, a vote for the election of a university member is given to "every person whose name is for the time being on the register . . . if of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity." The qualification of "full age" was necessary, because the register of graduates might contain the names of men who had taken their degrees before attaining majority. The qualification "not subject to any legal incapacity" was also necessary; a peer, for example, might be on the register of graduates, but it was not intended that he should have a vote for returning a member to the House of Commons. It was not necessary to exclude women by express words, because at that time women could not lawfully be on the university register.

Now, this is the Act of Parliament which created the university constituencies of Scotland, and therefore in its inception the university franchise had this element in common with the franchises of counties and burghs, that it was confined to men. It may here be observed that in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of this Act, which define the qualifications of voters in counties and burghs, the words used are "every man," so it appears that the expression "every person," which is used with reference to university elections, had the same meaning as "every man" in the earlier sections.

By the Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, provision is made for taking the vote at university elections by means of "voting papers," and in particular by sec. 2, subsec. 3, the Registrar in case of a poll is required to send through the post a voting paper "to each voter to his address as entered on the register of the general council of the university, who shall appear from said address to be resident within the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands." The expression "each voter" here used could not give rise to any ambiguity as to sex, because at this date the university register was a register of men. The proviso of subsec. 16, excluding persons "subject to any legal incapacity," does not seem to have any material bearing on the present question.

The claim of the pursuers to vote at the election of a member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St Andrews is founded on their status as graduates of one of these universities. By the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Commissioners thereby appointed were empowered to make ordinances "to enable each university to admit women to graduation in one or Nov. 16, 1907. more faculties." By the Ordinance of 1892 this power was exercised, and women have been admitted to graduation in certain faculties. The pursuers' names have been placed on the registers of the General Council of one of these Universities in right of their respective degrees. It may be observed that the Universities Act, 1889, does not empower the University Commissioners to admit women graduates to the franchise; and if it had been intended that the degree should carry with it the right of voting at Parliamentary elections, we should have expected to find a provision to that effect in the Act of Parliament itself. It is quite certain that the University Commissioners had no power to make any deliverance on this subject, and the same observation applies to the powers of the University Courts in the execution of the ordinance. The pursuers' claim accordingly must rest on the Representation Act of 1868, and the Universities Elections Act, 1881.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.
Lord M'Laren.

The argument must be that a franchise originally conferred on graduates who were necessarily men has been extended to women graduates, not by a direct enfranchising enactment, but by the indirect effect of an Act of Parliament which does not profess to deal with political privileges, but is concerned only with academic functions, and which, in the interests of the higher education of women, authorises the admission of women to graduation. The degree itself, or rather the right to take a degree, is not even conferred by the Act of Parliament, but is made dependent, first, on the judgment of Commissioners empowered to take evidence, and, secondly, on the pleasure of the governing bodies of the respective universities. It is difficult to conceive that the Legislature should have conferred by devolution the power of extending the franchise to a class of persons hitherto excluded by a constitutional rule, a power which it has always kept in its own hands, and it appears to us that there is absolutely no evidence in the terms of the Universities Act, 1889, that Parliament intended to extend the franchise to women, or had any question of political privileges in view, when it empowered the university authorities to admit women to graduation. We think that the Representation Act, 1868, and the Universities Elections Act, 1881, must be construed now, as heretofore, with reference to the political disabilities of women, and that the circumstance of the pursuers being on the university registers does not remove the disability.

The pursuers contend that in any event they are entitled to receive voting papers, leaving it to the candidate or his agent to object to the vote if tendered, and to the Vice-Chancellor or his deputy to dispose of the objection, all in terms of the 10th subsection of section 2 of the Universities Elections Act, 1881. It is, no doubt, true that if the Registrar (taking a different view of his statutory duty), had sent the lady graduates voting papers, the votes might have been objected to and disallowed by the Vice-Chancellor.

But as our judgment on the main question is adverse to the claim of the lady graduates, it follows that no individual of the class has a cause of action for not receiving an invitation to give a vote which she could not lawfully exercise, or a title to sue for a declaratory finding that she is entitled to receive such a paper. We are therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed, and the reclaiming note Nov. 16, 1907. refused.

THE COURT adhered.

WILLIAM PURVES, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

Nairn v.
University
Courts of St
Andrews and
Edinburgh.

THE WALKER STEAM TRAWL FISHING COMPANY, LIMITED (AND REDUCED), Petitioners.—Morton.

No. 24.

Nov. 16, 1907.

Company—Capital—Reduction of Capital—Conversion without Reduction of Capital—Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131), secs. 9-19—Companies Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26), secs. 3 and 4.—A limited liability company under its memorandum of association had a capital of £50,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, with power to reduce its capital. All its shares had been issued, 12s. 6d. being paid up on each share. The shareholders unanimously passed and confirmed a special resolution that the capital of the company should be converted from 50,000 shares of £1 each, with 12s. 6d. paid up, into 50,000 shares of £1 each, with the full amount paid up on 31,250, leaving 18,750 to be issued at the discretion of the directors; and that such conversion should be effected by re-allocating the share capital among the shareholders, crediting to each of them one £1 share for each pound sterling at his credit in the share capital account.

Walker Steam
Trawl Fishing
Co., Limited.

The company presented a petition for confirmation of the "reduction of capital resolved on by" the special resolution above mentioned. All the creditors of the company consented.

The Court refused to confirm the resolution in respect that it effected a "conversion" and "re-allocation," and not a reduction of capital.

THE WALKER STEAM TRAWL FISHING COMPANY, LIMITED (AND REDUCED), presented a petition to the Court for power to reduce capital under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and more particularly sections 9-19 of the Companies Act, 1867, and sections 3 and 4 of the Companies Act, 1877.*

2D DIVISION.

The Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Company, Limited, was incorporated in 1901 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, and had its registered office in Aberdeen.

Clause 5 of the memorandum of association provided:—"The

* The Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131), sec. 9, enacts,—
"Any company limited by shares may, by special resolution, so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum of association, if authorised so to do by its regulations as originally framed or as altered by special resolution, as to reduce its capital; but no such resolution for reducing the capital of any company shall come into operation until an order of the Court is registered by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies as is hereinafter mentioned."

The Companies Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 3, enacts:—
"The word 'capital,' as used in the Companies Act, 1867, shall include paid-up capital; and the power to reduce capital conferred by that Act shall include a power to cancel any lost capital, or any capital unrepresented by available assets, or to pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company; and paid-up capital may be reduced either with or without extinguishing or reducing the liability (if any) remaining on the shares of the Company, and to the extent to which such liability is not extinguished or reduced it shall be deemed to be preserved, notwithstanding anything contained in the Companies Act, 1867."

Nov. 16, 1907. capital of the Company is £50,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, with power to increase or reduce the capital in conformity with the law in force at the time and with this memorandum and articles of association of the Company, as originally framed or as duly and competently altered” *

Walker Steam
Trawl Fishing
Co., Limited.

The whole of the original share capital was issued as ordinary shares, and 12s. 6d. had been paid up on each share.

On 27th April 1907 an extraordinary general meeting of the Company was held at which the following special resolutions were passed unanimously:—

“(1) That the capital of the Company be converted from 50,000 shares of the value of £1 each, whereof 12s. 6d. has been paid upon each share, a total of £31,250, into 50,000 shares also of the value of £1 each, upon 31,250 of which the full amount shall have been paid up, leaving 18,750 shares to be issued at the discretion of the directors for the time being, and that such conversion be effected by re-allocating the share capital among the shareholders, crediting to each shareholder one £1 share in respect of every pound sterling with which he or she is credited in the share capital account of the Company;

“(2)” (A resolution for facilitating the carrying out in detail of the proposed re-allocation of capital);

“alternatively,

“(3) That the capital of the Company be reduced from £50,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, on which 12s. 6d. each has been called and paid up, to £31,250, divided into 50,000 shares of 12s. 6d. each fully paid, and that such reduction be effected by extinguishing the liability in respect of uncalled capital on the said shares to the extent of 7s. 6d. per share.”

At an extraordinary general meeting held on 13th May 1907 these special resolutions were unanimously confirmed.

The Company thereupon presented the present petition, in which they craved the Court to confirm “the reduction of capital resolved on by one or other of the special resolutions” above set forth, and to approve of one or other of the following minutes for registration by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies:—

“The capital of the Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Company, Limited, is £50,000 divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, of which 31,250 shares have been issued and are fully paid up, leaving 18,750 shares still to be issued;

“or alternatively,

“The capital of the Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Company, Limited, is £31,250, divided into 50,000 shares of 12s. 6d. each, all of which shares have been issued and are fully paid up.”

In the petition the petitioners stated as follows:—“The Company finds that the capital subscribed is as much as it can profitably make use of for many years to come, and its financial position is such that there is no necessity for retaining the liability of 7s. 6d. attaching to each share, which liability has the effect of unduly depressing the

* Clause 52 of the articles of association provided:—“The Company may by a special resolution reduce its capital by reducing the number or the value or both the number and the value of the shares into which it is divided, and may consolidate or subdivide its shares, and may cancel any shares that have not been taken or agreed to be taken by any person in the manner and with all or any of the incidents prescribed by the statute.”

selling value of the Company's shares. The Company desires, however, to retain the denomination of its shares at £1 sterling each, which is the reason for resolutions numbers one and two and for the first minute" quoted supra. Nov. 16, 1907.
 Walker Steam
 Trawl Fishing
 Co., Limited.

The petition was not opposed.

The Court remitted to Mr W. G. L. Winchester, W.S., to inquire and report whether the power prayed for should be granted.

Mr Winchester reported that the subscribed capital was sufficient for the present requirements of the Company; that the creditors of the Company, on a list of creditors produced in terms of section 13 of the Companies Act, 1867, had all consented to the proposed reduction, and that after advertisement duly made as ordered by the Court no creditors not entered on the list had claimed to be entered thereon; that he had found the proceedings regular and proper and in conformity with the statutes and the Company's memorandum and articles of association; that the first special resolution appeared to him to be incompetent, but that the petitioners had adduced good reasons for the proposed reduction as set forth in the alternative special resolution; and that the Court might pronounce an order confirming the reduction of capital conform to the said alternative special resolution, and approving of the second alternative minute proposed by the petitioners.*

* In his report the reporter stated, inter alia, as follows:—

"Section 3 of the Act of 1877 enumerates the modes of reducing capital, and applies to capital whether paid up, subscribed, or unissued, and embraces (1) cancelling lost capital; (2) cancelling capital unrepresented by available assets; (3) paying off capital in excess of the wants of the company; (4) cancelling issued but unpaid capital; and (5) cancelling unissued shares.

"Sir Henry Burton Buckley, in his work on 'The Law and Practice under the Companies Acts' (8th edition, page 615), observes that neither the Act of 1867 nor that of 1877 prescribes the manner in which the reduction of capital is to be effected. Nor is there, he adds, any limitation of the power of the Court to confirm the reduction except that it must first be satisfied that all the creditors entitled to object to the reduction have either consented or been paid or secured—(British Finance Corporation v. Couper, 1894, A. C. 399-403). The power of reduction is general, and extends to every possible mode of reducing capital—(Phoebe Gold Co., 1900, W. N. 182). Subject to the confirmation by the Court, which is required, and which is the safeguard of the minority, the question is a domestic one for the decision of the majority, and the Act leaves the Court to determine the extent, the mode, and the incidence of the reduction, and the application of any capital moneys which the reduction may set free.

"The observations made, and the cases referred to in Buckley, and those which have been decided in the Scotch Courts, all appear to deal with applications for the 'reduction of capital' in one form or other.

"The conclusion I have formed is that the first resolution printed in this petition cannot be confirmed by the Court as 'a reduction of capital' under either the Act of 1867 or that of 1877. The resolution in question purports to be 'a conversion' or 're-allocation' of the share capital, and I do not think it can in any sense be held to be 'a reduction of capital' within the meaning of the Acts founded on by the petitioners.

"I have found nothing in the Acts, nor in the authorities, which would warrant me in suggesting that such a resolution is competent as 'a reduction of capital,' but as the petitioners are anxious that the first resolution should be confirmed I have thought it right, in the absence

Nov. 16, 1907. Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Co., Limited. Argued for the petitioners ;—The petitioners preferred that the first alternative resolution should be confirmed rather than the second, because for Stock Exchange purposes it was better to have £1 shares than 12s. 6d. shares, and the directors wished to have unissued capital available for issue. It made no difference to anyone outside the Company which of the two resolutions was confirmed. This was a reduction of capital. The available capital was reduced. There was no statutory restriction as regards the manner of reduction. The approval of the Court was required solely to protect the interests of creditors, or possibly a dissentient minority of shareholders. Here the creditors all consented, and the shareholders were unanimous. Where there was no question as to the interests of creditors or a dissentient minority of shareholders the Court should not interfere with the decision of the domestic tribunal as to the method of reduction to be adopted.¹

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—In this case we have the benefit of a very careful report by Mr Winchester, and we have also had the advantage of a fair and candid statement by Mr Morton. He says that the shareholders would prefer to have the first alternative resolution confirmed. But the reporter is of opinion that we ought not to confirm the first alternative resolution, and that we ought to confirm the second, which has this at least to be said for it, that it is literally and plainly a resolution for “reduction of capital.” I agree with Mr Winchester. He does not say that any existing creditor will be prejudiced by the one proposal more than the other. But he says that a resolution to “convert” and “re-allocate capital” is not in terms or in reality a proposal to “reduce” capital. Therefore, the first alternative resolution is not strictly within the words of the statute. Mr Morton says that he has searched for and has failed to find any case which would be a precedent for doing what he asks the Court to do here. In the absence of such a case I think the safer course will be to walk by the strict words of the statute, and confirm the second alternative resolution.

LORD LOW.—I concur, but with considerable regret. I recognise, however, that the first of the alternative resolutions, although for practical purposes it amounts to very much the same thing as the second, does not in fact reduce the capital, which is the only matter which the statute empowers the Court to deal with.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur. I am of opinion that no reasons of expediency as far as I can find of any direct authority, to report the matter to your Lordships.

“The second or alternative resolution clearly imports a reduction of capital, and is authorised by the regulations of the Company as originally framed, and is competent under sections 9 to 19 of the Act of 1867. The petitioners ask for confirmation of one or other of the special resolutions, and I beg respectfully to suggest that, should your Lordships hold the first resolution to be incompetent, the second or alternative resolution may be confirmed.”

¹ Authorities cited.—In re Phoebe Gold Mining Co., 1900, W. N. 182; Buckley on the Companies Acts (8th ed.), p. 615, and cases there cited; Lindley on Companies (6th ed.), p. 557; Companies Act, 1867, secs. 9-19; Companies Act, 1877, secs. 3 and 4.

can justify the Court in departing by a hair's breadth from the provisions of the statutes under which alone they have jurisdiction to make alterations in the capital of a company that has been incorporated under the Companies Acts. Nov. 16, 1907.
Walker Steam
Trawl Fishing
Co., Limited.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the petition and proceedings, together with the report by Mr W. G. L. Winchester, No. of process, approve of said report; of new settle the list of creditors entitled to object to the proposed reduction of capital, No. 13 of process; find that they have all consented to the proposed reduction of capital; confirm the reduction of capital resolved on by the alternative resolution set forth in the petition; approve of the minute alternatively set forth in the petition; direct the registration of this confirmation order, and of the said minute, by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and on this order and the said minute being registered as aforesaid, direct notice of such registration to be given by advertisement once in the Edinburgh Gazette; and dispense altogether with the words 'and reduced' as part of the name of the Company; and decern."

JOHN N. RAE, S.S.C., Agent.

MONTGOMERIE & COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—
Clyde, K.C.—R. S. Horne.

No. 25.

THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCILLORS OF HADDINGTON, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Campbell—Malcolm.

Nov. 12, 1907.

Police—Public Health—Drainage—Sewers—Formation—Procedure—Statute—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 217, 220, 221—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), sec. 103—Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 24), secs. 1-5, and 7.—Notwithstanding the provisions of the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water Supply Act, 1901, it is competent for the town-council of a burgh, as sewerage authority in the burgh, (1) to carry out drainage operations in the burgh under the powers conferred by the 103d section of the Public Health Act, 1897, and (2) to do so without following the procedure or being subject to the conditions imposed by the Burgh Police Act, 1892. Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, 8 F. 77, followed.

Police—Public Health—Drainage—Sewers—Formation—Notice to Proprietors—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), sec. 103.—Terms of letter, which, in the circumstances, was held (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) not to be a reasonable notice to a proprietor in terms of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, sec. 103.

Police—Public Health—Drainage—Sewers—Formation—Failure to give reasonable notice to proprietor—Effect—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), secs. 103 and 109.—A burgh sewerage authority laid two sewer-pipes on and above the solum of the bed of a river in the burgh without giving reasonable notice, in the sense of sec. 103 of the Public Health Act, 1897, to a proprietor of lands on the bank of the river, who was owner of the river bed at least ad medium filum, with a right of common interest in the whole alveus, and who alleged that the result of the drainage operations was to subject his property to additional risk of flooding. The proprietor brought an action for removal of the pipes.

Nov. 12, 1907. Held that the proprietor was not entitled to have the sewer pipes removed, and the river bed restored to the condition in which it existed prior to the operations, in respect that, if the pipes were removed as demanded, he could not prevent the Local Authority, if they thereafter gave reasonable notice, from replacing the pipes in the same position.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

Dictum of Lord Adam in Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, 8 F. 77, p. 88, as to the functions of the Sheriff under sec. 109 of the Public Health Act, 1897, approved.

Expenses—Taxation—Party and Party or Agent and Client—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 3—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), sec. 166.—Held that, in virtue of sec. 3 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, that Act does not apply to an action against a Local Authority for an act done in pursuance of the Public Health Act, 1897.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

IN 1905 the Town-Council of the royal burgh of Haddington executed certain operations with the view of securing an improvement in the drainage of the burgh. These operations included the lifting and relaying of an existing 12-inch pipe and the construction of a new 18-inch pipe alongside it on the bed of the River Tyne where it flows downwards and northwards through the burgh of Haddington between two points in the burgh, viz., Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae. The 12-inch pipe as existing prior to these operations lay embedded under the surface of the bed of the River Tyne.

Messrs Montgomerie & Company, Limited, were the proprietors of certain lands, and of mills and maltings thereon, called the Bermaline Mills and Maltings, lying upon the east bank of the River Tyne, and within the royal burgh of Haddington. They claimed that they had right under their titles to the whole of the solum or alveus of the River Tyne between Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae, but that, apart from this contention, they had an undisputed right to the alveus ad medium filum, and a common interest in the stream. They also drew water for their mills and maltings from a dam in the River Tyne, and the weir of this dam was immediately above Victoria Bridge. Before the drainage operations above mentioned they had complained of a discharge of sewage which was made into the dam. By the proposed scheme for the improvement of the burgh drainage that discharge was to be discontinued, and all the sewage was to be taken down the river by means of the two pipes above mentioned.

On 20th June 1905 the Town-clerk of Haddington wrote to Montgomerie & Company, Limited, as follows:—"Church Street, &c., Drainage.—I send you herewith enclosed the plan which has now been approved of by the Council, in order that you may see what is proposed to be done. The leading features of the scheme are the substitution of an iron and clay spigot and faucet pipe for Myldsburn—the normal flow of Myldsburn being taken in a 6-inch fireclay pipe to the manhole at the foot of Gowl Close, and thereafter right down the drain—provision being made at the manhole at the end of Trinity Church for the abnormal flow of the burn, which would then discharge into the river to the south of the Victoria Bridge. The whole of the built Myldsburn conduit is to be removed. The existing 12-inch water-closet sewage pipe will remain, and enter the manhole at the foot of Gowl Close—which will also receive the contents of the drain coming down Gowl Close. The only drain which will discharge above the bridge will, as I have indicated, be the overflow of Mylds-burn when it is in flood, and I do not think there can be any objection to that, as when the burn is in flood the river will probably also be in flood. I shall be very glad to give you any further information. I am expecting to see your Mr Montgomerie soon, but, in the meantime, you might kindly return to me the plan, as it is wanted here.”

Nov. 12, 1907.
 —
 Montgomerie
 & Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Haddington
 Corporation.

The plan sent along with this letter shewed a 12-inch pipe, and alongside of it an 18-inch pipe, but it shewed nothing as to the level at which the pipes were to be laid.

On 23d June 1905 Montgomerie & Company, Limited, replied to the Town-clerk as follows:—“ We are in receipt of your favour of 20th inst. We quite approve of the scheme so far as it affects our property, and we think it will be a great improvement on the existing drainage system.”

On 24th June 1905 the Town-clerk wrote:—“ Drainage.—I have to thank you for your letter of yesterday, and note that you quite approve of the scheme so far as it affects your property.”

Thereafter the Town-Council proceeded with the proposed drainage operations, beginning work in September 1905. They took up the existing 12-inch pipe, and relaid it on the surface of the bed of the river between Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae. Alongside it, and also on the surface of the river bed, they laid the new 18-inch pipe. They covered these pipes with cement, and so covered the two pipes formed a structure of from 4 to 10 feet in breadth. This structure was wholly to the westward of the medium filum of the river.

In December 1905 Montgomerie & Company, Limited, who alleged that they had only discovered the fact of the pipes being laid on the surface of the river bed in November, applied for interim interdict in the Bill-Chamber. Interim interdict having been refused, they brought an action against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the royal burgh of Haddington, in which they concluded (1) for declarator that they were proprietors of the whole solum or alveus of the River Tyne between Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae, or otherwise that they had a right of common interest therein; (2) for declarator that the defenders had no right to construct any works upon the said portion of the solum or alveus of the said river; (3) for interdict against their laying, inter alia, sewer drain pipes thereon, or from otherwise encroaching upon or interfering with the bed or flood channel of the said river between the said points in any way which might have the effect of altering the natural flow of the said river, or of diverting the stream of said river in times of flood from its accustomed course, and of throwing the same upon the lands of the pursuers; and (4) for decree ordaining the defenders “to restore the bed or flood channel of the said river between the said points to the condition in which it existed prior to the operations of the defenders thereon, and to remove away therefrom all pipes, manholes, cesspools, or other works or structures and building material laid down by them thereon.”

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 19) “The operations complained of are in violation of the proprietary rights of the pursuers, and are illegal. They will necessarily interfere, to the serious prejudice of the pursuers, with the natural flow of the river, and particularly in times of flood the proposed alteration of the bed of the stream will tend to divert the river from its accustomed course, and to throw the water upon the property of the pursuers. The defenders’ proposed works

Nov. 12, 1907.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

contract the bed of the river where it is narrow. They form a bulwark or an embankment of about 123 yards in length, which extends into the river from 10 to 12 feet, and is about 3 feet in height. . . . Such works, if completed, will form a permanent obstruction, and be a continual source of great danger to the pursuers' property."

The defenders denied this averment.

The pursuers also averred:—(Cond. 12) "The said operations complained of on the part of the defenders are entirely unauthorised. They have obtained no right of wayleave of any kind from the pursuers. Their operations are contrary to the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, and the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901." (Cond. 13) "In particular, the defenders have not complied with the provisions of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. . . . The defenders have not obtained the consent in writing of the pursuers to the operations complained of, as provided by section 217 of this statute. The defenders, further, did not give notice of their intention to execute such operations as was incumbent upon them under section 220 thereof. Nor did they obtain an estimate and report in connection therewith from their surveyor, as provided by section 226 thereof. . . ." (Cond. 14) "Further, while the pursuers maintain that the defenders were bound to carry out their intended operations in accordance solely with the provisions of the said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and upon the assumption that the defenders claim to have acted under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, it is the fact, and the pursuers aver, that the defenders also failed to observe the provisions of the said Statute of 1897." (Cond. 15) "Under the said Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, the defenders were bound, in terms of section 103, before constructing and carrying their said drains in the manner complained of, into, through, or under the lands of the pursuers, . . . to have given the pursuers reasonable notice in writing of such intended operations on their part. . . ." (Cond. 16) "The said letter of 20th June 1905 was not a notice under the said Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, and was not intended to be so. Moreover, the said letter of 20th June 1905 did not, in point of fact, notify the pursuers that the defenders (1) intended to uplift the said then existing 12-inch drain, and to relay it; (2) intended to lay down a new 18-inch drain in the said river bed between the said Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae foresaid; or (3) to proceed with drainage operations of any kind to the north of the said Gowl Close, or to the north of the said Victoria Bridge. Gowl Close is on the south side thereof. It gave, further, no notice of any kind that the defenders intended to alter the levels of such existing drain, or to make the level of any proposed new drain above the surface instead of beneath the surface of the said river bed." (Cond. 18) "By the said Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901, and by terms of section 5 thereof in particular, the said Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, is incorporated, subject to the necessary modifications, with the said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, which is there styled the principal Act. In virtue of this section, the said provisions of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, in regard to notice as aforesaid, are repealed by implication, or fall to be disregarded as necessary modifications in the sense of the said section, in all cases where the Local Authority is the Town-Council of a burgh. The defenders were bound to comply with the provisions of the said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and to disregard the said provisions of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897." * Nov. 12, 1907.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), enacts :—

Sec. 217. "Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise the Commissioners, contrary to any private right, to use, injure, or interfere with any sewers or other works already made or used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any local or private Act of Parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating lands, or to use, injure, or interfere with any watercourse, stream, river, dock, basin, wharf, quay, or towing-path in which the owner or occupier of any lands, mills, mines, or machinery, or the proprietors of any canal or navigation, shall have right and interest, without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same; and nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice or affect the rights, privileges, powers, or authorities given or reserved to any person under any local or private Act of Parliament for the drainage, preservation, or improvement of land, or for or in respect of any mills, mines, machinery, canal, or navigation as last aforesaid."

Sec. 220. "Twenty-eight days at the least before making any new sewer where none previously existed, or altering the course or level of or abandoning or stopping any sewer, the Commissioners shall give notice of their intention, by posting a notice in a conspicuous place at each end of every such street through or in which such work is to be undertaken, which notice shall set forth the names of the streets and places through or near which it is intended that the new sewer shall pass, or the existing sewer be altered or stopped up, and also the places at the beginning and the end thereof, and shall refer to the plans of such intended work, and shall specify a place where such plans may be seen, and a time when and place where all persons interested in such intended work may be heard thereupon."

Sec. 221. "The Commissioners shall meet at the time and place mentioned in the said notice to consider, in the presence of the surveyor of the Commissioners, any objections made against such intended work, and all persons interested therein, or likely to be aggrieved thereby, shall be entitled to be heard before the Commissioners at such meeting; and thereupon the Commissioners may, at their discretion, abandon or make such alterations in the said intended work as they judge fit; and no such work to which any objection is made at such meeting shall be executed unless the burgh surveyor, after the person making such objection, or his agent, has been heard, shall certify that the work ought to be executed, nor shall such work be begun until the end of seven days after an order for the execution thereof has been duly made by the Commissioners, and entered in their books."

The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), enacts :—

Sec. 103. "The local authority shall have power to construct within their district, and also when necessary for the purpose of outfall or distribution or disposal or treatment of sewage, without their district, such sewers as they may think necessary for keeping their district properly cleansed and drained, and may carry such sewers through, across, or under any public or other road, or any street or place, or under any cellar or vault which may be under the foot pavement or carriageway of any street or road, and after reasonable notice in writing (if upon the report of a surveyor it should appear to be necessary), into, through, or under any lands whatsoever, and from time to time to enlarge, lessen, alter, arch over or otherwise improve, or to close up or destroy, all sewers vested in them, provided no nuisance is created by such operations; and if any person is thereby deprived of the lawful use of any sewer, the local authority shall provide another sufficiently effectual for his use. The local authority shall cause their sewers to be so constructed, maintained, kept, and cleansed as not to be a nuisance,

Nov. 12, 1907.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders' operations complained of being without any statutory authority or other legal warrant, et separatim, the defenders having failed to comply with the provisions of any statute conferring powers upon them for the construction of sewers or drains within or upon the property of the pursuers, the pursuers are entitled to have the said operations interdicted as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The pursuers having consented to the operations now complained of, et separatim, having acquiesced in said operations during the progress of the work, decree should be refused, with expenses. (5) The defenders' whole operations having been proceeded with under and in virtue of the powers conferred on them by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, and they having complied with the requirements of said Act, or, alternatively, the pursuers having waived any objection competent to them on the

and for the purpose of cleansing and emptying them may construct and place, either above or under ground, such reservoirs, sluices, engines, or other works as may be necessary, and may, subject to the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Acts, cause such sewers to communicate with and be emptied into such places as may be fit and necessary either within their district, or, if necessary for the purpose of outfall or distribution or disposal or treatment of sewage, without their district, and to cause the sewage and refuse therefrom to be collected for sale or for any purpose whatsoever, but so as not to create a nuisance."

Sec. 109. "In case it shall become necessary to enter, examine, or lay open any lands or premises for the purpose of making plans, surveying, measuring, taking levels, examining works, ascertaining the course of sewers or drains, making or repairing, altering or enlarging sewers or drains, or other purposes ancillary to the powers herein given as to sewers and drains, and the owner or occupier of premises refuses or withholds access and leave to perform the said operations, the local authority may, after written notice to such owner and occupier, apply to the Sheriff, who, if no sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary, shall grant warrant to the local authority, their officers and others thereby authorised, to enter and do all or any of the works or operations foresaid at all reasonable times in the daytime."

Sec. 190. "Except in so far as expressly provided, nothing in this Act shall prejudice or affect the provisions . . . of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, as amended. . . ."

The Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 24), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "Where sums of money have been borrowed or are owing by the town-council or commissioners of a burgh under any Act for purposes of sewerage and drainage or water-supply, the town-council as the authority under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (hereinafter referred to as the principal Act), as amended by the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, shall provide the sums necessary for repaying the principal and paying the interest of such sums out of the assessments hereinafter mentioned. . . ."

Sec. 2. "In any burgh, or in any special or separate drainage district formed therein under any Act, the expense incurred either before or after the passing of this Act for sewerage and drainage or water-supply, as the case may be, within the same, or for the purposes thereof, and the sums necessary for repayment of any money borrowed therefor either before or after the passing of this Act, together with the interest thereof, shall be paid out of a sewer assessment or water assessment, as the case may be, which the town-council of the burgh shall raise and levy on and within such burgh or (in the case of the sewer assessment) within such special or separate district, in the same manner, and with the same remedies and ground that the requirements of said Act had not been complied with, Nov. 12, 1907.

the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

Proof was allowed and led.

The material facts proved are set forth in the foregoing narrative.

On 6th July 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders' whole operations complained of were lawfully instituted and proceeded with under and in virtue of the powers conferred upon them by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, and that they have validly complied with the requirements of the said Act: Sustains the first alternative branch of the fifth plea in law for the defenders; assoilzies them from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses as

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

modes of recovery and incidents, as are provided for the public health general assessment therein."

Sec. 3. "All special or separate drainage districts that may have been formed in any burgh under any Public Health Act shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to be drainage districts under the principal Act."

Sec. 5. "The powers and duties of the town-council of any burgh, as the authority under the principal Act, with reference to sewerage and drainage or water-supply shall extend to the whole area of the burgh as existing for the purposes of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, and the town-council of any burgh, as the authority under the principal Act, in addition to the powers conferred upon them by the principal Act, or any other Act, shall, with reference to sewerage and drainage or water-supply within such area, have the same rights, powers, and privileges as are conferred by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, upon local authorities under that Act in districts other than burghs, with the exception of the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by sections 122 and 131 of the last-mentioned Act, to which sections the present section shall not apply, and in so far as necessary for giving effect to this enactment the last-mentioned Act and the Acts and parts of Acts incorporated therewith are, subject to the necessary modifications, incorporated with the principal Act.

"Provided that all costs and charges incurred by the town-council in the exercise of such rights, powers, and privileges shall be provided for out of the sewer assessment or water assessment before mentioned, as the case may be, and that where it shall be necessary for the town-council to borrow money for the purposes of sewerage and drainage, or water-supply, they shall be entitled to do so on the security of the sewer assessment or water assessment hereinbefore mentioned, in lieu of the assessments mentioned in the principal Act, or the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, as the case may be."

Sec. 7 repeals the Acts specified in the schedule to the extent therein mentioned "in so far as the same apply to burghs to which this Act applies from its commencement." The schedule does not include sec. 103 or sec. 109 of the Public Health Act, 1897.

The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), enacts:—

Sec. 3. "This Act shall not apply to any action, prosecution, or other proceeding for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any Act of Parliament, or on account of any act done in any case instituted under an Act of Parliament, when that Act of Parliament applies to Scotland only, and contains a limitation of the time and other conditions for the action, prosecution, or proceeding."

The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), enacts:—

Sec. 166. "The local authority and the board shall not be liable in

Nov. 12, 1907. between agent and client, in terms of section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61)." *

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

damages for any irregularity committed by their officers in the execution of this Act, or for anything done by themselves in the bona fide execution of this Act; and every officer acting in the bona fide execution of this Act shall be indemnified by the local authority under which he acts in respect of all costs, liabilities, and charges to which he may be subjected; and every action or prosecution against any person acting under this Act shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen. . . ."

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are proprietors of certain lands and of mills, &c., thereon lying upon the east bank of the River Tyne, and within the royal burgh of Haddington. By their summons they ask for declarator that they are heritable proprietors of the whole of the solum or alveus of the said river between Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae within the said royal burgh, or otherwise, that they have a right of common interest therein. In the argument, the first of these alternatives was not insisted in. Declarator is then asked to the effect that the defenders, who are the Town-Council of Haddington, have neither right nor title to construct any works or buildings upon the solum or alveus of the said river between the said points, or otherwise to encroach upon or to interfere with it. Conclusions then follow for interdict, and for the restoration of the bed or flood channel of the river between the said points to the condition in which it existed prior to certain recent operations by the defenders. It is common ground that, for some years past, the Town-Council of Haddington have had under consideration a scheme or schemes for the improvement of the drainage of the burgh, and that, in 1905, they did in fact execute certain operations with the view of securing this end. These operations, to describe them quite briefly and generally, consisted in, or rather included, the lifting and relaying of an existing 12-inch pipe, and the construction of a new 18-inch pipe, from Victoria Bridge northwards down to Spoutwell Brae. It is not, I think, maintained either that remedial works were unnecessary, or that any better scheme of improvement could have been devised than that which has been executed—that is from the point of view of the public interest, and apart from all questions of legality or interference with private rights.

"A proof has been led which was of unnecessary length, and, in parts, of doubtful relevancy; and, in the argument which followed, an immense variety of topics was canvassed with great zeal and ability. In the view which I take of the case, it may, I consider, be disposed of with reasonable brevity, and upon simple and distinct grounds.

"The main issue, or at least one of the most important issues raised, was whether or not the defenders gave to the pursuers 'reasonable notice in writing' within the meaning of section 103 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act of 1897 before proceeding to execute the works complained of. The defenders allege that they did give such notice, viz.—by the Town-clerk's letter of 20th June 1905, which is fully printed in the record, and the plan which accompanied that letter. I need not pause to consider the preliminary point which was maintained by the defenders to the effect that no such notice was, in the circumstances, required, looking to the terms of the earlier branch of section 103, and to the position of the pursuers in regard to the locus of the operations. I assume, as the Town-clerk did, that 'reasonable notice in writing' was necessary, and, so assuming, I am of opinion that it was duly given to the pursuers by the said letter and plan. The pursuers' counsel argued strenuously to a contrary effect. His argument was based principally upon the grounds that neither the letter nor the plan sent with it disclosed at what level it was intended to lay the sewers; that the plan shewed the proposed works incorrectly in certain respects; and

The pursuers reclaimed.

Nov. 12, 1907.

The case was heard before the Second Division on 18th, 19th, 26th, and 27th June, and 2d July 1907.

Argued for the pursuers and reclaimers;—(1) The Town-Council, as the sewerage and drainage authority in a burgh, had no power to carry out the operations in question under sec. 103 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, but were bound to proceed under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and subject to the conditions imposed by that Act. This clearly appeared from a consideration of the sections of the statutes undernoted.¹ It was not pretended that the defenders complied with the provisions of secs. 217, 220, and 221 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. (2) Even if the defenders were entitled to proceed under sec. 103 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, the effect of the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply Act, 1901, secs. 3 and 5, was that they could only pro-

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

that the pipes, as laid, are de facto to some extent further out riverward than as indicated upon the plan. The premises of their argument may be taken to be substantially correct, but it fails, in my opinion, as proceeding upon an erroneous view of the kind and character of notice which the statute contemplates. I find no warrant for holding that the Local Authority is bound to supply persons affected, or likely to be affected, by their scheme with complete details of what it is proposed to do, under penalty, if they fail to do so, of their notice being held to be inept. The power of the Local Authority to construct sewers, into, through, or under lands is a very wide and drastic one. The notice to be given must be 'reasonable,' but I do not think that that infers a duty to disclose the scheme precisely and in detail. It is, I apprehend, sufficiently complied with if the party to whom notice is given is informed generally, in reasonably distinct terms, of the nature of the intended work in so far as it is to be situated upon or to pass through his lands. The case is not, I think, like that of a notice to treat for the compulsory acquisition of land. It is obviously proper and convenient that notice of some sort should be given to those having sufficient title and interest to receive it in order that they may not be taken unawares, and also to allow them opportunity of endeavouring, after a demand for and receipt of fuller details, to arrange with the Local Authority for such alteration or variation of the proposed works as they may desire, and the Authority may be prepared to concede. These are, I think, probably the principal reasons why notice is required to be given. In this case the Town-clerk in his letter of 20th June, after describing 'the leading features of the scheme,' expressly added, 'I shall be very glad to give you any further information.' I may here note that the proof involves, inter alia, a lengthy and keenly fought controversy as to what plan it was which was sent to the pursuers along with the letter of 20th June. The defenders' evidence is to the effect that it was No. 8 of process. The pursuers contend that it was No. 33 of process, or, at all events, that it was not No. 8. The matter is, to my mind, involved in great obscurity; and I confess that even now I am not certain whether the plan sent was No. 8 or not, although I think that the balance of proof is in favour of the view that the plan which was sent was in fact No. 8 of process. But the point seems to me to be quite ¹ Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 3, 7, 24, 71, 72, 73, 76, and 93; Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 4, 7-12, 21, 23, 42, 43, 215, 217-221, 224, 226, 237, 339, 361, 362, and 363; Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, secs. 3, 12, 101, 103, 104, 109, 113, 114, 122, 131, 133, 134, and 190; Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, sec. 8; Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901, secs. 1-5, 7, and Schedule; Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 3.

Nov. 12, 1907.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

ceed under sec. 103 subject to the conditions imposed by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and particularly sec. 217 thereof. They had not, as required by sec. 217, obtained the consent of the pursuers. (3) In the case of *Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright*¹ the effect of the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply Act, 1901, had not been properly pleaded to or considered by the Court. That decision was consequently pronounced under a misapprehension, and it was erroneous, and ought to be reconsidered. (4) Even assuming that the defenders were entitled to proceed under sec. 103 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, without complying with any of the requirements of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, they had not even fulfilled the requirements of sec. 103. They had not given the pursuers "reasonable notice in writing." The Town-clerk's letter of 20th June 1905 was not "reasonable notice." There was no foundation for the contention that the pursuers had waived this objecimmateral. I regret that it was elaborated to such an extent; but I did not see my way to exclude or to check ab ante the evidence which both sides were eager to tender. It appears to be common ground that the plan sent on 20th June, whether it was No. 8 of process or another, did indicate upon its face two lines of proposed pipes between Victoria Bridge and Spoutwell Brae, in approximately, though not identically, the positions in which the sewers were subsequently laid, although the plan did not disclose the level at which it was proposed to lay them. For the reasons above expressed I do not think that the notice can be held to be invalid or insufficient upon any of the grounds upon which the pursuers' counsel founded, and to which I have already referred. But it was further argued for the pursuers that the letter of 20th June did not amount to a valid notice, because at its date the Town-Council had not in fact come to any absolute and unqualified resolution to proceed with the whole sewerage works which they subsequently constructed. In regard to this point, and to that which I shall immediately after deal with, a good deal of the evidence led was, in my opinion, loose and unconvincing, and some of it incompetent. I refer to what was said by a number of witnesses as to what passed at the various meetings of Town-Council, the minutes of which are produced. Parole evidence may well be adduced to explain the language of any minute of a public body where its terms are ambiguous and require explanation, but not, in my judgment, in order to contradict the resolution which a minute records as having been passed at any meeting, nor to prove that some resolution was verbally arrived at although not recorded. I may refer on this matter to the recent case of School Board of Tarbert v. Aird, February 17th, 1905, 42 S. L. R. 373. The question, however, is not of real importance in the view which I take of the matter. It is, I think, clear enough that at 20th June 1905 the Town-Council had not committed themselves to the construction of the whole scheme. They had had some consideration of an alternative proposal to execute a cheaper, because less extensive, programme; and a final decision was, I think, left open, pending the ascertaining of what was at 20th June still a matter of uncertainty, viz., the cost of the undertaking. That this was so appears, I think, from the minutes themselves, the engineers' reports, the specification, and the correspondence. Assuming that this was the actual position, and discarding the parole evidence given to the effect that the defenders had come before 20th June 1905 to a verbal resolution to proceed with the whole scheme, I am unable to see that the pursuers take any material benefit. It is not, I apprehend, a condition precedent of giving a valid notice under section 103 that the Local Authority shall be committed or bound to go on with and

¹ 1905, 8 F. 77.

tion. (5) The obstruction placed by the defenders in the river without any statutory authority was highly detrimental to the pursuers, and gave them as riparian proprietors a good ground of action.¹ (6) The pursuers were entitled to have the pipes removed.² (7) In any case the defenders were not entitled to expenses as between agent and client under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. This case fell within the exception of sec. 3 of that Act in respect of the provisions of sec. 166 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897.

Nov. 12, 1907.
 —
 Montgomerie
 & Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Haddington
 Corporation.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—(1) The Town-Council were entitled to proceed under sec. 103 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, without complying with the requirements of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. This case so far was ruled by Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright.³ It clearly appeared from the arguments as reported in that case that the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply Act, 1901, was brought under the notice of the complete the whole works contemplated, or that they shall have formally resolved to proceed with the whole and not merely with a part of the scheme. Here, again, I think that the pursuers' conception of the sort of notice required, and of the purposes for which it is required, is based upon error. The same remark is, in my judgment, applicable to the next point which it was endeavoured to establish for the pursuers. This was that at 20th June 1905, when the letter and plan were sent, the Town-clerk had not been specially authorised by his Council to serve this or any other notice in the matter. Assuming the fact to be so—and I rather think that it was—the pursuers' case does not appear to me to be advanced. The Town-clerk was in the month of July duly authorised in that behalf; and I think that, as in a question with the pursuers or any other third party, the previous notice was thus clearly validated, so far as any want of authority was concerned. The objection is one which, in my judgment, could be pleaded only by the Town-Council themselves. I may refer upon this point to the English case of Cheetham, 1875, L. R., 10 C. P. 249.

“In my opinion, therefore, the defenders did give the pursuers ‘reasonable notice in writing’ within the sense and the language of the Act. If this view is well founded, then I need not consider or decide the further defences based upon alleged consent, or agreement, or acquiescence by the pursuers, with which a considerable portion of the proof was occupied. Nor, of course, do the conclusions for interdict, and for restoration of the solum, and the defenders' answers to these, arise for consideration.

“Only one matter, I think, remains as to which I ought to say something. An argument was advanced and pressed, which does not seem to me to be sufficiently pleaded upon the record, and which I understood to be given up by the pursuers' counsel in the Procedure-Roll discussion (at all events so far as the Outer-House is concerned), but which, if it were well founded, would apparently afford a conclusive answer to the defenders' whole case. It was maintained, with reference to section 217 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, that the works complained of were fundamentally illegal and unwarranted, because the defenders have proceeded to ‘interfere with’ a ‘stream’ or ‘river’ ‘in which the owner . . . of any lands, mills . . . or machinery . . . have right and interest, without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same.’ In my judgment, this argument, even assuming that it is properly before me,

¹ Menzies v. Breadalbane, 1828, 3 W. & S. 235; Jackson v. Marshall, 1872, 10 Macph. 913; Bicket v. Morris, 1866, 4 Macph. (H. L.) 44.

² Krehl v. Burrell, 1878, 7 Ch. D. 551, 1879, 11 Ch. D. 146; Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 91.

³ 8 F. 77.

Nov. 12, 1907.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

Court. But even if the matter was not concluded by authority, and the case of *Brown*¹ was open to reconsideration, it was rightly decided. This appeared from a consideration of the sections founded on by the pursuers. The Act of 1901 enlarged, and did not restrict, the powers of town-councils as sewer authorities in burghs. (2) The defenders had given the pursuers "reasonable notice," within the meaning of sec. 103 of the Act of 1897, by the Town-clerk's letter of 20th June 1905. The defenders were not restricted to carrying their sewers under ground.² (3) The pursuers were neither owners nor occupiers of the bed of the river, and so were not entitled to receive notice. They had given up their claim to the alveus. As riparian proprietors they were not entitled to notice. Further, this was only a repair and alteration of sewers, not a construction of new sewers, and therefore no notice was required. (4) Even if notice was required, and no sufficient notice had been given, the Court would not order the work to cannot be given effect to. In the first place, I gravely doubt whether the section referred to, when carefully read in its entirety, and in conjunction with the surrounding context of the Act, amounts to an absolute prohibition against any interference by Police Commissioners with any stream in which owners of land or mills are interested, unless the latter are willing to grant a written consent. In the second place, if such consent by the present pursuers were necessary, I am not sure that it is not to be found in their letter of 23d June 1905, which was written after receipt of and in reply to the Town-clerk's letter of 20th June and relative plan. Whatever the pursuers may have understood or misunderstood as to the proposals of the Town-Council, they could not, I think, have failed to see that the intention of the latter was to 'interfere,' in the manner generally indicated, with the 'river' Tyne in the immediate vicinity of their 'mills.' And the pursuers say,—'We quite approve of the scheme so far as it affects our property.' But in the third place, I do not think that the section referred to has any place in, or reference to, the case with which we are here dealing. The defenders gave what I have held to be 'reasonable notice in writing,' under the Public Health Act, 1897, and they proceeded to carry out their works under the powers and provisions conferred upon them by that Act. Now, it was decided in the recent case of Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, 17th November 1905, 8 F. 77, that 'the procedure prescribed by the Act of 1897 for a Local Authority in the making of sewers was a code complete in itself, and that a Local Authority was entitled to exercise the powers given by the Act for the making of sewers in conformity therewith, without regard to the procedure prescribed by the Burgh Police Act.' Lord Adam, in that case, said,—'The proceedings in this case were taken by the Local Authority under the Public Health Act of 1897, and the powers conferred by that Act are, I agree with Lord M'Laren, entirely independent of any powers that may be granted under the Burgh Police Act or other Acts.' What Lord M'Laren had said was as follows,—'I think it is impossible, on a fair reading of the Public Health Act, 1897, to come to any other conclusion than that the procedure there authorised was intended to be complete in itself. . . . I cannot conceive that, in applying the powers of the Act to burghs, the Legislature intended to put upon the administrators of the burgh the impossible task of carrying out constructive works under the provisions of two codes, each of which deals completely, but in a different way from the other, with the subject in hand. In availing themselves of the powers given by the Public Health Act, 1897, I think that the Magistrates and Council are within their rights if they be undone merely to cure an informality, when, upon its being undone and proper notice given, it could be at once reinstated.¹ (5) The pursuers (a) had consented, (b) had acquiesced in the work being carried out as it was, and (c) had waived any objection on the ground of want of notice. (6) The works here produced no sensible effect on the flow or level of the river, and therefore could not be objected to by the pursuers as riparian proprietors.² (7) The defenders if successful were entitled to expenses as between agent and client. Sec. 166 of the Public Health Act, 1897, contained no "other conditions" in the sense of sec. 3 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

¹ 8 F. 77.

² Roderick v. Aston Local Board, 1877, 5 Ch. D. 328.

Nov. 12, 1907.
 —
 Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation.

The authorities undernoted were also referred to.³

At advising on 12th November 1907,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—After mature consideration I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment in favour of the Burgh of Haddington is right, and should be adhered to. The conduct of the case comply with the requirements of that statute, and they are not required, as part of their duty under that Act, to refer to the provisions of previous Acts of Parliament under which cognate powers are conferred.' The pursuers' argument was based upon an ingenious application of the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply (Scotland) Act, 1901. Prior to that Act there existed, of course, two separate and independent statutory codes of procedure in regard to the sewerage of drainage districts in burghs, viz.—(a) Under the Police Acts, 1862 and 1892; and (b) under the Public Health Acts, 1867 and 1897. Section 3 of the Act of 1901 provides that 'All special or separate drainage districts that may have been formed in any burgh under any Public Health Act shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to be drainage districts under the principal Act,' i.e., the Act of 1892. It was contended that the intention and effect of this provision were to transfer all existing drainage districts which had been formed under the second of the codes above mentioned so as to place them under the Police Act code. Then section 5 of the 1901 Act was referred to, by which, inter alia, it is enacted that the Town-Council of any burgh, as the Authority under 'the principal Act,' in addition to the powers conferred upon them by that Act, or any other Act, shall have the same rights, powers, and privileges as are conferred by the Act of 1897 upon Local Authorities under that Act in districts other than burghs, with certain exceptions, 'and in so far as necessary for giving effect to this enactment the last-mentioned Act and the Acts and parts of Acts incorporated therewith are, subject to the necessary modifications, incorporated with the principal Act.' The pursuers urged that, under the Act of 1901, the Town-Council, while they have the powers of the Public Health Act, have them only by way of incorporation with those of the 'principal' Act of 1892; that section 217 of that Act stands unrepealed, and is an integral part of and limitation upon the Town-Council's powers, whether they profess to proceed under the 'principal' Act or under the Public Health Act, and

¹ Phillips v. Dunoon Police Commissioners, 1884, 12 R. 159; Hutchings v. Seaford Urban District Council, 1898, 43 Solicitors' Journal, 41.

² Bicket v. Morris, 1866, 4 Macph. (H. L.) 44; Orr-Ewing & Co. v. Colquhoun's Trustees, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 116; Jackson v. Marshall, 10 Macph. 913, per Lord Justice-Clerk, at p. 917; M'Gavin v. M'Intyre Brothers, 1890, 17 R. 818, per Lord Trayner, at p. 824.

³ Lewis v. Weston-super-Mare Local Board, 1888, 40 Ch. D. 55; Cheetam v. The Mayor, &c., of the City of Manchester, 1875, L. R., 10 C. P. 249; Police Commissioners of Kirkintilloch v. M'Donald, 1890, 18 R. 67; Swanston v. Twickenham Local Board, 1879, 11 Ch. D. 838.

Nov. 12, 1907. throughout has been marked by an ability which has only been equalled by its keenness. Now, where private interests conflict with an admitted public benefit, and the question comes before a Court of law, the Court, in my opinion, ought to be strict to mark any neglect of the private interest which amounts to a failure to make compensation for the property either taken or injuriously affected. But where, as here, there is no case of that kind, but only a difference of opinion as to the precise method by which the public benefit is to be conferred, and a criticism of the legal machinery which has been invoked in attaining it, I do not think that any such duty arises. Of course the public authority charged with the execution of the work must proceed according to law, but it is not every captious objection to their procedure that is to be listened to, particularly if it results in no serious or even sensible injury to the person objecting. And that, in my view, is a fair description of the kind of injury alleged here.

Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.
LdStormonth-
Darling.

The case for the pursuers is, not that an improved system for the drainage of Haddington was altogether unnecessary, or even that the system actually projected and partially carried out was not a "great improvement" in the public interest; they admitted as much by their letter of 23d June 1905, p. 30 of the joint print. Their case as now presented, after a great part of the work has been done, is that they did not discover till 10th November of that year that the defenders were interfering with the alveus of the River Tyne, which, at the place in question, is their property, or in which at least they have a common interest with others, the interference consisting, not in the discharge of sewage into the river, but in the laying of certain drain pipes on the surface of the alveus, instead of in the bed of the river, and thereby affecting the natural flow of the river opposite their mills; that the defenders could not, under the 217th section of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, interfere with the stream without the pursuers' consent in writing, that they gave no such consent, and that, even if the defenders were justified in proceeding under the Public Health Act, 1897, alone, they did not follow the directions of that Act, because they failed to give reasonable notice to the pursuers, as required by section 103, of their intention to carry their sewers through the property of the pursuers, and, in particular, did that the proceedings here complained of have been gone about in violation of section 217. They say that this point was not raised or decided in Brown's case. That is so far true, because in Brown's case section 217 does not seem to have been referred to, and had, indeed, so far as appears, no application in the circumstances there existing. But the Act of 1901 was before the Court, as is shewn by the reported arguments of counsel, and it was upon a consideration and construction of that Act and of the other Acts that the case was decided, and the opinions were pronounced which I have already sufficiently quoted. I think that, in view of these opinions, the question now raised can scarcely be held to be open, at all events so far as the Outer-House is concerned. As I have before stated, it is not, I think, properly raised upon the record, but, as the point was ably and strenuously argued by the pursuers' counsel, I have thought it right to express my views in regard to that.

"The result of the whole matter is that, in my opinion, the defenders' operations have been gone about lawfully, and in compliance with their statutory powers. The action therefore fails, and the defenders must be assoilzied."

not send to them the report of a surveyor to the effect that such a course was necessary. The practical conclusion of the summons is that the defenders ought to be ordained to lift all their pipes and other structures, and restore the channel of the river to its former condition. It will thus be seen that the nature of the case leading to these rather startling conclusions is both complicated and involved. It means that, where a burgh is situate on a running stream, the town-council of that burgh cannot improve its drainage, however desirable in the public interest, if the scheme involves any interference with that running stream, without the consent in writing of everybody who can qualify any sort of right or interest in that part of the stream. It also means that the administrators of a burgh must make up their minds, before they set a drainage scheme on foot, which of two extant and possibly inconsistent codes they are to follow, under penalty that if they make a slip they may be called upon, months after the work has been done, to undo it at great public detriment and expense. This may be the result of too much legislation on a particular subject, or of want of care in framing the legislation; but it is not a result to be readily adopted.

Nov. 12, 1907.
 ———
 Montgomerie
 & Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Haddington
 Corporation.
 ———
 LdStormonth-
 Darling.

The Lord Ordinary finds a sufficient justification for the interlocutor which he has pronounced in the recent First Division case of Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright,¹ in which it was held that the procedure prescribed by the Public Health Act, 1897, for a Local Authority in the making of sewers was a code complete in itself, and that a Local Authority was entitled to exercise the powers given by that Act (as the Magistrates of Kirkcudbright did) without regard to the procedure prescribed by the Burgh Police Act. That conclusion was necessary to the judgment, and none of the Judges expressed any dissent from it. Undoubtedly it justified the decision in this case, so far as the Outer-House was concerned, if the Lord Ordinary was of opinion, as he was, that the notice here given was in fact reasonable. Brown's case¹ would not be equally binding on us, for we might take measures for the reconsideration of the point if we thought such a course desirable. But, so far as I personally am concerned, I am quite satisfied with the decision in Brown's case.¹ I have no fault to find with it of any kind, and it was a unanimous judgment of the First Division.

It was urged by Mr Clyde for the pursuers that, while the defenders might have had an option to proceed either under the Act of 1892 or under the Act of 1897 before the passing of the Burgh Sewerage and Water-Supply Act of 1901, they had no such option after the passing of that Act, and that Brown's case¹ would have been, or ought to have been, decided otherwise than it was, if the provisions of the Act of 1901 had been properly brought before the First Division. I do not think so. The First Division had the Act of 1901 in view when they pronounced their judgment, and I do not see that it makes the great difference for which Mr Clyde contends. No doubt by section 1 it calls the Act of 1892 "the principal Act"; and, where sums of money have been borrowed for purposes of sewerage or water-supply, it lays upon town-councils the duty of providing the sums necessary for repaying the principal and for paying interest on such sums out of a special assessment to be made under the Act of 1892, with certain

¹ Nov. 17, 1905, 8 F. 77.

Nov. 12, 1907. limitations as to amount, and certain provisions as to approval of the Local Government Board for Scotland in the case of such prescribed amounts not being sufficient to meet the expenditure. It is also true that by section 5 of the Act the town-council of any burgh, in addition to the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1892 or any other Act, with reference to sewerage and water-supply, are to have the same rights, powers, and privileges as are conferred by the Public Health Act of 1897 upon Local Authorities under that Act in districts other than burghs, with certain specified exceptions. Further, it is true that to make these provisions harmonise with the course of legislation, sections 101, 113, 133, 134, and 137 of the Act of 1897 are repealed. But all that does not get over the fact that section 103 of the Act of 1897 is not repealed; and so long as it was left standing it does not seem to me that it was in any respect ultra vires of the defenders to proceed under section 103, which gave them the power to construct within their district (which this extention undoubtedly was) "such sewers as they might think necessary for keeping their district properly cleansed and drained." They were made the judge of the necessity of such operations, at least in the first instance, and if the pursuers meant to challenge the necessity, or to demand a report by a "surveyor" in addition to the plan (whatever it was) which was sent with the letter of the Town-clerk dated 20th June 1905, then was the time, in my judgment, for the pursuers to have formulated their demand. I agree with all that the Lord Ordinary says in his opinion on this part of the case; and, particularly in view of the Town-clerk's offer to give the pursuers "any further information," I think it is too late now for the pursuers to complain that they did not get reasonable notice. I am satisfied that the pursuers on receipt of the letter of 20th June and its accompanying plan knew perfectly well that the defenders intended to carry a new drain "into, through, or under" the pursuers' lands, and that, their reply having been an express approval of the scheme without any qualification either as to the level of the new drain or otherwise, they must be held to have been satisfied of its necessity and of the sufficiency of the notice generally. It is clear from the decision of the case of *Roderick v. Aston Local Board*¹ in 1877, under the corresponding English Public Health Act of 1875, that a power to carry sewers "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever" cannot be read as if those words meant only "under."

In reaching the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right, I confess I do not share the doubts which, I understand, my brother Lord Low has as to the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's finding that the pursuers "have validly complied with the requirements of the Public Health Act, 1897." These doubts are, as I understand, founded on the view that the Town-clerk failed to disclose, either by his letter of 20th June, or by the plan which accompanied it, that the two proposed new pipes were not to be laid at the same level as the old single pipes, and that this omission, though not due to carelessness or a desire to conceal anything, was yet such as to justify the pursuers' assumption that the two new pipes were to be so laid. But that assumption (the justification of which I doubt, particularly looking to the note on the plan, No. 8 of process, that the old 12-inch pipe was "to be lifted and relaid") ought only in my view to have led to an inquiry for more information, which, be it observed, had been proposed in the Town-clerk's letter. At all events, it does not seem to me to negative what is the main issue on this part of the case, viz :—Whether the defenders gave "reasonable notice in writing" of the works which they proposed to execute upon private property.

¹ 5 Ch. Div. 328.

Nov. 12, 1907.
 ———
 Montgomerie
 & Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Haddington
 Corporation.
 ———
 LdStormonth-
 Darling.

It remains for consideration whether the proceedings of the burgh of Haddington have been gone about in violation of section 217 of the Act of 1892,—the section which provides that "nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise the Commissioners" to do certain things, including using, injuring, or interfering with any watercourse, stream, river, dock, basin, wharf, quay, or towing-path, in which the owner or occupier of any lands, mills, mines, or machinery, or the proprietors of any canal or navigation, shall have right and interest, "without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same." It might be enough to rely, as the Lord Ordinary does, on the judgment in *Brown's case*¹ as settling that the defenders did not require to resort to the Act of 1892 as authorising them to use, injure, or interfere with the River Tyne, inasmuch as section 103 of the Public Health Act of 1897 gave them the required authority, and all that section 217 says is that "nothing in this Act contained," i.e., the Act of 1892, shall be construed to authorise the Commissioners to do certain things. But, even if this were not so, I greatly doubt whether section 217 applies to this case at all. Reading the section as a whole, it looks to me very much as if the protection of the private owner was carried so far as to entitle him to withhold his consent altogether (instead of merely entitling him to receive compensation) for the reason that, in the exceptional cases specified, any interference with these "private sewers or watercourses," as the side-note calls them, might defeat the object aimed at by some local or private Act of Parliament, and not at all that, in the very common case of a river bordered by a town, any exceptional protection was thought to be necessary to guard against any, even the smallest, interference with the flow of the stream. The danger of pollution is dealt with separately in the Public Health Act by reference to the Rivers Pollution Prevention Acts; but I never understood that the high doctrine of Morris v. Bicket,² which related to building operations by an opposite neighbour on the alveus of a stream, was thought to be within the purview of sanitary or drainage statutes.

Moreover, if the pursuers were to insist on the view that their consent in writing was a necessary preliminary to any interference with the River Tyne, they ought in my opinion to have tabled their proposition at once, instead of reserving it till the works were well advanced. My belief is that the applicability of section 217 was a pure afterthought on the part of the pursuers, due to the ingenuity of their legal advisers.

I have not adverted to any of the oral evidence in the case, because I consider it almost entirely beside the question. And I cannot help observing that, in my opinion, municipal authorities deserve some commiseration for

¹ 8 F. 77.

² 4 Macph. (H. L.) 44.

Nov. 12, 1907. having to pick their way through such a tangle of redundant legislation as Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation. Parliament has provided for their guidance.

LdStormonth-Darling. With regard to the point which was made as to the application of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and as to which the Lord Ordinary has given effect to the defenders' demand, I agree that that part of his Lordship's interlocutor must be recalled, on the short ground that the Act itself declares, by section 3, that it shall not apply "to any action, prosecution, or other proceeding . . . on account of any act done in any case instituted under an Act of Parliament, when that Act applies to Scotland only, and contains a limitation of the time and other conditions for the action, prosecution, or proceeding." Now, the Public Health Act, under which this action must be held to have been instituted (on the assumption that the defenders are to get their expenses) does contain, by section 166, a limitation of the time within which such action shall be commenced, and it also contains (at the beginning of the same section) "other conditions" applicable to the action.

LORD LOW.—The first question to be determined in this case seems to me to be whether it was competent for the defenders to proceed under the powers conferred upon Local Authorities by the 103d section of the Public Health Act, 1897.

I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the affirmative, because the section applies to all Local Authorities, whether in burgh or in landward districts, and it has never been expressly repealed, nor, in my judgment, can it be held to have been repealed by implication.

After the passing of the Public Health Act, 1897, a somewhat anomalous condition of matters arose in regard to public sewers and drains in burghs, because the Burgh Police Act, 1892, contained a complete code in regard to these matters within burgh, and the Public Health Act also contained a complete code which was applicable to burghs as well as to other districts; and further, the assessments authorised by the two Acts differed both as to amount and as to the persons liable.

It was for the purpose of remedying, or at all events of partially remedying, that state of matters that the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water-Supply Act, 1901, was passed. That Act, by amending certain sections of the Act of 1892, and repealing (as regarded burghs) certain sections of the Act of 1897, did away with the double method of assessment authorised by the two last-mentioned Acts, and established one method of assessment for burghs. It further declared that as regards burghs the Act of 1892 should be the principal Act, and it incorporated with that Act certain sections of the Act of 1897, and repealed certain sections of the latter Act.

That being the scheme of the Act of 1901 I think that one would have expected that all the provisions in the Act of 1897, which it was intended should still apply to burghs, would have been incorporated in the Act of 1892, and that all provisions which it was intended should no longer apply to burghs, would have been (quoad burghs) repealed. If that had been done, burgh authorities would have found the whole code applicable to them in the Act of 1892 as amended, together with the incorporated sections of the Act of 1897. But the course actually adopted by the Legislature was very different. As I have said, certain sections of the Act of 1897 were repealed, and other sections were incorporated into the Act of 1892, but there were also a number of sections in the former Act which applied to burgh as well as to other authorities which were neither incorporated nor repealed. It is true that a good many of these sections contained provisions identical, or practically identical, with what had already been enacted as regarded burghs in the Act of 1892, and so far as these sections were concerned it was immaterial that they were neither incorporated nor repealed. But there are also sections which contain provisions which have no equivalent in the Act of 1892. The 103d section itself may be taken as an example. That section, inter alia, authorises all Local Authorities to construct sewers for the purpose of outfall or disposal or treatment of sewage without their district. It was admitted that (whatever may be said as to the other powers given in the section) no such power as that which I have quoted is conferred upon the Local Authority in burghs by the Act of 1892, and therefore, unless the 103d section is still applicable to burghs, the Local Authority in a burgh has been deprived of a very important power which has been conferred upon all other Local Authorities. No reason was, nor, I imagine, could be, suggested for denying such a power to burghs; and indeed I should expect that it would be more frequently expedient or necessary that sewage should be disposed of outside the area under the control of the Local Authority in the case of a burgh than in the case of a country district. I therefore see no reason for holding that section 103 (and the remark applies to other sections in a similar position) does not apply to burghs, because, although it is not incorporated with the Act of 1892, it is not repealed. In taking that view I am confirmed by the judgment of the First Division in the case of Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright.¹

Nov. 12, 1907.
 —
 Montgomerie
 & Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Haddington
 Corporation.
 —
 Lord Low.

There is, however, another ground for holding that section 103 is still in force as regards burghs. By the 5th section of the Act of 1901 it is provided that "the Town-Council of any burgh, as the authority under the principal Act, in addition to the powers conferred upon them by the principal Act, or any other Act, shall, with reference to sewerage and drainage or water-supply within such area, have the same rights, powers, and privileges as are conferred by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, upon Local Authorities under that Act in districts other than burghs, with the exception of the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by sections 122 and 131 of the last-mentioned Act, to which sections the present section shall not apply."

Now, the two excepted sections are in express terms limited to districts of a "Local Authority, not being the Local Authority of a burgh," and in the part of the Act dealing with "sewers, drains, and water-supply" there are other sections (at all events in regard to water-supply) whose application is limited in the same way. It is plainly the powers contained in the latter sections which are conferred upon burgh authorities in addition to powers already possessed by them. The object, therefore, of the enactment is to add to and not to diminish the powers of burgh authorities, and the powers to

¹ 8 F. 77.

Nov. 12, 1907. which the addition is made are described as those conferred "by the principal Act" (that is the Burgh Police Act, 1892), "or any other Act." Now the Act of 1897 is another Act which confers powers upon burgh Local Authorities which they did not possess before (as, for example, by the 103d section), and it seems to me to be plain that the Act of 1901, so far from taking away any powers conferred upon burgh authorities by any prior Act, conferred upon them powers which they did not previously possess.

Montgomery
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.
Lord Low.

I am therefore of opinion that the defenders were entitled to proceed, as they did in fact proceed, under the powers of section 103.

The next question is whether the defenders followed the procedure prescribed by that section. The part of the section applicable to this case is that which enacts that a Local Authority may construct a sewer "after reasonable notice in writing (if upon the report of a surveyor it should appear to be necessary) into, through, or under any lands whatsoever." The pursuers did not found upon the clause in regard to a surveyor's report, but they maintained that "reasonable notice" of the works proposed was not given to them. Notice was, in fact, sent to the pursuers by the letter of the Town-clerk of 20th June 1905, and the pursuers' complaint is that the information given as to the character of the proposed sewer was not reasonably adequate in that not only did it not disclose that the new pipes were to be laid upon the surface of the bed of the stream instead of under the surface (as was the case with an existing pipe), but the inference from the letter was that the new pipes were to be laid upon the same level as the existing pipe.

It seems to me that there are substantial grounds for that objection. The state of matters which existed when the notice was given was that a 12-inch pipe ran down the bed of the river from the Victoria Bridge to Spoutwell Brae, and the plan which was sent to the pursuers along with the letter of 20th June shewed that pipe, and alongside of it an 18-inch pipe. In the letter it was said that "the existing 12-inch water-closet sewage pipe" (which I understand to be the pipe which ran down the bed of the river) "will remain," but nothing was said about the 18-inch pipe shewn on the plan. The explanation of that I take to be that it did not occur to the Town-clerk that the laying of pipes in the bed of the river below the Victoria Bridge could in any way affect the pursuers, and what he desired to make clear in the letter was what the proposed sewage arrangements above Victoria Bridge were—a matter in which he was aware that the pursuers were interested. The weir of the dam which supplies the pursuers' mills is immediately above Victoria Bridge, and the pursuers had objected to a discharge of sewage which under the existing system was made into the dam. By the proposed scheme that discharge was discontinued, and all the sewage was taken down the river by means of the two pipes, and what the Town-clerk desired to make clear was that the proposed scheme did away with a state of matters to which the defenders strongly objected. But although the Town-clerk did not refer in the letter to the 18-inch pipe, he sent a plan which shewed that pipe, and accordingly the pursuers were notified that if the scheme were carried through, an additional and larger pipe would be taken down the bed of the stream. The plan, however, shewed nothing in regard to the level at which the pipes were to be laid; but as the Town-clerk said that the 12-inch pipe would remain, I think that the pursuers were justified in assuming that the 18-inch pipe would not only be laid alongside of it, as shewn on the plan, but would be upon the same level.

Nov. 12, 1907.
Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.

Lord Low.

Now, I think that it is established by the evidence that the 12-inch pipe was embedded in the channel of the river, and did not shew above the level of the river bed, but to what extent that state of matters was due to the manner in which the pipe had been originally laid, and to what extent to sagging or sinking of the pipe, it seems to be impossible to ascertain with certainty. I think, however, that the pipe most probably was originally laid under the river bed. One thing seems to be clear, and that is, that neither the defenders nor the men of skill by whom they were advised ever considered the question of the level of the new pipes as compared with the level of the old pipe. It does not seem to have occurred to them that there was any question of that kind which required consideration, and for this reason: There were two fixed points between which the old pipe ran and between which the new pipes were to run, and did run when laid, the one point being an opening in the abutment of the Victoria Bridge through which the pipes were passed, and the other an iron pipe which crossed the river at Spoutwell Brae, and with which the pipes in question were connected. Now, obviously the natural and most efficient way to lay the pipes between these two points was to lay them upon a uniform gradient, that is to say, in a straight line from the one fixed point to the other, and it never occurred to the engineers to inquire whether the old pipe had or had not been originally laid in that way.

The failure, therefore, of the defenders to inform the pursuers that the new pipes would be above ground was not due to any desire on their part to conceal anything, nor can the Town-clerk be charged with carelessness in not having brought the matter to the pursuers' notice. On the other hand, the pursuers were, as I have already said, in my opinion justified in assuming that the new pipes would be in the same position as the old, that is to say, below the surface of the river bed, and it is not surprising that they felt aggrieved when they found that instead of the bed of the river remaining free from obstructions, two large pipes were laid upon it, and covered with cement, thereby forming a structure of from 4 to 10 feet in breadth. The pursuers aver, and they have adduced some evidence in support of the averment, that that structure renders their mills more liable to be flooded than they were formerly, and although I do not think that they have made out a strong case, it seems to me to be impossible to say that the risk of flooding may not have been to some, although probably to a very slight, extent increased.

Now, assuming that the pursuers did not get that reasonable notice of the works proposed by the defenders which is required by the 103d section, what is the result? The pursuers' demand, and it is their only demand so far as this action is concerned, is that the pipes should be removed. In order to determine whether or not that is a remedy which is open to the pursuers I shall consider what the position of matters would have been if the pursuers had received notice of the precise way in which it was proposed to lay the pipes, and had objected. It seems to me that notwith-

Nov. 12, 1907. Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation.
Lord Low. standing an objection on the pursuers' part, the defenders could have proceeded with the works and laid the pipes exactly as they have done, because the 103d section does not say that the consent of the persons to whom notice must be given is required, or that they may object to the proposed sewer. All that seems to be contemplated is that persons through whose lands it is proposed to take a sewer should have an opportunity of considering the matter, and stating their views to the Local Authority.

In expressing that opinion I am not leaving out of view the provisions of the 109th section of the statute, which enacts that "in case it shall become necessary to enter, examine, or lay open any lands or premises" for the purpose of making plans, surveying, taking levels, and the like, and, inter alia, for the purpose of making sewers, "and the owner or occupier of premises refuses or withholds access and leave to perform the said operations, the Local Authority may, after written notice to such owner and occupier, apply to the Sheriff, who, if no sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary, shall grant warrant to the Local Authority, their officers and others thereby authorised, to enter and do all or any of the works or operations foresaid at all reasonable times in the daytime." In terms of the 157th section of the Act any order made by the Sheriff is final, and not subject to review.

In the case of *Brown v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright*¹ there was some difference of opinion in regard to the power conferred upon the Sheriff by that section, Lord M'Laren taking the view that the Sheriff was empowered to consider and determine whether the operations proposed by the Local Authority ought or ought not to be allowed, while Lord Adam was strongly of opinion that the Sheriff's powers were limited to questions of procedure, and that he had no authority to consider whether the proposed sewer was necessary or not. I agree with Lord Adam. I think that the main function of the Sheriff is to regulate the way in which the work is to be proceeded with, so as to be as little burdensome as possible to the owner or occupier. No doubt it is made imperative on the Sheriff to grant warrant to the Local Authorities to enter the lands only "if no sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary," which implies that if sufficient cause be shewn to the contrary the Sheriff may refuse the warrant. I do not however think that that is inconsistent with the view which I take of the scope of the enactment, because there may be cases in which the Sheriff would be justified in refusing a warrant without considering or dealing in any way with the question whether or not the works were necessary. Suppose, for example, that a Local Authority proposed to construct a sewer through private lands in the exercise of the powers in the 103d section, and attempted to enter the lands and commence operations without having given previous notice in writing to the owner or occupier, and without having obtained a report from a surveyor that the sewer was necessary, I have no doubt that the Sheriff would be entitled to refuse a warrant and to dismiss the application in respect that the Local Authority had not followed the statutory procedure. I am accordingly of opinion that the 109th section does not aid the pursuers, and indeed I did not understand their counsel to found upon that section.

I am therefore of opinion that if the defenders were entitled to proceed under the powers conferred by the 103d section of the Act of 1897, without Nov. 12, 1907. any limitation of these powers, except those contained in the section itself and in the 109th section, the pursuers are not entitled to have the pipes in question removed. I take it that the Court will not order removal of a structure which can be immediately replaced, especially where, as here, there was no radical defect in the title of those who erected it, but merely an unintentional failure to comply with certain statutory formalities.

¹ 8 F. 77.

Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation.
Lord Low.

The question remains, however, whether the powers conferred by the 103d section are not limited and qualified by the 217th section of the Act of 1892? By that section it is enacted "that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise" the Local Authority, inter alia, "to use, injure, or interfere with any watercourse, stream, river, dock, basin, wharf, quay, or towing-path in which the owner or occupier of any lands, mills, mines, or machinery, or the proprietors of any canal or navigation, shall have right and interest, without the consent in writing of the person legally entitled to grant the same."

It seems to me that if that enactment is applicable to the present case, and if it is to be construed literally, it is conclusive in the pursuers' favour, because the defenders did, without the pursuers' consent, use and interfere with a river in which the pursuers not only had an interest as owners and occupiers of mills, but of the alveus of which they were proprietors, either from bank to bank or ad medium filum, at the part where the pipes in question are laid.

The Lord Ordinary suggests that even if the section is applicable, the pursuers gave their consent in writing. I cannot assent to that view, because although the pursuers did in writing express their approval of the scheme, they did so in the belief, which they were justified in holding, that the pipes were to be laid underground. If they had been aware that the pipes were to be laid above ground they would certainly not have approved of the scheme, nor given their consent to it.

But however that may be, I am of opinion that the 217th section does not apply to the present case. In the first place, the section in terms only applies to operations carried out under the powers conferred by the Act of 1892. That appears from the opening words of the section, which are—"Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorise."

In like manner the language of the 103d section seems to me to negative the idea that the powers thereby conferred are subject to any limitation. The power which is in question in this case is to construct a sewer "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever." The word "whatsoever" is plainly unnecessary except for the purpose of emphasis, and the inference appears to me to be that it was used in order to make it clear that the generality of the power was to be subject to no exception. I am therefore of opinion that it would be contrary to the declared intention of the Legislature to hold that the power conferred has been limited and curtailed, in the case of burghs, so as to be excluded altogether as regards the subjects enumerated in the 217th section.

If I am right in the view which I have already expressed that the 103d section is not repealed by implication quoad burghs by the Act of 1901, the only ground upon which it could be contended that the 217th section

Nov. 12, 1907.
Montgomerie
& Co.,
Limited, v.
Haddington
Corporation.
Lord Low.

applies to operations under the 103d section would be that the Act of 1901, by declaring the Act of 1892 to be the principal Act, placed the 103d section of the Act of 1897 in the position of an enactment which merely added to the powers conferred by the principal Act, and therefore fell to be read along with and as part of that Act. Now, the Act of 1901 has left the 103d section, along with the group of sections of which it is one, in a very anomalous position, because, while it makes the Act of 1892 the principal Act, and incorporates with that Act certain sections of the Act of 1897, and repeals other sections of the latter Act, it simply leaves the group of sections to which I have referred standing, without either repealing them or incorporating them with the principal Act. In these circumstances I do not think that it is legitimate to infer that the Legislature intended that the wide powers conferred upon all Local Authorities by the 103d section should be limited in the case of burgh authorities alone by reading into that section the 217th section of the Act of 1892. To make that inference would be to construe the Act of 1901 either as incorporating the 103d section with the Act of 1892, or as declaring that it should be read along with and as forming part of that Act. The section has certainly not been incorporated, and I do not think that there is enough to imply a direction that it shall be read as part of the Act of 1892. Accordingly I am of opinion that the pursuers cannot found upon the 217th section.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed in so far as it assoilzies the defenders. I am not, however, prepared, for the reasons which I have given, to assent to the finding that the defenders have validly complied with the requirements of the Public Health Act.

With regard to the question of expenses raised under the Public Authorities Protection Act, I need only say, without going into details, that an examination of the Act has led me to the same conclusion as that expressed by Lord Stormonth-Darling.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur entirely in the opinion of my brother Lord Low, which I have had an opportunity of considering.

- LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have very little to add. This case has seemed to me to be attended with considerable difficulty. But I have come to the view that the judgment should be as proposed. I cannot say that I think the giving of notice under the Act was done with that clearness and formality which would be expected when notice was being given by a public authority proposing to interfere with a piece of property in which private proprietors had a substantial interest. I think that the procedure was loose, and not by any means a model for imitation by any public body. But it was treated by the pursuers as a notice without objection. Accordingly the work proceeded in the knowledge and under the observation of the pursuers. It seems to me that knowing that important works were going on under the notice, the pursuers were not acting as they should have done in allowing these expensive works to be carried on and completed without taking steps to vindicate any rights they had which they saw were being encroached upon. Except upon the strongest grounds I could not hold that merely upon a question of notice an objector could come forward and require that the works erected should be removed, thus making a work involving great cost abortive, and compelling the adoption of some new and probably more expensive expedient. I agree with Lord Low in thinking that if the pursuers had objected they could not have made good their objection to the works being executed under section 103 of the Public Health Act, if that Act applied. But, further, in this case I have formed a very decided opinion that the pursuers have failed to prove in any reasonable degree that the works which were executed could cause any damage to their interests.

I do not add anything upon the question of application of the statutes. I entirely agree in the opinion that the authority proposing to make the alterations were entitled to proceed under section 103 of the Public Health Act, and I agree with Lord Low in the views he has expressed as to the 217th section of the Act of 1892, in holding that the pursuers cannot found on that Act.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor (of 6th July 1906) in so far as it finds the defenders entitled to expenses as between agent and client in terms of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 1 (b): Quoad ultra refuse the reclaiming note: Adhere to the said interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern: Refuse the defenders' motion for expenses as between agent and client, in terms of the said Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and find them entitled to expenses on the ordinary terms."

T. S. PATERSON, W.S.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM DOUGALL, Pursuer (Respondent).—M^cClure, K.C.—A. M. Anderson.

No. 26.

PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCILLORS OF DUNFERMLINE, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Dickson, K.C.—C. D. Murray.

Nov. 20, 1907.

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

Warrandice—Eviction—Expenses of unsuccessful action to prevent eviction.—The Magistrates and Councillors of the burgh of Dunfermline let a farm, part of the Common Good, bounded on one side by a stream and loch, to A, reserving the privilege of fishing "by themselves or others having written authority from them," and granted absolute warrandice.

A subsequently complained to the lessors that he had sustained partial eviction by anglers, who had no written authority from the lessors, invading the banks of the stream and loch. The lessors having declined to take action, A raised an action for interdict against B and others, who had used the banks for angling without written authority from the lessors. The Lord Ordinary found that the defenders, as members of the community and rate-payers in the burgh, had right to use the banks for the purpose, and refused interdict. This judgment was not reclaimed against.

In an action subsequently raised by A against the lessors, the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) held (1) that A had sustained partial eviction, and was entitled to an abatement of rent, and (2) that A was entitled to payment of the expenses incurred by him, and those for which he had been found liable in the action for interdict.

The defenders having reclaimed against the judgment on the second point, the Court adhered.

By lease dated 29th November and 8th December 1904, the 2^d Division Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the royal burgh of Dunfermline—Lord Dund

Nov. 20, 1907. line, for themselves and as representing the whole body and community of said burgh (hereinafter called the proprietors), let to William Dougall the farm of Highholm, near Dunfermline, for nineteen years from and after Martinmas 1903 at an annual rent of £150; "Reserving always to the proprietors and their successors in office, representing as aforesaid . . . the whole game and fishings of every description (the tenant having all the privileges conferred by the Ground Game (Scotland) Act, 1880), with the privilege of fowling, hunting, sporting, and fishing on the lands hereby let by themselves or others having written authority from them . . . Which tack, with and under the reservations, provisions, and conditions before and after mentioned, the proprietors bind and oblige themselves and their successors in office to warrant from fact and deed only, and they bind the said burgh and community thereof to warrant the same at all hands and against all mortals, as law will."

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

The farm formed part of the Common Good of the burgh, and was bounded on the north partly by a stream called Loch Fitty Burn, and partly by Loch Fitty, into which the burn flowed.

In June 1905 Dougall brought an action against James Lowe and seven other persons resident in Townhill, Dunfermline, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of Dunfermline, as representing the whole body and community of said burgh, being also called as defenders for any interest they might have. The summons concluded for declarator that the pursuer was entitled to the peaceable possession and enjoyment of the subjects let to him during the full remaining period of his lease, and for interdict against the individual defenders to have them stopped from interfering with the pursuer in the peaceful possession of the said subjects, and, in particular, from entering and trespassing on the said lands, or walking over the same.

In that action the pursuer averred:—(Cond. 4) "Since the pursuer has had possession of the farm numerous members of the public have been in the habit of trespassing on the farm for the purpose, inter alia, of fishing in the loch known as Loch Fitty, and in a burn flowing into it, known as Loch Fitty Burn."

The individual defenders lodged defences. The Magistrates and Town-Council of Dunfermline did not defend.

The compearing defenders answered:—(Ans. 4) " . . . Admitted that members of the community of Dunfermline have been and are in the habit of fishing in the said loch and burn, and of walking on the banks thereof for this purpose. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the property of the said farm forms part of the Common Good of the burgh of Dunfermline, and that the inhabitants of Dunfermline and the villagers of the town's lands of Townhill and Kingseat have enjoyed the right and privilege of fishing in the said loch and burn, and of using the banks thereof for that purpose, from time immemorial without let or hindrance."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer being the tenant of the said farm, and the first-named defenders having unlawfully entered and trespassed thereon, interdict should be granted as craved, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's material averments, so far as affecting these defenders, being unfounded in fact, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (3) These defenders, not having trespassed on the said lands let to the pursuer, should be assoilzied from the conclusion for interdict, with expenses. (5)

The said lands of Highholm forming part of the Common Good of the burgh of Dunfermline, and the inhabitants of the said burgh having exercised the right of fishing thereon from time immemorial, these defenders as members of the said community are entitled to fish in said loch and burn, and for that purpose to have access to the banks thereof, and interdict as against them should accordingly be refused.

Nov. 20, 1907.
—
Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary (Dundas), on 3d February 1906, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . (3) that the compearing defenders, as members of the said community and ratepayers in the said burgh, are entitled to enter upon and use the banks of said burn and loch respectively," (so far as forming part of said farm) "for the said purpose of angling; (4) that the pursuer has failed to prove that the said defenders, or any of them, have trespassed upon the said farm and lands, or have broken down, injured, or in any way interfered with the gates and fences upon and surrounding the same, or have injured or destroyed the pursuer's stock or crops upon the same: Therefore sustains the second, third, and fifth pleas in law stated for the said defenders: Assoilzies them from the conclusions for interdict, and decerns: Finds it unnecessary to deal with the conclusions of the summons for declarator: Finds the said compearing defenders entitled to expenses against the pursuer."

The pursuer did not reclaim against this interlocutor, which consequently became final.

In May 1906 Dougall raised the action now reported against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Dunfermline, concluding for declarator "that the pursuer has been evicted from the full and peaceable possession of a portion of the subjects let by the defenders to the pursuer by lease entered into between the defenders and the pursuer, dated the 29th day of November and 8th day of December 1904, and that the pursuer is entitled accordingly to an abatement of the sum of £30 per annum from the rent stipulated for in the said lease during all the years of the currency thereof," and for decree for payment, inter alia, of (3) the sum of £450, 18s. 7d.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 6) "The pursuer through his agent complained to the defenders of the annoyance to which he was put, and of the damage which he was suffering, through the exercise of the said alleged right on the part of the public, and called upon the defenders to protect him in the possession of the subjects which they had let to him. The defenders, however, declined to take any action in the matter, and informed the pursuer that he must take such steps as he might consider necessary to protect himself against damage by trespassers." The pursuer then referred to the proceedings in the former action, and averred:—(Cond. 9) "The pursuer duly intimated to the present defenders the various steps which were taken in the said action, and informed them of the progress thereof, besides furnishing them with copies of the pleadings. The present defenders, however, beyond denying that they had conferred any right on the inhabitants of Dunfermline to fish in the said stream and loch, uniformly declined to take any part in the matter, although the pursuer intimated to them that in the event of the alleged public right being established he would hold them liable for breach of warrandice and all expenses incurred." (Cond. 10) "In consequence of the establishment of the said public right over the said farm of Highholm the pursuer has been evicted from the peaceable and exclusive posses-

Nov. 20, 1907. Dougall v. Magistrates of Dunfermline. sion of a material part of the subjects let to him by the defenders, who are consequently in breach of the warrandice granted by them in the said lease. . . . The annual value of the farm to the pursuer has been seriously diminished, and he accordingly maintains that he is entitled to an abatement of £30 per annum from the rent of £150 stipulated in the said lease during the whole term of its currency. . . . The defenders are also liable to relieve the pursuer of the legal expenses for which he has been found liable, and decree for which has been granted against him, and also those incurred by him in raising and prosecuting the said action, which together amount to the sum of £450, 18s. 7d., being the sum third concluded for in the petitory conclusion of the summons."

The defenders answered:—(Ans. 6 and 9) "The correspondence between the pursuer's agent and the Town-clerk of Dunfermline is referred to for its terms. Quoad ultra denied." (Ans. 10) " . . . Denied. The pursuer has not been and will not be evicted by the exercise of the right of fishing."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been evicted from the peaceable enjoyment of a material part of the subjects let to him by the defenders is entitled to a corresponding abatement of rent in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons. (2) The defenders being in breach of the warrandice granted by them in the said lease in favour of the pursuer, are bound to indemnify the pursuer for the loss which he has in consequence sustained. (5) The pursuer having incurred the legal expenses condescended on in vindication of the subjects let to him by the defenders, and in consequence of the defenders' said breach of warrandice, is entitled to payment thereof from the defenders as concluded for in the third head of the petitory conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The pursuer not having suffered loss and damage through any breach of warrandice on defenders' part, or otherwise through the actings of the defenders, the defenders should be absolved from the petitory conclusions of the summons. (5) The pursuer not having been evicted from the subjects let, or any part thereof, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced. (6) In the circumstances the pursuer has no claim against the defenders for the sum third concluded for.

A proof was allowed and led.

The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) and Lord Ardwall.

On 8th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons to the extent and effect that the pursuer has been evicted from the full and peaceable possession of a portion of the subjects let by the defenders to the pursuer, by lease," &c., "and that the pursuer is entitled accordingly to an abatement of the sum of £5 per annum from the rent stipulated for in the said lease, during all the years of the currency thereof; and with regard to the petitory conclusions of the summons . . . (Third) With regard to head (3) of said conclusions, finds that the defenders are liable to pay to the pursuer the amount of the taxed account No. 35 of process, viz., £213, 10s. 7d., and also the amount of the accounts Nos. 68 and 69 of process respectively, as the same may be taxed by the Auditor of the Court of Session, to whom remits the said accounts to tax and to report accordingly: Continues the cause pending such taxation and report: Reserves all questions of expenses; and grants Nov. 20, 1907. leave to reclaim." *

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

* "OPINION.—(After considering questions not in dispute in the Inner-House)—The remaining question to be decided involves a considerable amount of money, and is not unattended with difficulty. The pursuer seeks to recover from the defenders, as specific damages, the expenses which he incurred in the action Dougall v. Lowe and Others, already referred to. In order to arrive at a decision, one must, in the first place, examine the defenders' attitude and conduct towards the pursuer prior to the raising of that action, as shewn by their minutes and correspondence. It is clear enough that for years before the Town-Council had been divided in opinion as to whether or not the public had a legal right to fish in this loch and burn. The minutes, however, of 13th and 22d September 1897, and of 3d February 1898, shew that at that time they had gone far towards conceding the existence of such a right. The pursuer's complaints about 'trespassers' began, as I have said, about March 1904. The defenders took up the position that, upon proper and sufficient evidence being submitted to them by him, they would prosecute offenders. Investigation was made in several cases, but no prosecution followed, for the reason, as appears from the minutes of 6th October and 10th November 1904, that it seemed doubtful 'whether the person alleged to have trespassed did more than fish along the banks of Loch Fitty Burn,' and that this was 'a privilege claimed as having been exercised for many years,' and apparently conceded by the Town-Council as owners of the land. (See minutes of Council of 13th September 1897, and of the Property Committee of 3d February 1898.) This reason does not appear to have been made known to the pursuer. On 18th March 1905 the Town-clerk, in answer to a complaint by the pursuer's agent, replied that the Town-Council had not 'granted the ratepayers and others in the district any permission to fish in the Loch Fitty Burn.' On 20th April the pursuer's agent wrote that 'it seems to have got abroad that the public have a right to fish in the Loch Fitty Burn, and to trespass upon his' (the pursuer's) 'farm in doing so, and he suggests that you, as Town-clerk, should insert a notice in the local papers that all trespassers will be prosecuted, as they have no right to go upon his farm as stated. Mr Dougall is willing to pay the cost of the advertisements.' At a meeting of the Property Committee on 1st May, 'the Town-clerk was instructed to reply that the Committee are not disposed to take any action in the matter, and that Mr Dougall must himself take such action as he may consider necessary to protect himself against damage by trespassers.' The Town-clerk, in his letter of 2d May, somewhat amplified the terms of the above instruction. He wrote that 'the Committee are not disposed to question the right of the public to fish in the Loch Fitty Burn, but such right does not imply any right to trespass on the farm lands, fishers being restricted to walk along the banks of the burn. The Committee do not propose to take any action in the matter, and Mr Dougall must just take such steps as he may consider necessary to protect himself against damage by trespassers.' It might perhaps have been better if the pursuer's agent had pressed the Town-clerk more closely as to this rather ambiguous reply; but it seems, to say the least, highly improbable, looking to subsequent events, that the Town-clerk, if so pressed, would have admitted that the public had a legal right of fishing. Be this as it may, the pursuer was, I think, justified under the circumstances in reading the Town-clerk's letter as an intimation that the defenders were not to take any action either to establish or to negative the existence of a right in the public which they were 'not disposed to question,' or as to the matter of trespass, and that he must expiscate the whole affair for himself. He accordingly raised an action on 8th June 1905 for this purpose. The summons was not, I think, framed in the most artistic manner, but it had at least this effect, that the individual defenders

Nov. 20, 1907. The defenders reclaimed, and at the hearing stated that they reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor only in so far as it found them liable in the expenses of the first action.

Dougall v. Magistrates of Dunfermline.

Argued for the defenders;—Even if the case was taken as an ordinary case of breach of contract, the defenders were not liable in the expenses of the former action. The fair result of the correspondence shewed that the defenders admitted the right of the community of Dunfermline to fish in the burn and loch. If after such admission the pursuer chose to litigate the question, he could not saddle the present defenders with the expense of the litigation. But the case was not an ordinary case of breach of contract; it was an action laid on breach of warrandice, and the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale,¹ and applied in subsequent cases,² did not apply to breach of warrandice. All that could be recovered for breach of warrandice was indemnification for eviction,³ which did not include the expenses against whom interdict was craved as 'trespassers,' distinctly raised in their answers the case that the 'farm forms part of the Common Good of the burgh of Dunfermline, and that the inhabitants of Dunfermline and the villagers of the town's lands of Townhill and Kingseat have enjoyed the right and privilege of fishing in the said loch and burn, and of using the banks thereof for that purpose from time immemorial without let or hindrance. The said right and privilege has been expressly recognised and conceded by the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Dunfermline, as their minutes bear, and the said farm was let by them to the pursuer subject to this existing right on the part of the community.' The pursuer's agent forthwith, on 8th July 1905, wrote to the Town-clerk, enclosing a print of the open record, drawing special attention to the defenders' averments above quoted, and desiring to be informed whether or not the latter were substantially true. He further intimated that if the defence in question was sustained, the pursuer would 'look to the town to recompense him for all loss and damage he may suffer or has suffered,' and that, if in the course of that process it should appear that the Town-Council had done anything to derogate from their lease to him, he would hold them liable to pay all the expenses incurred by him in that action and those for which he might be found liable. This was, I think, a very plain intimation to the Town-Council that, if the alleged public dedication,—which they had never admitted, though they 'were not disposed to question' it,—should be established, as it was by my interlocutor of 3d July 1906, the pursuer would (a) claim an abatement of his rent, as he is now doing, and also (b) seek payment from the town of all expenses incurred by him in the action then pending. On 12th June 1905, the Property Committee 'agreed to recommend that the Council do not enter appearance to defend the action'; and on 11th July the Town-clerk replied to the pursuer's agent that 'the Town-Council have not at any time conferred right on the inhabitants of Townhill or others to fish in the loch and burn; . . . but they took no steps to prevent fishing.' This non-committal reply did not, as it appears to me, fairly meet the pursuer's request to be informed whether or not the defenders' averments were, to the Town-Council's knowledge, well founded. The pursuer was still left without any knowledge as to how long the public had been in use to fish, or any means of knowing whether they caused by resisting eviction.¹ (2) The present action was truly an action for relief. In such an action, to be successful, the sum claimed in relief must be commensurate with the original liability,² which here it was not, for in the former action two questions were raised—(a) the question as to the right of the community to fish, and (b) the question as to trespass, and with the latter the present defenders had nothing to do. They could not have taken the pursuer's place in an action laid on trespass. At all events, only the expenses connected with the question as to the right to fish should be allowed.

¹ 1854, 9 Exch. (W. H. & G.) 341.

² Straiton Estate Co., Limited, v. Stephens, Dec. 16, 1880, 8 R. 299; Hammond & Co. v. Bussey, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 79; Agius v. Great Western Colliery Co., L. R., [1899] 1 Q. B. 413.

³ Welsh v. Russell, May 19, 1894, 21 R. 769.

Nov. 20, 1907.

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) As the defenders did not question the declaratory finding of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, the case must be taken on the footing that there had been eviction. A non-committal attitude having been taken up by the defenders, the pursuer was entitled to protect himself; and the pursuer having been evicted was entitled to all damages naturally resulting from the had or had not a legal right to do so. On 2d November 1905 the pursuer's agent again wrote to the Town-clerk, intimating that a proof had been allowed by the Lord Ordinary as to the alleged right of fishing, and that the pursuer did not intend to reclaim against the interlocutor, but that he would do so, if the Town-Council so desired, at their expense; and repeating in clear language the position taken up in his earlier letter of 8th July. The answer of the Town-Council was to the effect that they did not intend to do anything in the matter. The proof in the action was led, and judgment pronounced by me on 3d February 1906, adversely to the pursuer. On 7th February, the pursuer's agent sent to the Town-clerk a copy of the interlocutor and relative opinion; intimated once more his claim in respect of eviction; and added that 'the pursuer does not at his own hand propose to reclaim the judgment, and if the town desire to appear in the process now, or if they wish my client to proceed further at the town's expense, I shall be glad to hear from you within the next few days.' On 13th February the Town-clerk replied that 'the Council decided to take no action in the matter.' The interlocutor of 3d February was accordingly allowed to become final. The present action was raised on 1st May 1906.

"In this state of matters, I think that the pursuer has a good claim against the defenders for the taxed amount of the expenses incurred by him in the former action. Two of the accounts, which have not been taxed, must, of course, be remitted for taxation. The pursuer's account for the expenses of the defenders in Dougall v. Lowe and Others has been taxed. There were, so far as I am aware, no additional or separable expenses incurred by the pursuer's unsuccessful attempt to prove that the individual defenders were in fact trespassing upon his farm, even on the assumption that they were entitled by law to fish in a legitimate and proper manner; and I see no reason for incurring further expense by remitting that account for retaxation. Subject to these observations, the pursuer's claim upon this head of the case appears to me, as I have said, to be well founded. I think that, looking to the defenders' attitude towards him, he was entitled, at their expense, to attempt to vindicate his rights when these were challenged by third parties; and it seems plain that his claim for abatement of rent, which I have held to be well founded in principle, is based upon, and could only be decided after, a determination as to the alleged right by the inhabitants to fish in the loch and burn. The subject-matter of the first action appears to me to lie at the very root of the present case; and both actions arise out

¹ Bell's Prins., sec. 895; Stephen v. Lord Advocate, Nov. 30, 1878, 6 R. 282.

² Caledonian Railway Co. v. Colt, Aug. 3, 1860, 3 Macq. 833; Ovington v. M'Vicar, May 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 1066.

Nov. 20, 1907. breach, including the expenses incurred in resisting eviction, in so far as reasonably incurred.¹ The statement in Bell's Principles,² on which the defenders founded, was inconsistent with other authorities,³ and was not supported by the case of *Inglis*⁴ on which Mr Bell based the statement, for in *Inglis*⁴ there had not been any eviction. (2) The former action was truly upon trespass, for the issue there was as to whether the defenders of that action were entitled to fish and to have access for that purpose, or were trespassers. It was impossible to separate the question of the right to fish from the question as to trespass.

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

LORD ARDWALL.—By lease dated 29th November and 8th December 1904 the defenders let to the pursuer the farm of Highholm, near Dunfermline, for nineteen years from and after Martinmas 1903 at the rent of £150. The farm forms part of the Common Good of the burgh, and is bounded on the north partly by the Loch Fitty Burn and partly by Loch Fitty, into which the burn flows. The lease contains a clause reserving to the "proprietors," which word is therein defined as meaning "the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Councillors, for themselves and as representing the whole body and community of the said burgh," the whole game and fishings on the lands let "with the privilege of fowling, hunting, sporting, and fishing on the lands hereby let by themselves or others having written authority from them." It is matter of admission that the fishings in the said burn and loch are the only fishings to which the above reservation can refer. The lease contains the usual clause of absolute warrandice.

Shortly after the pursuer entered the farm he found that members of the community of Dunfermline, and the public generally, were in the habit of entering upon the subjects let for the purpose of fishing in the said burn of the fact that the pursuer has not obtained full possession of the subjects let to him by the defenders. The defenders relied upon the case of Ovington, 1864, 2 Macph. 1066, and the earlier decision in Colt, 1859, 21 D. 1108, rev. 1860, 3 Macq. 833. I do not think that these cases apply here at all. In Ovington, for example, the pursuers had settled a claim of damages against them by the representatives of a deceased employee, and then sued the defenders for relief upon the ground that the chain supplied by the latter—through the breaking of which the deceased had been killed—was defectively made. The Court held the action to be irrelevant. A sufficient ground for that judgment was afforded by the fact that the payment made by the pursuers in the first instance was one which they were not under any legal obligation to make; but it was also pointed out by the Court that 'the original claim, and the claim of relief must be, to a certain extent at least, commensurate and must be founded upon the same kind of liability.' I do not think that there is anything in the law so laid down to prevent the present pursuer from recovering as specific damages the expenses to which he was put in the former action. He was, in my opinion, entitled to fight that action to an issue, because the present defenders would neither do it for him nor distinctly admit or deny the existence of the public right in question. I therefore think that the former case was a logical and necessary prelude to his claim in this action."

¹ Hammond v. Bussey, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 79; Agius v. Great Western Colliery Co., L. R., [1899] 1 Q. B. 413.

² Bell's Prin., sec. 895.

³ Straiton Estate Co. v. Stephens, 8 R. 299; Ersk. Inst. ii. 3, 30, 32; Bell's Lect. on Conv., 3d ed., vol. i. pp. 217, 219.

⁴ Inglis v. Anstruther, 1771, M. 16,633.

and loch. He challenged them, but was met with the contention that they were entitled as members of the community of Dunfermline to fish there, and to enter on his lands for that purpose. The pursuer complained about trespassers to the defenders about March 1904, and there have been produced in process a number of minutes and correspondence, the effect of which is very clearly set forth by the Lord Ordinary in the opinion delivered by him on 8th January 1907. I entirely agree with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived that the pursuer was justified in reading the Town-clerk's letter of 2d May 1905 as an intimation that the defenders were not to take any action either to establish or to negative the existence of a right in the public which "they were not disposed to question" or as to the matter of trespass, and that he must take such steps as were necessary to defend himself. The pursuer accordingly raised an action on 8th June 1905 craving interdict against certain individual defenders molesting or interfering with him in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of his lands, and from entering and trespassing on the same or injuring and destroying his crops. To this action the present defenders were also called for their interest. A proof was led in that action, and upon considering the same the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor, dated 3d February 1906, found, inter alia, (3) that the compearing defenders, as "members of the said community and ratepayers in the said burgh, are entitled to enter upon and use the banks of the said burn and loch respectively so far as aforesaid" (that is, so far as lying within the farm of Highholm) "for the said purpose of angling; and (4) that the pursuer has failed to prove that the said defenders, or any of them, have trespassed upon the said farm and lands, or have broken down, injured, or in any way interfered with the gates and fences upon and surrounding the same, or have injured or destroyed the pursuer's crops upon the same." He accordingly assoilzied the defenders, and found them entitled to expenses.

Besides having called the present defenders for their interest in that action, the pursuer's agent, on 8th July 1905, wrote to the Town-clerk enclosing a print of the open record, drawing special attention to the defenders' averments to the effect that they had enjoyed an immemorial right and privilege of fishing in the loch and burn on the town lands, and of using the banks thereof for that purpose, and desiring to be informed whether or not these statements were substantially true. He further intimated that if the defences were sustained the pursuer would look to the town to recompense him for all loss and damage he might suffer or had suffered, and that if in the course of the process it should appear that the Town-Council had done anything to derogate from their lease to him he would hold them liable to pay all the expenses incurred by him in that action and those for which he might be found liable. This was a very plain intimation that if the pursuer failed in that action he would make the claims which he does in the present against the Town-Council. On 12th June 1905 the Property Committee of the Town-Council had agreed to recommend that the Town-Council should not enter appearance to defend the action, and on 11th July the Town-clerk replied to the pursuer's agent that "the Town-Council have not at any time conferred right on the inhabitants of Townhill or others to fish in the loch and burn, but

Nov. 20, 1907.
Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

Lord Ardwall.

Nov. 20, 1907. they took no steps to prevent fishing." This was a very evasive answer, and left the pursuer without any knowledge as to how long the public had been in use to fish, or whether they had or had not a legal right to do so. Again, on 2d November 1905 the pursuer's agent wrote to the Town-clerk intimating that a proof had been allowed in the action as to the alleged right of fishing, that the pursuer did not intend to reclaim against the interlocutor allowing the proof, but would do so if the Town-Council so desired at their expense. The Town-clerk answered practically that they did not intend to do anything in the matter, and subsequently they declined to reclaim against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 3d February 1906 already referred to, which has become final, and which the defenders, for the purposes of this action, admitted must be held to be well founded in fact and in law.

After intimating his claims to the Town-Council, who refused to recognise them, the pursuer raised the present action. (His Lordship then adverted to the conclusions of the summons and to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.)

It is against the Lord Ordinary's findings with regard to the third of the petitory conclusions, namely, that for the defenders' and pursuer's expenses in the former action, that the defenders reclaim.

I entirely agree with the view that the Lord Ordinary has taken of this matter. The lands were let to the pursuer with no other reservation as regards fishing except of the right of the defenders and those having written authority from them. When he discovered that great numbers of the community of Dunfermline, without any such written authority, trespassed over his lands in pursuance of this alleged right of fishing, he naturally considered this a derogation from his rights under the lease and a partial eviction from the peaceable enjoyment of the subjects let. But on his complaining to the defenders they would neither admit nor deny the right of members of the community to fish in the said burn and loch; and as I have above explained under reference to the Lord Ordinary's opinion and to the minutes and correspondence, they practically told him that he must defend himself. He did so, and in my opinion he was entitled to do so, with the view of vindicating his rights which were challenged by third parties. It was necessary for him to do so if he were to make a claim for abatement of rent, because, as I shall afterwards point out, he could not make such a claim successfully unless it had been judicially determined that he had suffered eviction. If the defenders had frankly admitted—and it was a fact which was within their knowledge, or ought to have been—that the community had exercised from time immemorial a right of fishing in the said burn and loch, the pursuer could then have brought his action directly against them; but I do not think he was safe to do so, looking to the attitude they adopted without first endeavouring to protect himself against eviction. If he had been successful in that attempt he would have had no claim against the Town-Council, because there would, in that event, have been no eviction; but having failed in the action without any fault on his part in the conduct of the process or otherwise, he is in the position of a person who has suffered eviction and who is therefore entitled to recompense.

The Court had the benefit of an able argument on both sides with regard Nov. 20, 1907.
to the law applicable to this claim for expenses in the former action, and I propose shortly to examine the authorities on the point.

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

There is no doubt of the general principle, that where there has been a breach of contract the party who suffers from such breach of contract is Lord Ardwall.
entitled to damages against the party responsible for it; and such damages include not only the actual damage immediately and directly caused by the breach of contract, but also all damage arising out of it which might have been expected by the parties to the contract naturally to arise out of a breach, and such damage has been held to include, inter alia, legal expenses reasonably incurred in consequence of the breach of contract. See the cases of Straiton Estate Company, Limited, v. Stephens,¹ Hammond & Company
v. Bussey,² and Agius v. Great Western Colliery Company.³

But it was maintained that where an action is founded on warrandice, the expenses incurred in unsuccessfully defending a claim involving total or partial eviction from the subject warranted are not recoverable from the granter of the warrandice. For this proposition the defenders relied almost entirely upon certain dicta contained in section 895 of Bell's Principles.
That passage begins with stating that "warrandice is not an obligation to protect, but only to indemnify in case of eviction." Taken by itself this would seem to imply that the indemnification must include expenses reasonably incurred in defending the claim; but then the author goes on to say,
"Thus there is no action of warrandice till judicial eviction, unless the ground of demand be unquestionable and proceeding from the fault of the seller." This passage, again, would seem, in doubtful cases such as the present, to justify judicial resistance to the claim, as until that was settled the obligation of warrandice would not arise. But further on the author continues thus—"The person bound in warrandice is entitled to have notice of the claim or attempt to evict, but the buyer is not bound to enter into a litigation in defence of the right, provided he give due notice.
If he undertake the defence without notice, and omit the proper plea, the seller will be free. The seller is not bound to defend against the claim, and if the buyer choose to do so while the seller declines it, and fails, he is not entitled to the expense of litigation."

It is the last clause that is founded on by the defenders. But the authority cited by Professor Bell for the clause is the case of Inglis v. Anstruther.⁴ Now, in that case the action concluded for reimbursement of expenses incurred in defending a commission to a certain office. The challenge was unsuccessful, so there was no eviction, and it was held that eviction is the sole foundation for an action upon warrandice, and that the pursuer had no claim for reimbursement of expenses, as there had been no eviction. It is manifest that this decision does not support the doctrine laid down in the text.
But the doctrine laid down in the decision is, I think, quite undoubted, and is supported by other decisions, the reason of it being that if an unfounded claim is made against the subject warranted, that is not a matter for which the granter of the warrandice is in any way to blame; it is only

¹ 8 R. 299.

² L. R. [1900], 1 Q. B. 413.

³ L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 79.

⁴ M. 16,633.

Nov. 20, 1907. the misfortune of the person who is in possession of the subject that a third party has preferred an unfounded claim against such possession, and Dougall v. Magistrates of Dunfermline. he has no recourse for expenses except against the person who attacked him, in the usual way. This doctrine was also laid down in the case of Lord Ardwall. Stephen v. The Lord Advocate,¹ where the Crown having, by a separate action of declarator, succeeded in having its right to the use of certain piers and accesses sustained, was held not responsible for the expenses of an unsuccessful defence which its tenant had maintained in the Small-Debt Court in answer to a claim for the use of these piers and accesses, the ratio of this decision also being that the Crown having given the tenant possession of a subject from no part of which he had been legally evicted, they were not liable for the loss caused to him by a groundless but successful action having been brought against him and wrongly decided in the Small-Debt Court. Neither of these decisions militates against the pursuer's claim for expenses in the present action; indeed they seem in a negative sense to support it, because the ground of refusing expenses in both cases was that there was no eviction, and therefore no loss for which the granter of the warrandice could be held in any way to blame. In the case of *Welsh v. Russell*² it was held that there was a case of partial eviction, similar in some respects to what occurred in the present case, the eviction there consisting in the imposition of a right of way upon a heritable subject purchased by the pursuer, but otherwise the case does not seem to have much bearing on the present, the pursuer's case being there thrown out because he claimed compensation for total eviction and not damages for partial eviction.

In Erskine's Institutes, ii. 3, 32, in dealing with the question of warrandice, the following passage occurs:—"Yet intimation of distress is not precisely necessary, for the purchaser's right of recourse continues competent to him without such intimation, if evidence is not brought that in the action of eviction he had submitted to some irrelevant defence or subjected himself to an incompetent means of proof—*Clerk*³"; and the same author in his Principles, ii. 3, 13, states the law as follows:—"Regularly the grantee, when the eviction is threatened, ought to intimate his distress to the granter that he may defend the right granted by himself; but though such intimation should not be made, the grantee does not lose his right of recourse, unless it shall appear that in the process of eviction he has omitted a relevant defence or subjected himself to an incompetent means of proof."

The last passage quoted from Bell's Principles, it seems to me, is itself obscure, is not supported by the decision on which it professes to be founded, and is at variance with the doctrine that warrandice is a contract of indemnity and with the general doctrine applicable to breaches of all contracts.

It falls, however, to be noticed that the passage quoted from Professor Bell comes under the general head of "sale of land." His doctrine of warrandice as regards leases is to be found in sections 1208 and 1253 of the Principles, where he deals with the implied warrandice contained in the contract of lease, the warrandice being that the subject exists, shall be made Nov. 20, 1907. effectual to the tenant and fit for its purpose; and, so far as I know, an action of damages for breach of such warrandice in leases covers all loss caused by the breach, unless it be indirect and consequential.

¹ 6 R. 282.

² 21 R. 769.

³ 1681, M. 16,605.

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

A passage from Professor Montgomerie Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, Lord Ardwall. 3d edition, pp. 217 and 219, and in the 1st edition at p. 207, was quoted by the counsel for the pursuer to shew that in the view of that able and experienced practitioner the party evicted was entitled to the expenses of an unsuccessful defence. He says,—“It will be observed that the party against whom eviction is threatened has in some views a better claim if he is unsuccessful than if he prevails, because though unsuccessful in defending the subject, he will get his expenses, besides the value of the subject evicted, from the granter of the obligation of absolute warrandice, whereas if successful, he indeed preserves to himself the subject but does not get his expenses”; he then proceeds to give some very good advice as to what the granter of the warrandice should do in such a case.

It appears to me that the true result of the authorities is that if an action of eviction be properly defended, and if, notwithstanding such defence, eviction follows, the granter of the warrandice will be liable, not only for the direct loss caused by the breach of warrandice, but for all expenses properly and reasonably incurred in defending the rights which he and the grantee alike had an interest to defend.

It was strongly contended by counsel for the defenders that at all events full expenses in the other action should not be allowed, because, it was said, there were two branches of that action, one concerning the right of the public to fish, and their presence on the pursuer's farm in pursuance of that right, and the other concerning ordinary trespass unnecessarily committed by persons founding on their fishing rights, but which trespass was not necessary for the exercise of these rights; and it was maintained that, according to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, the pursuer had not made out a case of damage by trespass, and therefore that all the expenses applicable to that part of the case should be disallowed, and that this should be done by way of modification of the total expenses.

The Lord Ordinary disregarded this argument, and I think he has done rightly. In the first place, the witnesses who spoke to the latter branch of the case were necessary to the former part, and indeed it is no easy matter, as a question of fact, to say when what may be called legitimate trespass ended and illegitimate trespass began; and, in the second place, it is certain that both kinds of trespass arose from the alleged right of fishing which the Lord Ordinary has found to exist.

For these reasons I do not think that any useful distinction can be drawn between the one part of the expenses and the other, and having regard to what was the origin of the whole proceedings, I do not think the pursuer should be deprived of any part of his expenses.

I accordingly propose that the Court should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 8th January 1907 reclaimed against, and find the defenders liable to the pursuer in expenses since the date of the said interlocutor, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, with power to the Lord Ordinary to decern for the

Nov. 20, 1907. taxed amount thereof, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therewith.

Dougall v.
Magistrates of Dunfermline.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN STEWART, S.S.C.—MORTON, SMART, MACDONALD, & PROSSER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 27. MRS MARION MAY DUNCAN OR M'DONALD OR M'LENNAN, Petitioner (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Campbell—Macmillan.

Nov. 21, 1907.

HERBERT ALEXANDER M'LENNAN, Respondent.—*Sol.-Gen. Ure—
M. P. Fraser.*

M'Lennan v.
M'Lennan.

Husband and Wife—Jus Administrationis—Wife living apart from her husband "with his consent"—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 5.—The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 5, enacts:—"Where a wife is deserted by her husband, or is living apart from him with his consent, a Judge of the Court of Session or Sheriff Court, on petition addressed to the Court, may dispense with the husband's consent to any deed relating to her estate."

Circumstances in which—in a petition by a wife praying the Court to dispense with her husband's consent to the granting of certain deeds by her—the Court held that the wife was in fact living apart from her husband with his consent, although he had repeatedly protested against her continuing to live apart, and granted the petition.

1st Division.
Ld. Salvesen.

ON 28th May 1907 Mrs Marion May Duncan or M'Donald or M'Lennan, residing at Maybank, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, wife of Herbert Alexander M'Lennan, residing at 1 Buckingham Street, Hillhead, Glasgow, presented a petition praying the Court to dispense with the consent of her said husband to such deeds of transfer as might be necessary to convey to a purchaser a certain business carried on by her. The petitioner averred, inter alia, that she had been twice married, and that she had carried on for over twenty years a bill-posting business which she had inherited from her first husband, Daniel M'Donald: that owing to her present state of health she was desirous of disposing of it, and had received various advantageous offers for the sale thereof, but that her present husband refused to consent to the sale. She also averred that she was living apart from her said husband, and the application was made in virtue of section 5 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881.*

Answers were lodged for her husband, the said Herbert Alexander M'Lennan, in which he averred:—

"The respondent in 1888, when nineteen years of age, went to the Argentine, South America, to engage in cattle ranching. He returned in 1893 to Glasgow on a visit of three weeks. At that time he first met the petitioner, having been introduced to her by a mutual friend. The petitioner invited him to call upon her and he did so, and got every possible encouragement from her to spend time in her society. The result was that the parties became attached to one another, and before the respondent's three weeks' visit expired the parties became engaged to one another. At this date the respondent was twenty-four years of age, and the petitioner a widow, and about forty years of age, of attractive personality, and a smart business woman. The petitioner was well aware at the time that the respondent had no independent income or business to enable him to set up house, and she herself had the business described in the petition, and other means. She was also aware that the respondent had been in the Argentine for several years earning his own living. The respondent was not aware of the petitioner's pecuniary position, and did not inquire, as his affection for her was too sincere. He knew that she carried on a bill-posting business, but understood this to be of trifling dimensions. The respondent thereafter returned to South America, but before going the petitioner made arrangements with him that on his return to Glasgow he would marry her. Nov. 21, 1907.

* Quoted in rubric.

M'Lennan v.
M'Lennan.

"At the date of said engagement the petitioner explained to the respondent that, although she went by the name of Mrs M'Donald, she had also the name of Mrs G., the latter being the name of a Frenchman, Mr G., who was a musical composer, whom she had married after her former husband's death, but who had been unfaithful to her and ill-treated her, and whom she had divorced. She also said that her marriage to the respondent could not take place for some time, till the divorce became effectual. She clearly led the respondent to believe that Mr G., who had managed her business for some years, had been her lawful husband, and the respondent, fully trusting her, felt sympathy with her for having been badly used. She also impressed upon respondent that she was very much afraid of Mr G., who was still alive, and this made it necessary that she should continue to be known as Mrs M'Donald, and that their engagement should be kept secret. It now appears that the petitioner was never married to Mr G., although she lived with him as husband and wife for several years, and she never required to and never did divorce him. In point of fact G. constantly blackmailed her, and she paid him hush-money to leave the country.

"The respondent returned to South America in December 1893, and remained there till he returned to Glasgow about April 1895. During his absence the parties corresponded on affectionate terms. On the respondent's return to Glasgow in 1895 it was arranged that the parties should get married. As already stated, the marriage was wholly arranged by the petitioner, and carried out in London with the utmost secrecy. The reason the petitioner gave for such secrecy was her previous marriage to G., and her fear of him, and also that her marrying a third time would hurt her bill-posting business, which had, she explained, been previously carried on by her first husband. She was at this date called by some of her friends Mrs M'Donald, and by other Mrs G. The respondent being very much in love with the petitioner, and believing that she had been badly used by G., allowed himself to be persuaded to keep their marriage secret, especially as he was returning to South America. After a brief honeymoon in London the parties returned to Glasgow, and, in accordance with petitioner's request, resumed, so far as the public were concerned, their former lives, though the respondent saw as much of the petitioner as possible, including visits to her at her coast house. No one, not even the parties' relatives, knew they were married.

"At the time of said marriage it was arranged that the respondent should return to South America at the close of the summer of 1895, Nov. 21, 1907. M'Lennan v. M'Lennan. and that the petitioner should, as soon as possible, dispose of her business and go out and join him as his acknowledged wife. The respondent acted as agreed on, and the parties corresponded on affectionate terms. The respondent pressed the petitioner to join him as promised, but she put him off saying she could not dispose of her business. She never asked the respondent to set up house in this country, but always gave respondent to understand she would join him in South America.

"The respondent became dissatisfied with this state of affairs, and about the end of 1895 returned to this country and urged the petitioner to take up house either in South America or in this country, but she was decidedly opposed to the latter proposal, and said she could not possibly settle here on account of G. It was then that, for the first time, the petitioner disclosed to the respondent that she had never been legally married to G., although they had lived as husband and wife, and she had been known as Mrs G. This disclosure caused the respondent great pain, and he threatened to leave the country on account of the petitioner's deceit. The petitioner implored the respondent to say nothing about the matter, and she used all her arts of persuasion and affection to get him to condone her deception. The respondent having a real love and affection for the petitioner, and she having acquired a great influence over him, ultimately agreed to let the matter pass.

"The petitioner still desired the marriage to be kept secret, urging as her reason her fear that G. would blackmail her. As the situation was so uncomfortable, it was arranged that the respondent should again return to South America, and the petitioner promised to join him there later on without fail. She did not do so, and the respondent being heartily sick of the position of matters, returned to this country in the early summer of 1896 to fix up matters one way or another. On his arrival he found his father, who was a wholesale wine and spirit merchant in Glasgow, in ill-health, and he had to enter his business, and on his death in November 1896, to take up that business and carry it on. The respondent always informed the petitioner of his affairs, and then again offered to take up house with her and let the marriage be known. The respondent repeatedly urged her to adopt this course, and end what he regarded as an intolerable position, but she always declined, and laid the greatest possible stress upon the consequences of the exposure of her past life with G. The petitioner is by religion a Roman Catholic, and she also gave the respondent to understand that if her past life was known, she would incur the displeasure of that Church.

"In the autumn of 1902 the petitioner informed the respondent she was going to South Africa for a trip, and consulted him about a will she proposed to make. The respondent informed her that she could do what she liked with her own money, and suggested the names of certain of her relatives whom she should not forget. The petitioner then informed the respondent that she did not intend to employ her Glasgow law-agent, as it would never do for him to know she was married, and that she was going to Edinburgh to get a strange lawyer. She subsequently informed the respondent that she had consulted Messrs Cowan & Dalmahey, W.S., Edinburgh, had sworn one of the partners to secrecy, and got him personally to write out her will, so that there would be no chance of the secret leaking out. She also informed the respondent that said lawyer had told her that her husband should sign the will merely as a matter of form, and asked him to do so. The respondent informed her that he did not want to read the will, or interfere in any way, but as she pressed him to sign, he resolved to consult a lawyer, having never previously asked legal advice as to his position. He accordingly consulted Mr Hugh Duncan, of Messrs Russell & Duncan, writers, Glasgow, in October 1902, and, out of loyalty towards his wife, put only an A B case before him, and was advised that, in the circumstances, the husband should not sign. He accordingly refused to do so, and this annoyed the petitioner." Nov. 21, 1907.

M'Lennan v.
M'Lennan.

With regard to the proposed sale of the business he averred:—"Not known as to the reasons for disposal and offers here referred to. The respondent has not been consulted or informed as to any of the proposed transactions. He has never been asked to accede or consent to any particular proposal. All he has been asked to do was to sign, as a matter of form, a general letter prepared by the petitioner's law-agent authorising the petitioner to do what she liked with her business. Acting on the advice of his said law-agent he declined to do so. The respondent has been informed, and believes and avers, that the petitioner has been so investing or disposing of her means and estate as to defeat his legal rights in the event of her predeceasing him."

With regard to section 5 of the Married Women's Property Act,* he averred:—"The section is referred to for its terms. Denied that said section applies to the circumstances of the parties to this petition. Denied that the petitioner has been deserted by the respondent. The petitioner and the respondent have all along been constantly in one another's society. Denied that she is living apart from him with his consent. Explained that, on the contrary, the respondent has all along objected to the petitioner's refusal to reside with him as husband and wife, and has persistently offered to make a home for her, and urged her to live openly with him as married persons."

On 6th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) allowed a proof.†

* Quoted in rubric.

† "OPINION.—The petitioner in this case is the wife of the respondent, from whom she is living apart. She proposes to sell a bill-posting business which she has been carrying on for a number of years, and she has asked her husband's consent, so as to enable her to grant a valid conveyance to the purchaser. This consent he refuses to give; and the prayer of the petition is that the Court should dispense with his consent, and so enable her to deal with her property in the same way as if she were unmarried.

"The application is made in virtue of section 5 of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, the terms of which are quoted on page 5 of the petition. It is a condition of the petitioner succeeding under this section that she should instruct either that she has been deserted by her husband, or is living apart from him with his consent; and her counsel urged me without inquiry to come to the conclusion that it sufficiently appeared from the pleadings that the petitioner was living apart from the respondent with his consent; and if so, that this was obviously a proper case for the Court exercising its power of superseding the respondent's curatorial rights. On the latter point I should not have much difficulty, because I do not think it is a good reason why the husband should refuse his consent to the sale of the separate business carried on by his wife, that she may thereby be enabled more readily to defeat any legal rights of succession that he

Nov. 21, 1907.

M'Lennan v.
M'Lennan.

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—No proof was necessary, for a proof could establish nothing more than was averred, and, on the facts as averred by the respondent here, the petitioner was entitled to decree. The respondent's averments shewed that the petitioner was living apart from him with his consent. There was no averment that she was in desertion, or that he had provided a home for her, or that he had raised an action of adherence; and in the absence of such averments his consent must be presumed.¹ His averments also shewed that this was not a case for the Court to exercise its discretion by refusing the petition. They shewed that the petitioner was experienced and successful in the conduct of her business, and the only objection set forth to the granting of the deeds was that they might alienate property from the husband. That was not a valid consideration in the exercise of curatorial powers, the sole object of might have in her estate if she predeceased. Prima facie the curatorial power of the husband ought to be exercised with a view to the wife's benefit and the protection of her estate, and not in order to protect his rights of possible succession, or—as the petitioner suggests—with a view to coercing her to make payment to him of a substantial sum of money as the price of his consent. It is admitted here that the petitioner is a clever business woman; and as she has managed this bill-posting business without her husband's interference with much success, it would seem that she may well be trusted to dispose of it on advantageous terms.

“The other question, however, is primarily one of fact, and I have to consider whether there are sufficient admissions by the respondent to justify me in holding that the petitioner is living apart from him with his consent. The Dean of Faculty, for the petitioner, maintained that it was sufficient for his purpose that there were no relevant averments in the answers that the petitioner had deserted her husband; and if so, it followed that she must be living apart from him with his consent in the sense that he acquiesced, whether reluctantly or not, in her so doing. I confess that I would gladly have reached that conclusion, because the broad facts of the case appear to be best explained on this footing. The parties were married in 1895, and since the end of 1896 they have been both resident in Glasgow; and both have had ample means to enable them to take up house together. They have been apparently seeing each other from time to time, and communicating on friendly terms, and yet all the time the petitioner has been living under the name of her first husband in her own house, while the respondent has been residing with his mother. On carefully considering the respondent's answers, however, I am unable to take that prima facie view of the case. He says that in November 1896 he ‘again offered to take up house with her, and let the marriage be known. The respondent repeatedly urged her to adopt this course, and end what he regarded as an intolerable position, but she always declined.’ Again, the respondent denies that the petitioner has been deserted by him; and his answers proceed as follows:—‘The petitioner and respondent have all along been constantly in one another's society. Denied that she is living apart from him with his consent. Explained that, on the contrary, the respondent has all along objected to the petitioner's refusal to reside with him as husband and wife (sic), and has persistently offered to make a home for her, and urged her to live openly with him as married persons.’ I was at first disposed to think that the absence of any allegation that the respondent had taken a house for his wife to which he had invited her to come might indicate that his alleged offer was not such as she was bound to accept; but, on the other hand, it may well be that the respondent was not which was to preserve the property for the wife.¹ The petition, Nov. 21, 1907: therefore, should be granted without a proof.

¹ Niven, May 19, 1883, 20 S. L. R. 587.

Argued for the respondent;—A proof should be allowed here, as ^{M'Lennan v.} ~~M'Lennan.~~ had been done in the cases of *Niven*² and Gibson.³ The respondent had made relevant averments that the petitioner had continued to live apart from him without his consent. It was not necessary that he should take such an extreme step as raising an action of adherence, nor was it necessary that he should provide a home for her, when it was clear from her attitude that she would refuse to come to it. He had done all that was necessary when he had taken every other means to induce her to live with him. It was clear on the averments that the wife was the recalcitrant party. It would be a dangerous precedent to hold that the mere fact that the spouses were living apart gave rise to a presumption that they were doing so by mutual consent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application to the Court by a married lady, who has for some years conducted a business, to dispense with the consent of her husband to a deed relating to that business, namely, a deed in which she proposes to sell it. Her husband has refused to give that consent, and she makes this application under the 5th section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. The answer that is made by the husband, who appears, is that she is not within the words of that section, the words of the section being—that “where a wife is deserted by her husband, or is living apart from him with his consent,” then such dispensation may be granted by the Court. The husband says that she is not a wife who is either deserted by her husband, or is living apart from him with his consent. The Lord Ordinary has thought it necessary to allow a proof upon that matter, but in the argument before your Lordships counsel for the petitioner have asked your Lordships' judgment upon the facts as disclosed by the respondent, the husband. That is to say, they are content to put their case as if everything which the respondent says in his answers were proved upon a proof. I think they are quite entitled to take that position, and I do not think that the respondent can ask that we should go through the trouble of a proof in order simply to put in the mouth of witnesses what he has put in his statement. He cannot expect to prove more than he has averred, and if what he has averred is taken for the purposes of the argument as true, it surely is not for him to complain. Taking all that is averred as absolutely true, it seems to me that this lady is in the position which is contemplated by section 5, because I think she is a wife who is living apart from her husband with his consent. The state of affairs, as disclosed by the husband's answers, and I look at bound to interrupt his present mode of life or to go to the useless expense of taking and furnishing a house if he was assured that his wife would not join him there. I have therefore with some reluctance come to the conclusion that I cannot dispose of this application without inquiry; although I fully realise that it might be in the interests of both parties that many of the matters which are dealt with in the petition and answers should not be made public property.”

¹ Bryce's Trustee, March 2, 1878, 5 R. 722.

² Niven, May 19, 1883, 20 S. L. R. 587.

³ Gibson, Nov. 18, 1893, 1 S. L. T. p. 323.

Nov. 21, 1907. nothing else, is that these parties, who were married secretly, have as a matter of fact never lived openly as husband and wife before the world.

M'Lennan v. M'Lennan. There were certain reasons as to why they should be married secretly originally. There may have been, and I assume that there was, a different view between the spouses at a subsequent time as to the cogency of these reasons as preventing a change of their position, and as preventing their taking up life as married people in the face of the world. Whatever the view may be as to who was right as to the cogency of the reasons, the fact is that no change was de facto made, and that this separate life went on just as it had commenced. In fact, as disclosed to us, the parties, except for a short honeymoon when they were married, have never lived together as man and wife; and according to the two tests of living as man and wife—that is to say, living at bed and board, as the expression is—they have lived at neither, although, as a matter of fact, they seem to have actually seen each other very frequently. It seems to me when one looks at the section of the statute, and the reason why it is put there, one sees that in a case of this sort the Court is not called upon to go into the matter in the way in which it would have to go into it in a purely consistorial case; that is to say, if parties were asking for divorce for desertion, or for separation, a different class of inquiry would require to be made. What seems to me to be desiderated by the statute is that the wife is de facto living apart from the husband, and that de facto the separation from the husband is due either to the husband's desertion or to his consent, which I really think comes to no more than a non renitentia on the part of the husband to the state of affairs. It has been urged by Mr Fraser, and I take his statement as we are bound to do, that the husband on many occasions objected to this state of affairs, but I think the fallacy of the argument based thereupon rests in this, that a person may often consent to a thing to which he greatly objects and against which he protests. You may consent in fact to something which you do not at all like, and which you would much sooner have otherwise. Upon the circumstances as disclosed by the husband himself I think it is perfectly clear in this case that there was consent in fact by the husband to the wife living apart from him as she did.

In granting this petition your Lordships are really just exercising the curatorial power from the same point of view as the husband, and the only proper point of view of the husband in exercising his curatorial power is not how it will affect himself but how it will affect his wife's interests. It is shewn to us that this lady has had a successful business in the city, and not being in very good health she wishes to turn her business into money. That seems perfectly right from the point of view of the wife, and I cannot doubt that any prudent husband would give his consent. Accordingly, I think we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree with your Lordship.

LORD PEARSON.—I concur.

STEPHEN H. PAYNE, Pursuer and Nominal Raiser.
JAMES MORTON, Defender, Real Raiser and Claimant (Appellant).—
Spens.
JAMES FRENCH AND ANOTHER, Defenders and Claimants (Respondents).
—A. M. Anderson.

No. 28.
Nov. 21, 1907.
Morton v.
French.

Writ—Authentication—Signature by Mark—"Writing under his hand" —Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 25), sec. 56 (1).—The Friendly Societies Act, 1896, enacts, sec. 56 :—" (1) A member of a registered society . . . may, by writing under his hand . . . nominate a person to whom any sum of money payable by the society or branch on the death of that member, not exceeding £100, shall be paid at his decease."
Held that a nomination authenticated by the member's mark only (she being unable to write) and by the signatures of two instrumentary witnesses, was not a writing under her hand within the meaning of the above enactment, and that being of a testamentary character and unsigned it was of no force or effect in law.

In February 1906 an action of multiplepinding was raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, in the name of Stephen H. Payne, agent in Glasgow for and on behalf of the Liverpool Victoria Legal Friendly Society, whose registered office was in St Andrew Street, Holborn Circus, London, to determine, inter alia, the right to a sum of £36, 8s., due under a policy of insurance with the Society on the life of Mrs Mary French, and on her death payable to her representatives or nominee.* She had died on 7th January 1906.

A claim was lodged (1) by James Morton, real raiser. He claimed in virtue of a nomination in the following terms:—

"I, Mary French, of 57 Jamieson Street, Govanhill, Town of Glasgow, not being under the age of sixteen years, hereby revoke all previous nominations, if any, made by me, and do hereby nominate James Morton, of 32 Carfin Street, Govanhill, Town of Glasgow, to receive the money payable on my death on insurance dated 25/6/04 (5316782) (as per ordinary branch policy) in accordance with the table of assurance and rules of the above-named Society in use at the date of such assurance and any alterations or amendments of the said rules.

"Signed by me in presence of two disinterested witnesses this twenty-first day of June one thousand nine hundred and five,

Signature

her Mary × French.
mark

(In case of a female, state if single, married, or a widow.)

Widow.

* The Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 25), enacts :—
Sec. 56. " (1) A member of a registered society (other than a benevolent society or working men's club) or branch thereof, not being under the age of sixteen years, may, by writing under his hand, delivered at, or sent to, the registered office of the society or branch, or made in a book kept at that office, nominate a person to whom any sum of money payable by the society or branch on the death of that member, not exceeding one hundred pounds, shall be paid at his decease."

Nov. 21, 1907. The person nominating must here state what relation, if any, he or she is to the person nominated.

Morton v.
French.

First witness

Friend.

Address

William Shearer,
9 Kelvingrove Street, Glasgow.

Second witness (who must be the agent or collector)

Address

Geo. Evans,
111 Allison Street, Glasgow.

" I hereby certify that the signatures of the witnesses and member are genuine, and that they are in the handwriting of the persons named, and that I was present when they attached their signatures, and that I signed my name at the same time as witness.

Signature (of agent or collector)

Geo. Evans,

District

Glasgow.

Agent

Stephen H. Payne,
143 West Regent St.

Collector's name

Geo. Evans,

Collector's address

111 Allison Street, Glasgow."

A claim was also lodged (2) by James French and Mrs Elizabeth French or Macdonald, the children and next of kin of the late Mrs French. They pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The nomination under which the said James Morton claims not being a writing under the hand of said Mary French, is of no effect.

A proof was allowed and led. The evidence was mainly directed to questions not now reported. The claimant Morton adduced evidence to shew that the Society were in the practice of passing nominations signed with a mark only.

On 30th June 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) held that the nomination in favour of the claimant Morton was valid and effectual, and ranked and preferred him accordingly.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie), on 21st December 1906, without deciding the question as to whether the nomination was a writing under the hand of Mrs French, ranked and preferred the next of kin upon a ground not necessary to be here explained.

The claimant Morton appealed, and argued;—The nomination here in question was not a document to which the ordinary rules as to the authentication of deeds applied. It was a privileged document—privileged, that was to say, because of the special objects of the Friendly Societies Act, one of which was to do away with unnecessary technicalities, e.g., subscription by notaries. There could not be any doubt that the mark here was Mrs French's mark, because it was attested by two instrumentary witnesses, and the document was a writing "under her hand," because subscription by mark was the only way in which she could execute a writing under her hand. The practice of the Society was to accept nominations subscribed by mark only. The Court would have regard to the practice of such a society with regard to assignation or transfer of obligations against the Society,¹ and that was the nature of nominations like the present. In England, even in the case of an ordinary contract, subscription by mark was sufficient.²

Argued for the claimants the next of kin of Mrs French;—The question was to be settled by the law of Scotland and not by the law of England, and the law of Scotland was clear. Except in the case of documents in re mercatoria, or in the case of express statutory relaxation, subscription by mark was not effectual—the subscription must be notarial.¹ This was not a document in re mercatoria,² it was of the nature of a will,³ and the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, did not contain any express relaxation such as that contained in the Marriage Notice (Scotland) Act, 1878.⁴ The nomination therefore was invalid.

¹ Marino's case, 1867, L. R., 2 Ch. App. 596.

² Baker v. Denning, 1838, 8 Ad. & Ell. 94; Addison on Contracts, 10th ed., p. 38.

Nov. 21, 1907.
Morton v.
French.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the document founded on in this case is not one which can receive effect. In my opinion it is not legally signed and authenticated. I am satisfied that this is a case in which no relaxation can be allowed of the rule of law as to the authentication of deeds. Our law has always been very strict in that matter, and it does not depend on custom, but on distinct statutory enactment. In certain cases where formality is not required authentication by mark has been allowed. I allude to the class of writings known as writings in re mercatoria, but we are not here dealing with a document in re mercatoria. The document here is a deed which is practically testamentary in its nature. It is a revocable deed, and one which the party who signs can set aside. It has been held in England that a document such as that before us is testamentary in its character, and with that I agree. The only remaining question is—Does the case fall within any special expression as to the mode of authentication contained in the Act? In some cases, e.g., under section 16 of the Marriage Notice (Scotland) Act, 1878, a person who is unable to write is allowed to exhibit his signature by a cross or other mark. But here the words of the statute simply are “by writing under his hand,” without specifying the mode of signing. Where a relaxation in the rule as to signing is allowed, it has been specifically done by Act of Parliament. Here we have no such relaxation by the Friendly Societies Act, under which alone we are. We must therefore follow the universal rule of law, to which no exception has been made.

I propose that the first plea in law for James French should be upheld.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING, LORD LOW, and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute; found that the nomination was not a writing under the hand of the deceased Mrs Mary French, was not duly signed by her, and was of no force or effect in law, therefore sustained the first plea in law for the claimants the next of kin of Mrs French, and ranked and preferred them accordingly.

J. S. MORTON, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.O.—Agents.

¹ Graham v. M'Leod, Nov. 30, 1848, 11 D. 173; Crosbie v. Wilson, June 2, 1865, 3 Macph. 870; Stirling Stuart v. Stirling Crawford's Trustees, Feb. 6, 1885, 12 R. 610; Ersk. Inst. iii. 2, 7-8; Bell's Conveyancing, vol. 1., p. 49; Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 41.

² Bell's Com. i., p. 342.

³ Baxter, L. R., [1903] P. 12.

⁴ 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 43, sec. 16.

No. 29.

ALEXANDER MACKAY, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—A. M. Anderson—Hendry.

Nov. 21, 1907.

GEORGE ROSIE, Defender (Respondent).—*Sol.-Gen. Ure—Constable.*Mackay v.
Rosie.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Personal Exception—Election—Election inferred from acceptance of weekly payments—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1 (2) (b).—In defence to an action of damages at common law for personal injuries, brought by a workman against his master, the master pleaded that the action was barred, in virtue of sec. 1 (2) (b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, by the pursuer having elected to take compensation under the Act. On a proof it appeared that at the end of the week in which he was injured the workman was paid a sum in lieu of wages, and was told that for the next two weeks he would get nothing, but after that he would be paid half wages. He subsequently, for a period of about six months, received each week a sum amounting to slightly more than half his average weekly wage. These payments were at first made at his house, but afterwards, when he had partially recovered, he called for them regularly at his employer's office. No receipts were taken for these payments.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Johnston) that the pursuer had elected to accept, and had accepted, compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and was thereby barred from raising this action.

1st Division.
Ld. Johnston.

ON 18th May 1907 Alexander Mackay, mason, Dumbiedykes Road, Edinburgh, brought an action against George Rosie, builder, East Crosscauseway, Edinburgh, concluding for payment of £500. He sought to recover that sum as damages at common law for personal injuries suffered by him as the result of an accident incurred while working in the employment of the defender on 20th November 1906.

In defence the defender made the following statement of facts:—"From the date of his accident until the beginning of May 1907 the pursuer was regularly week by week paid by the defender half his average weekly wage as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.* He was well aware of the provisions of the said Act, and accepted the sums paid to him as compensation thereunder. He thus elected to take compensation under the statute in question, and is barred from now setting up a claim of damages against the defender."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having elected to accept, and having accepted, compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, is barred from raising the present action.

On 18th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) allowed a proof of the averments contained in the statement of facts for the defender.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), enacts, sec. 1 (2) (b):—"When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid."

The material facts established at the proof will be found set forth in Nov. 21, 1907. the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra.

On 18th October 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the actings of parties between the date of the accident and 4th May 1907 infer an agreement between them whereby the pursuer elected to take compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, on the footing of his average wage being taken at 36s. a week: Therefore sustains the second plea in law for the defender, dismisses the action, finds neither party entitled to expenses, and decerns."*

Mackay v.
Rosie.

* "OPINION.—I do not think that it is necessary to delay giving judgment in this case. The pursuer is not a foreigner; he is not even what I may call an illiterate workman. He is a Scotsman, he is a member of one of the skilled trades of this country, and from his appearance, I am justified in saying that he is one of the best representatives of that trade. On the other hand, the defender is a man of really much the same station as the pursuer. He is now an employer, but he began as a workman—so much so that the present pursuer actually worked under him when he was merely a foreman in the employment of others. I regard them in point of education and in point of intelligence—and I say so not merely as matter of inference but from their appearance in the witness-box—though one is workman and the other employer, very much as equals.

"Now, the pursuer's counsel's contention practically comes to this—that there is a duty imposed upon the employer to take charge of the interests of his workmen. I cannot conceive a case in which such a rule would operate greater injustice than the present, where I find that the employer and the workman are men of similar origin, similar upbringing, similar education, and, as far as I can judge, of similar capacity, only that the one being about eighteen years older than the other, has developed into a small employer, which there is no reason the other should not also do in his turn. But there is no such rule. The employer must not take advantage of the position of his workman, must not take advantage of his ignorance and want of education, must not take advantage of the physical condition to which a serious accident has for the time reduced him. But when they meet on equal terms and at arm's length, I hold that there is no more obligation on the employer to take charge of the interests of his workman in the matter of compensation for accident than there is on any other contracting party to charge himself with the interests of the party with whom he is contracting.

"What then are the circumstances here? The pursuer meets with, I assume, a serious accident. His employer acts with perfect consideration to him. I cannot conceive of any more appropriate or more considerate action on the part of an employer. He sends his son at once to see him, and at the end of the week in which the accident occurs sends him again to make payment of, not the precise amount of wages which were due, but a liberal allowance in lieu of the balance of wages. The actual sum paid is a matter with which I have no concern, but I have a concern with this, that on the day on which it was paid the defender's son said to him 'That is to cover anything that is due to you at present, you will get nothing for the next two weeks, and after that you will get half wages.' Now, I am prepared to hold it as proved by irresistible implication that both parties were perfectly aware what the meaning of this was. I am not going to take it off the pursuer's hands that a Scottish workman of his position and his capacity at this time of day knows nothing about the Workmen's Compensation Act. If there be an idea abroad among workmen that they may pose as in ignorance of the statutes which have been passed to provide for their protection, it is high time that that idea was dissipated. I am pre-

Nov. 21, 1907.

Mackay v.
Rosie.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The onus was on the defender to prove election on the part of the pursuer, and he had failed to prove it. He had established nothing but the acceptance of weekly payments, and that alone was not sufficient.¹ It was necessary under the Act that the workman should “claim” compensation, and he had made no claim here. Further, he had granted no receipts for these payments. The payments themselves were not the proper payments under the Act, i.e., they were not half the average weekly wages. The pursuer was ignorant of his precise rights under the Act, and in these circumstances there was nothing to shew that he had “elected” to take his rights under the Act, and to abandon any other claim competent to him.

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was right. This was a question of fact merely, and the facts clearly shewed that the pursuer had exercised his option of taking compensation under the pared to hold that a British workman is bound not merely to know something about his rights, but to take proper steps to ascertain what his rights are, and that as I have already said when he deals with his employer on even terms and at arm's length, there is no more obligation upon the employer to take charge of his interests than there is on any other contracting party to take charge of the interest of the party with whom he is contracting.

“Now, it is clear that the pursuer knew perfectly well that, in the first place he was entitled by a statute, even if he did not know by what precise statute, to nothing for the first fortnight and to half wages during the subsequent time of his disablement. He knew perfectly well that his employer was under obligation, imposed upon him by a statute, to make that payment; and, for the space of nearly six months, he accepted and allowed his employer to continue paying him half wages, or what was understood to be half wages, although it turned out, on an accurate calculation, to be somewhat more. For a period of nearly six months half wages were paid as matter of obligation and of statutory obligation, and accepted as matter of right and of statutory right, and there being no question of advantage taken, I think it is impossible to do otherwise than infer an agreement to make and accept compensation in this statutory form. I cannot accept the pursuer's contention that he is now entitled to come here and say ‘I knew it was under some statute, but I did not know under what statute it was that this payment was being made; moreover I did not take the trouble to ascertain what was the statutory condition of my accepting this payment.’ He is not a child, he is not a foreigner, he is not an illiterate, he is an educated workman. He was not during those six months on a bed of sickness or otherwise incapacitated. He was not in any sense in a position in which it could be said that the parties were not meeting on equal terms, and were not acting at arm's length. To sustain the pursuer's contention would be to write out of the law of Scotland the principle that ignorantia juris neminem excusat in favour of the workman, but of the workman only, where he transacts with his employer in the matter of compensation for personal injury.

“In the case of Valenti, 1907, S. C. 695, referred to, the parties were not on equal terms. There you had the employer, a large company, acting through its officials, and the workman, an Italian, knowing little or nothing of English. Even under these circumstances, had there been anything like the facts which you have got here, an agreement would, I think, have been implied. But there there was only one interview and two

¹ Little v. P. & W. MacLellan, Limited, Jan. 16, 1900, 2 F. 387; Fowler v. Hughes, Jan. 31, 1903, 5 F. 394; Valenti v. William Dixon, Limited, 1907, S. C. 695.

Act. It was not necessary that there should have been a written claim, a claim could be inferred from acceptance of payments.¹ Esto that an unsuccessful claim made in error would not bar a subsequent claim on a different ground,² these were not the circumstances of the present case. It was impossible to attribute the long-continued receipt of weekly payments here to anything but an acceptance of them as compensation due under the Act. The alleged ignorance of the pursuer as to his rights under the Act was not made out, and in any event the maxim ignorantia juris neminem excusat was a sufficient answer to that argument.

Nov. 21, 1907.
Mackay v.
Rosie.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of a workman against his employer for damages at common law in respect of an injury which he received while working in his employment.

receipts, which, ex hypothesi, the man could not read, which he only authenticated by his mark, and about which no practical explanation was given to him. Again in the case of Fowler, 5 F. 394, also referred to, you have the parties also not on equal terms, through another cause. The workman there met with an injury which so affected one of his eyes that it ultimately had to be removed. While he was lying suffering acutely from the inflammation in the eye, before the operation, he was asked to sign one single receipt. Quite unable to read, and in a bodily condition in which it is not to be presumed that he was capable of applying his mind to what he was doing, he signed the receipt at a place which was pointed out to him, and without explanation. In neither of these cases were the two parties dealing on equal terms, and their circumstances were quite different from those of the present case. But I think there is another point which differentiates them. In Fowler's case there was one receipt, and one receipt only. In Valenti's case there were two. But here there were about five-and-twenty payments, spread weekly over a period of nearly six months, made and accepted. It is quite true that the master, through his son, came to the workman and openly told him what he was bound to pay and the workman entitled to receive. The master did, in a certain sense, volunteer the payments at the start, and continued to forward them for a month or six weeks; but for the next three or four months, the pursuer, quite content with the situation, regularly went and applied for the payment. Mr Anderson contended that he made no claim. It seems to me that there is quite ample claim to satisfy the statute, if a man comes to the office to ask and receive the payments which had been made to him for a month or six weeks at his own house, and continues to do so from about the beginning of January until May. It seems to me that that distinguishes the case from Fowler's and Valenti's cases, and brings it very much more nearly on all-fours with the case of Little, 2 F. 387, where receipts were signed for six months.

"I venture to say that there is no distinction in the principle here to be deduced from the fact that no receipts were actually signed. If the pursuer is justified in his contention here, I do not think he would have been foreclosed even had he signed receipts. He is paid and he receives half his wages admittedly as a matter of statutory right and obligation. Would it have made it any stronger if he had signed a receipt in which it was stated:—'I accept the sum which you are paying me as statutory compensation, or

¹ Powell v. Main Colliery Co., L. R., [1900] A. C. 366; Wright v. John Bagnall & Sons, Limited, L. R., [1900] 2 Q. B. 240; Kilpatrick v. Wemyss Colliery Co., Limited, 1907, S. C. 320.

² McDonald v. James Dunlop & Co., Limited, Feb. 25, 1905, 7 F. 533; Rouse v. Dixon, L. R., [1904] 2 K. B. 628.

Nov. 21, 1907. The preliminary answer is made that the workman has accepted compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that under the provisions of section 1, subsection 2 (b), he cannot now make a claim at common law. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to that contention, and dismissed the action.

Mackay v.
Rosie.

Ld. President.

The facts on which that plea is based are that for a long period a sum of 18s. a week was admittedly paid to the pursuer and accepted. Parties, however, are not at one as to the footing on which these payments were made and received. The case so far differs from those of Valenti,¹ Fowler,² and Little,³ which were cited to us, in that there is here no written receipt, and indeed no writing at all, to which appeal can be made. I am of opinion, however, that the fact of there being no written receipt is by no means conclusive. After all a receipt is no more than a piece of evidence, and though a receipt bearing to be in respect of sums paid under the Workmen's Compensation Act would be very difficult to get over, it is of value as an item of evidence and nothing else.

But I think the question before us is a question of fact, and fact alone. The Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses and considered the whole circumstances, has found that the pursuer accepted the payments as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and I am not prepared to disagree with his determination. I do not propose to say more, because I look on this case as raising solely a question of fact. I am content to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary's view that the payments in question were made and accepted as compensation under the Act.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think it must be taken as matter of common knowledge among persons in the class of life of even, as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act'? I think not, because, in the knowledge of both parties, the sum was paid and was received under statute, if not specifically under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If that is so, can it be admitted that a man should come and claim and accept a payment which is due to him under statute, and not be held to take it with all the statutory conditions? Is the master, because the transaction happens to be between a master and a servant—is the master bound to say, 'Oh, I cannot pay you this until I am quite sure that you know what the statute is under which we are transacting, and that you know everything that is in the statute, not merely that you are entitled to this payment, not merely that you are receiving this payment under the statute, but that you know all the conditions which will follow your receipt?' I know no law which makes such a difference between contracts between employers and workmen and contracts between other people. If the one party does not choose to know his rights, I am prepared to say that the same law must be meted out to him, though he is a workman, as would be meted out to anybody else were the contract other than a contract between master and workman.

"What concludes the matter to my mind is this, if the one party is bound, both parties are. It seems to me that it would have been futile for the master, in the circumstances of this case, to have turned round and said, 'No; I am not going to continue these payments.' If the master is bound, so must the employee.

"I shall therefore sustain the second plea in law for the defender, and dismiss the action. . . ."

¹ 1907, S. C. 695.

² 5 F. 394.

³ 2 F. 387.

the pursuer that a claim of damages founded on fault is a claim for a single Nov. 21, 1907. payment. It follows, I think, that when a person having such a claim has ^{Mackay v.} accepted weekly payments for many weeks—unless he has taken them as ^{Rosie.} charity, and there is no suggestion of that here—he may be presumed to ^{Lord M'Laren.} have accepted these as payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the only law which creates an obligation to make compensation by means of weekly payments. Very clear evidence would be required to displace that presumption, and I fail to see anything in the evidence here antagonistic to the plain inference that follows the acceptance of weekly payments.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

LORD PEARSON.—I also agree.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN S. MORTON, W.S.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—Agents.

DAVID JUGURTHA THOMSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Constable—Pringle.

No. 30.

MATILDA LAWSON STEWART or THOMSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Orr Deas—Fenton.

Nov. 22, 1907.

ARTHUR BRIGHT, Co-Defender.—Lyall Grant.

Thomson v.
Thomson.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Lenocinium.—A husband who was not on good terms with his wife, and had reason to suspect her conduct, was informed that she intended to visit a man at Gateshead, with whom he knew she had been corresponding, and he instructed detectives to watch her movements. His wife informed him that she desired to visit friends at Stirling, and asked if she should go. She also asked for money. He replied, "Certainly go," and gave her £2. She went to Gateshead, where an act of adultery was committed. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Salvesen) that the facts did not support a plea of lenocinium, and decree of divorce granted.

Expenses—Husband and Wife—Wife's Expenses of reclaiming note.—Per curiam (after consulting Judges of the Second Division)—Where in an action of divorce a wife has been unsuccessful in the Outer-House, and then presents a reclaiming note, the question whether she is entitled to her expenses, if she is again unsuccessful, must depend on whether the case was a fair one to bring before the Court. The prima facie view of the case is that the Lord Ordinary is right, and therefore it is for the wife to shew that the case was a fair one for reclaiming.

Circumstances in which the Court allowed a wife, against whom decree of divorce had been pronounced by a Lord Ordinary, the expenses of a reclaiming note, although the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

On 5th August 1898 David J. Thomson and Matilda L. Stewart ^{1st Division.} were married at India Buildings, Edinburgh, by declaration before ^{Lord}Salvesen. witnesses.

On 18th June 1906 Thomson raised an action of divorce against his wife on the ground of adultery, calling as co-defender Arthur Bright, variety artist.

Defences were lodged by the defenders. The charge of adultery was admitted on record, but the defender Mrs Thomson pleaded;—The pursuer having been guilty of lenocinium or connivance with regard to the act of misconduct founded on, is barred from suing for divorce in respect thereof.

Nov. 22, 1907. The facts on which the plea of lenocinium were based are fully stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen).

Thomson v.
Thomson.

On 10th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds facts, circumstances, and qualifications proven relevant to infer that the defender has committed adultery: Finds her guilty of adultery accordingly: Therefore divorces and separates the defender from the pursuer, his society, fellowship, and company in all time coming, and finds and declares in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the Auditor to tax and to report: Further, finds no expenses due to or by either party as between the pursuer and the co-defender." *

* "OPINION.—The parties to this action were married on 5th August 1898, after having cohabited for more than a year before marriage. The defender even at that time was admittedly addicted to drink; and although she verbally promised to give it up on her marriage she failed to keep her promise except for a few months. The pursuer on the other hand was a man of loose morality; and it is not surprising that a union thus inauspiciously contracted did not prove a happy one. The only child of the marriage was born in November 1902, but died at birth. Since that time the pursuer and defender have been entirely estranged, owing partly to the defender's habits of intemperance and partly to the pursuer's open preference for the society of other women. Since May 1902 the marriage home has been in Portobello, where during most of the period they resided in a house consisting of three rooms and a kitchen. For at least a year before the events founded on in the present action they occupied separate apartments, the pursuer occupying the chief bedroom, having as his companion a bulldog that his wife disliked and feared, and the defender sleeping in the other bedroom with the general servant.

"Although the parties lived in the same house they saw little of each other. The pursuer generally remained in bed till about two o'clock in the afternoon, and was generally out the rest of the day. He often left Portobello on short trips which sometimes occupied a good many weeks. He never took his wife with him on these trips, nor did he ask her to be his companion at any of the places of amusement which he frequented when at home. Except that he provided her with board and lodging, and even received her mother and sister as his guests, he did not discharge any of the duties of a husband towards her. His excuse is that she was constantly the worse of liquor; but although there is no doubt that the defender was much addicted to intemperance, I am satisfied that the pursuer has greatly exaggerated her conduct. At all events, he took no means to try to cure her of the liquor habit, but on the contrary allowed her to order from the grocer at his expense as much whisky as she pleased. The truth seems to be that the pursuer had absolutely ceased to care for his wife, and would have been glad to be rid of her; and I have no doubt he so expressed himself on many occasions during their matrimonial squabbles. The pursuer himself took full liberty to indulge in disreputable intrigues with other women, and was quite indifferent as to his wife's happiness or moral welfare.

"In July 1905 the defender was on a visit in Perth for some time along with her mother; and she there became acquainted with the co-defender, who is by profession a variety artist. They were frequently together, and in the course of conversation confided to each other their domestic troubles. The result was that an attachment sprang up between these two persons, both of whom were married; and during the winter and spring of 1905-6 they kept up a continuous correspondence. The defender collected picture

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Divorce was a remedy granted to an injured party, and a husband could not be considered an injured party if he had encouraged and promoted his wife's adultery.¹ To support the plea of lenocinium it was enough to prove conduct on the part of the husband which made him the "wilful tempter and inciter of his wife to the commission of adultery," or which "conduced directly" to the act complained of.² In the present case the pursuer was on bad terms with his wife, and was having her movements watched in the hope of detecting her in an act of adultery; it was also an element in the case that he knew that her self-control was weakened by her drinking habits. He knew of the intimacy between his wife and the co-defender, and that she had accepted an invitation to visit him at Gateshead. When she asked if she might go away, he said, "Certainly go," and gave her money, which, in the circumstances, was a direct act of incitement and post-cards, and the co-defender sent her during that period no less than eighty-seven such cards. They all bore a greeting or affectionate message in his handwriting, and were signed 'Annie' (in one instance 'Alice'), or with the initials 'A. B.' The defender says that the pursuer must have known from these post-cards that she was on friendly terms with the co-defender, but I think there is no evidence to support this. In ordinary course the pursuer would only have the opportunity of seeing a very few of the post-cards, and as they bore a female signature they were not calculated to excite suspicion. The co-defender says he assumed the name 'Annie' because that was a nickname that had been given him owing to the success of a song called 'Annie More,' which was part of his repertoire. But the co-defender's reputation was not so well known that this fact must be presumed to have been within the knowledge of the pursuer, who had never seen him until the date of the proof.

Nov. 22, 1907.

Thomson v.
Thomson.

"The letters which passed between the defender and co-defender have been destroyed on both sides; but from the parole evidence it appears that the correspondence culminated with the co-defender sending an invitation to the defender to visit him at Gateshead, where he was to perform as one of the members of a troupe that had been engaged for the Easter season. There is no doubt that he intended if she accepted the invitation to commit adultery with her. When he engaged his rooms at Gateshead he told the landlady he expected his wife would visit him at the end of the week, and it may be conjectured that the character of the correspondence which had passed between the two convinced the co-defender that she would be willing to pass herself off as such. At anyrate events proved that he was not mistaken. The defender travelled from Edinburgh to Gateshead by the 2.20 train; she was met at the station by the co-defender, who after they had had some refreshment in a public-house, immediately conducted her to his apartments, which they occupied together till the Monday morning. The adultery was capable of such clear proof that it was ultimately admitted upon record by both the defender and co-defender; and it is upon this admitted misconduct that the present action of divorce is based.

"It is not averred that there was any condonation; and accordingly the only defence available was that of lenocinium. The onus of instructing this very special defence admittedly rests on the defender, but the facts upon which she founds are to a large extent not in dispute. About the end of

¹ Marshall v. Marshall, May 20, 1881, 8 R. 702; Bell's Prin. sec. 1532; Mackenzie's Criminal Law, i. 17, 6.

² Donald v. Donald, March 30, 1863, 1 Macph. 741, per Lord Ardmillan, at p. 748; Hunter v. Hunter, Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 359, per Lord Shand, at p. 368; Munro v. Munro, Jan. 25, 1877, 4 R. 332.

Nov. 22, 1907.

Thomson v.
Thomson.

encouragement, knowing, as he did, that she intended to go to Gateshead. His conduct, at least, amounted to "passive acquiescence in the expectation that his wife would commit the crime," which was sufficient to bar him from obtaining the decree which he sought.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—The plea of lenocinium was not founded on the maxim volenti non fit injuria,² nor would evidence which would be sufficient to prove condonation be enough to establish connivance.³ It was necessary to shew that the husband had done something to arrange the occasion of the adultery, or to expose his wife to what he knew would be great temptation. The evidence in the present case fell far short of this. A husband who had suspicions of his wife's fidelity was entitled to have a watch set upon her movements.⁴ When the pursuer gave the defender permission to go to Stirling, he had no more than a suspicion that she intended to go to Gateshead, and in setting detectives to watch her, was only providing

March the pursuer had heard a rumour that his wife had been too intimate with some 'actor fellow' in Perth, who on one occasion was said to have assisted her to bed when in a state of intoxication. He seems to have connected this with the frequent post-cards she was receiving; and shortly after, at all events prior to the 9th of April 1906, he learned from the defender's youngest sister that a man called Arthur Bright had invited her to go to Gateshead to see him. On the 9th of April accordingly he instructed his law-agent, with whom he had had two previous meetings, to engage detectives to watch her movements. In the course of the same week he learned from the same source the train by which she proposed to travel on the Saturday. The defender had informed her husband that she wished to spend the week-end at Cumbusbarron near Stirling, where she was in the habit of visiting a female friend. On the morning of Saturday the 14th of April she asked for £1 to pay her railway expenses and he at once handed her £2. She also asked him whether she should go, and he answered 'certainly go,' or words to that effect. The defender had previously had a hint from her brother-in-law that she was being watched, and her mother had endeavoured to dissuade her from going on the projected visit to Gateshead, but she did not take the statement seriously, or else imagined that she was able to elude detection. After the interview at which the money passed, the pursuer went to Edinburgh along with his brother-in-law, and dispatched a telegram to the detectives informing them of the train by which he expected his wife to go. He expected and hoped that the defender would go to Gateshead, and that the detectives would procure evidence which would result in his being able to establish grounds for a divorce. His expectation was based partly upon what his brother-in-law had told him and partly on a suspicion that the defender had on a previous occasion gone to Dumfries when she professed to be going to Stirling, and had done so for the purpose of meeting the co-defender.

"On these facts the defender's counsel argued that the pursuer had contributed to his wife's misconduct by supplying her with funds to visit the co-defender in the knowledge that she contemplated such a visit, and that no more was required to support the plea of lenocinium.

"After carefully considering the evidence, I think it is not sufficient to establish this special defence. The pursuer was not in any way responsible for the intimacy which had sprung up between the defender and co-defender; and so far as his wife knew it had been carefully concealed from his know-

¹ Fraser, Husband and Wife, 2d ed., p. 1186.

² Wemyss v. Wemyss, March 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 660.

³ Fraser, Husband and Wife, 2d ed., p. 1193.

⁴ M'Intosh v. M'Intosh, Nov. 14, 1882, 20 S. L. R. 117.

for the possibility of her doing so. Moreover, when expressions used by a husband are founded on as an incitement to commit adultery, it must be shewn that they were understood as such by the wife, that they were acted on, and that they were the immediate cause of the subsequent act of adultery.¹ In the present instance the defender, so far from understanding the pursuer's words as giving her permission to go to Gateshead, did all she could, both before and after her visit there, to keep the pursuer in ignorance of where she had been.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of divorce at the instance of the husband on the ground of adultery ; the fact of adultery is admitted ; and the only ground on which the wife argues that decree should not be pronounced is her plea of lenocinium. The facts on which the plea is founded ledge. Moreover, she did not believe that he was aware of her intended visit to Gateshead, a visit which she fully intended should not come to his knowledge. With this object she took the train from Gateshead to Stirling on the Monday, and remained there two or three days, and she dispatched post-cards to the pursuer and her own relatives from Bridge of Allan, in order that pursuer might suppose that she had actually gone on the week-end visit for which she had asked her travelling expenses. She does not pretend that if she had informed the pursuer that she was going to visit Bright he would have allowed her to do so. Moreover, it lay entirely with herself whether or not the visit was to result in her committing adultery with Bright ; and she says that she had not made up her mind to do so when she left, although she was apparently easily persuaded when he met her at the station. The defender, therefore, had no ground for supposing that she was acting with the consent or even the acquiescence of her husband in yielding to Bright's persuasions ; and as he had not connived at the original intimacy, or done anything to throw them together, I do not think that it can be said that he was in any sense a party to her guilt. I do not commend his conduct ; but I think it is substantially the conduct referred to by Lord Young in his opinion in the case of Mackintosh, 20 S. L. R. 117, which that learned Judge said would not amount to lenocinium. The pursuer believed that his wife had already been unfaithful to him ; and in these circumstances I think he was within his legal rights in endeavouring to procure evidence which would establish her guilt.

"I was referred to various reported cases the facts in which bear very little, if any, resemblance to those which we have here. In only one of them, Marshall, 8 R. 702, was the plea of lenocinium sustained, and that upon grounds which are totally inapplicable to the present case. The pursuer here was alimentering his wife in his own house, in a suitable, and indeed liberal, manner, and there was no reason except her infatuation for the co-defender why she should have made the visit to Gateshead at all. His neglect, and indeed unkindness to her, and his own immorality, may excuse, but they do not justify, her lapse from virtue, or bar him from the remedy which he seeks.

"On the question of expenses the defender is admittedly entitled to have her expenses paid by her husband. The pursuer, however, maintained that the co-defender should be found liable in the whole expenses. These would have been comparatively trifling but for the plea of lenocinium stated by the defender, and which could only be stated by her with any prospect of success ; and having regard to this and the pursuer's own conduct I am not

¹ Hunter v. Hunter, Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 359, per L. P. Inglis, at p. 365.

Nov. 22, 1907. are these :—The parties were married in 1898, and after a short time the marriage was not a very happy one. Both parties seem to have been in fault. The husband seems to have been unfaithful, and the wife was addicted to drink. It is quite clear that for some time previous to the events to which I am going to refer, the two had lost all affection for each other; and, so far as the pursuer was concerned, he would have been pleased if the marriage relationship between them came to an end.

Thomson v.
Thomson.

Ld. President.

The defender had formed an intimacy with another person, whom she had met at Perth originally, and with whom for some time she had carried on a correspondence. This correspondence does not seem to have been of a very intimate character. It was carried on for the most part on post-cards. A large number of these have been recovered, and are produced in the case; but they contain nothing which is not of the most innocent description. I do not think that any impression could be drawn from the post-cards adversely to the parties. I also think it is the case that for some time at least the pursuer did not know that this post-card correspondence was going on, although at the end he did know that his wife was receiving communications from a man whom he did not know, but about whom he had heard.

The defender had been in the habit of leaving the family home at Portobello and going away for week-end visits; and, prior to the events I am coming to, the defender had gone away for a week-end visit, and it had come to the pursuer's knowledge that she had deceived him as to the place where she had been. It is only human experience to suppose that if a man's wife says that she is going for a visit to one place and goes to another, there is some motive for her doing so, and that the motive is likely to be not a very good one. Accordingly, the pursuer's suspicions were aroused. They were still further aroused by a communication which he received from his sister-in-law to the effect that his wife had received an invitation to visit, or at least to go and see, this acquaintance whom he did not know, and who was staying at a considerable distance. There, again, it is human nature to suppose that a man would have suspicions if his wife, concealing the fact from him, went to visit a man in a far distant town, and he would think she went there for no good purpose. That his suspicions were aroused by this communication is certain, for he went to consult his agents and made arrangements for having his wife watched. In these circumstances the defender came to the pursuer and said that she wanted to go to Stirling for the week-end, and asked for money. The pursuer gave her disposed to subject the co-defender in these expenses. Prior to the Conjugal Rights Act of 1861 the co-defender could be rendered liable in such expenses only in a subsequent action, and as part of the damages that the injured pursuer had sustained through the seduction of his wife. There can be no question here of the pursuer having suffered damage in the ordinary sense through the co-defender's adultery with the defender, for he was anxious to get rid of his wife, and scarcely sought to disguise his indebtedness to the co-defender for giving him the opportunity of putting an end to the matrimonial relation. It is true that the co-defender's conduct cannot be excused, but I think he is sufficiently punished by the exposure that it has entailed, and the expense to which he has himself been put in the present action. As between the pursuer and the co-defender I shall accordingly find no expenses due to or by either party."

£2. The defender had had a sort of warning from her mother, who had Nov. 22, 1907. got an inkling of what the pursuer was about in setting people to watch his Thomson v. wife, and had advised her daughter not to go away, because she was being Thomson. watched. This had caused an uncomfortable feeling in the defender's Ld. President. mind, and she asked her husband,—“Should I go?” and he said “Yes, certainly go.”

The defender was watched, she went to Gateshead, and there the adultery admittedly took place. She did not come straight back from Gateshead to Portobello, but went first to Cambusbarron, near Stirling, from which place she returned home.

It was argued for the defender that these facts disclosed a case of lenocinium: and it was maintained that what was proof of lenocinium was in each case a matter of circumstances. In this case the defender relied in particular on two facts:—(1) that the pursuer gave the defender a sum of money to enable her to carry out her purpose, and (2) that he encouraged her by the expression “Yes, certainly go.”

I think I should here leave the facts and consider the law in regard to lenocinium. I do not think that the difficulties of the question can be put in more appropriate language than is done by Lord Fraser in his treatise on the Law of Husband and Wife (p. 1186). The title under which it is dealt with is Connivance or Lenocinium, and the heading of the passage is,—“Not Connivance if the Husband watch his Wife, whom he suspects.” Lord Fraser says,—“The difficulty is to determine when a husband's conduct ceases to be suspicious and justifiable watchfulness and becomes acquiescence. The husband's suspicions may be aroused, but it is no connivance on his part though he do not disclose his suspicions to his wife. He is entitled to observe her and to track her proceedings, and it is not concurrence in her guilt because he does not tell her what he is doing, and favour her with admonitions. It is possible that a hint from him as to his suspicions might have saved her; but it is not connivance though he did not utter it. It is only where the husband goes beyond this, and gives facilities for the commission of the offence, and creates opportunities, that he is held to connive and to concur. His connivance then involves criminality, because that connivance occasioned or allowed the adultery to take place.” I think these words are a very accurate statement of our law, and that the difficulty arises in the application of the law to each particular state of facts. The same view is supported by the opinion of one who, though not a jurist, is considered an authority on this matter. I refer to the opinion of Sanchez, which is quoted by Lord Fraser on p. 1187 of his work, and is as follows:—“Sed an liceat eo fine offerre occasionem uxori ut adulteratur?” Which question he answers in the negative—“Quia id non solum est permittere sed cooperari et positive concurrere.”

Now, it seems to me that two things are clear. The one is that no Judge will do well by trying to frame a definition of what amounts to lenocinium, because each case really depends on its own facts, and it would be impossible to frame a definition which comprehended all cases. The other is, that there must be something on the husband's part of an active character. “Cooperari et positive concurrere,” says Sanchez, and I think that is an accurate description of our law.

Nov. 22, 1907. I am aware that in another portion of Lord Fraser's work he says that Thomson v. Thomson. "Passive acquiescence will be sufficient to bar the husband, provided it Ld. President. appears to be done with the intention and in the expectation that the wife would commit the crime" (p. 1186), and he quotes a passage from Lord Stowell's opinion in the case of *Walker*¹ to the same effect.

It has been pointed out by Lord President Inglis in *Wemyss*² that the English doctrine on this matter has not the same historical origin as the Scots doctrine, and one cannot therefore say that an English authority is to be cited as a Scots authority might be, although the two doctrines come very near one another in practical application. After all, the distinction comes to be nearly a question of words. If I may use an expression which seems like a contradiction in terms, I would say that there is a sort of passive acquiescence which is equivalent to active acquiescence. To explain, I may take an analogy from another branch of law which is very familiar to us. There are certain cases where, for instance, in the negotiations for a contract, there is a relation between two parties which puts on one of them a duty of disclosure to the other, and if he fails to discharge this duty, the contract will be set aside because of the silence of the party. There are other cases where there is no duty of disclosure. In these the contract cannot be set aside on the ground that the party did not speak. But in the colloquies between the parties there may be occasions when silence amounts to assertion or representation, and in such a case the contract may be set aside on account of this silent acquiescence. I cannot help thinking that the passive acquiescence of which Lord Fraser speaks would have to be of that character. It is not mere passive acquiescence, but acquiescence in such circumstances as to give it an active character. That there must be something done by the husband I cannot doubt.

Applying that exposition of lenocinium to the present case, I think the facts fall short of what is necessary to make out the defence. Here was a husband who did not know the facts, but strongly suspected that his wife had gone wrong. He hears of a project on her part in circumstances in which it is probable that she would commit adultery. I do not think he was bound to disclose his suspicions. I do not think he was barred from taking steps to observe the proceedings of his wife. I do not think so much stress can be laid on his use of the words "Yes, certainly go." We know what was in the wife's mind at the time. She put the question because she thought his answer would shew whether he knew what she intended to do. She took him to mean "Yes, certainly go to the place you say you are going to, viz., Stirling." That seems to me to fall far short of contriving the infidelity or the occasion for it. On the contrary, I believe that the matter was in dubio so far as the defender was concerned almost to the last moment.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to the right conclusion, and that decree must be granted.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that the plea of lenocinium cannot be supported, and therefore that the Lord Ordinary was right in giving decree of divorce.

¹ Walker v. Walker, 3 Hagg. Eccl. R. 59.

² 4 Macph. 660.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. I think the proof falls distinctly short of what Nov. 22, 1907. is necessary in law to support the plea of lenocinium.

Thomson v.
Thomson.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were sitting in the Extra Division when the case was argued.

Counsel for defender moved for expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and referred to the case of Hoey v. Hoey, June 6, 1884, 11 R. 905. Counsel for pursuer opposed the motion, and referred to the case of Montgomery v. Montgomery, Jan. 21, 1881, 8 R. 403.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have consulted with the Judges of the other Division in this matter in order to lay down a general rule in such cases.

When a wife has been unsuccessful in the Outer-House and then presents a reclaiming note, the question whether she is entitled to her expenses, being again unsuccessful, must depend on whether the case was a fair one to try. What I may call the prima facie view of the case is that the Lord Ordinary is right. And therefore it is for the wife to shew that the case is a fair one to try.

In this particular case we think that the question was one which it was fair to bring before this Court, and we therefore allow the claimer her expenses.

THE COURT adhered, and found the defender entitled to additional expenses since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—COWAN & STEWART, W.S.—
JOSEPH CHALMERS, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS MARGARET MACFARLANE OR GRANT AND OTHERS, Claimants	No. 31.
(Respondents).— Watt, K.C.—T. A. Menzies.
GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders	Nov. 22, 1907.
(Appellants).— Macmillan—Garson.

Grant v.
Glasgow and
South-
Western
Railway Co.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1, subsec. (1)—Accident arising out of and in course of employment—Onus of proof.—A station policeman in the employment of a railway company was run down by an engine on a siding at the station and died shortly afterwards of his injuries. His widow and children claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from the railway company. There was no evidence to shew how or why he came to be at the spot where he was injured, but he might legitimately have been there in the course of his duties as station policeman.

Held that the deceased being station policeman the presumption was that he had been injured by accident arising out of and in course of his employment, in the sense of sec. 1, subsec. (1), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that in the absence of evidence to the contrary this must be taken to be the fact.

THIS was an appeal by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway 2^d Division. Company in an arbitration brought in the Sheriff Court at Ayr Sheriff of under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in which Mrs Mar- Ayrshire. garet Macfarlane or Grant, the widow, and Isabella and Jeanie Grant, the daughters, of Thomas Steele Grant, doorkeeper or station police-

Nov. 22, 1907.

Grant v.
Glasgow and South-
Western
Railway Co.

man at the Ayr passenger station of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, claimed compensation from the Railway Company on account of the death of their husband and father.

The case for appeal set forth that the Sheriff-substitute (Shairp), found, inter alia, the following facts to be admitted or proved :—(2) That Thomas Steele Grant at the time of his death was between sixty and seventy years of age, and very deaf; “ (5) that his duties were to go to and from a bank in Ayr with cash-boxes, to dispatch these cash-boxes to different local railway stations of the said Railway Company, to attend in the guards’ room, keep stationery for passenger guards, write up these guards’ train arrival books, make out returns for them to be sent to the superintendent, and to keep unauthorised persons from being on, in, or about the said passenger railway station premises, and the entrances, exits, and platforms of said passenger railway station ”; (7) that in the execution of his duty of keeping unauthorised persons out of the Railway Company’s premises he was entitled to cross certain of the station sidings; (9) that about ten minutes before 10 A.M. on 3d July 1906, “ a railway vanman, in the employment of the said Railway Company, drove the said Thomas Steele Grant and a number of cash-boxes from said railway station to the Ayr branch of the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, which is situated in Sandgate Street, and there delivered the contents of the cash-boxes, and the ” vanman “ thereafter drove his van down High Street, while the deceased Thomas Steele Grant went up that street towards Ayr passenger railway station, and about fifteen or twenty minutes past ten o’clock in the morning of said last-mentioned day, was seen, shortly before he was injured, proceeding on foot in the direction of said passenger railway station along Kyle Street, which joins Smith Street, and that in Smith Street, near its junction with Kyle Street, there is a gate leading to a loading bank for horses and cattle, and said sidings . . . which gate should be locked except when something is being admitted or moved to or from said loading bank, but which gate was open at the time the said Thomas Steele Grant was injured; (10) that nobody saw the said Thomas Steele Grant pass through said gate on said morning, and there is no evidence to shew how or why he came to be at the spot on siding No. 6 where he was injured; and (11) that about 10.40 in the morning of the said 3d day of July 1906, Andrew Watt, one of the said Railway Company’s engine-drivers, felt that the tender of his engine, which was taking carriages from siding No. 6 to make up a train, had passed over something, and stopped his engine, when he discovered that the tender, which was in front of the engine, had passed over the said Thomas Steele Grant, whom he had not previously seen, and that the said Thomas Steele Grant, who was forthwith removed to Ayr County Hospital . . . died in said hospital on the same day from the injuries he had received.”

Upon these admitted or proved facts the Sheriff-substitute “ found that the said Thomas Steele Grant might, in the course of his duties as station policeman, have legitimately been at the spot at which he was accidentally injured, and that it had not been proved that he was there for any other purpose than the discharge of his said duties as station policeman . . . that, accordingly, the said personal injuries which the said Thomas Steele Grant received, and which resulted in his death, were caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a station policeman under the said Railway Company, and that his said employment was one to which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, applied." Nov. 22, 1907.

The question of law was (in addition to a question on which the appellants did not offer any argument):—" (2) Seeing that the spot where the said Thomas Steele Grant met with his injuries was one where he might legitimately and necessarily have been for the discharge of his duties as station policeman, but that it was not proved why he came to be at that spot at the time of the accident, or for what purpose he had gone there, was the arbiter entitled to presume and hold that the deceased was at that spot for the discharge of his duties as station policeman, and that, accordingly, the said personal injuries were caused to him by accident arising out of, and in the course of, his said employment as station policeman by the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company?"

Grant v.
Glasgow and South-
Western
Railway Co.

Argued for the appellants;—The onus was on the claimants to prove that the accident arose out of, and in the course of, the employment of the deceased. They did not discharge that onus by proving that he might have been at the place where the accident took place on business of his employers; it was necessary to prove positively that he went to the place on his employers' business and not on his own. The Sheriff-substitute's finding that the deceased "might have been" at the place where he met his death was the highest deduction that the facts stated justified, and it was not enough.¹

Argued for the respondents;—No doubt the initial onus was on the claimants to prove their case, but the onus might shift in the course of the proof, if facts were proved which raised a presumption in favour of the claimants. Here the natural and reasonable inference from the facts proved was that the deceased met his death when in the course of his employment.² The Railway Company were entitled to displace that inference by proving other facts of a contrary nature, but they had not done so.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The way in which this case is stated by the Sheriff as arbiter is rather embarrassing. The facts as disclosed in the statement of the Sheriff are that this man, in accordance with his duty, went out of the station to do a certain thing for his employers, to take, as I understand, money-boxes to the bank, and that he was returning undoubtedly to go back to his duty. In order to go back to his duty he had to go into the station, as it was there his duty was to be done. He might go back by the road round by the entrance to the hotel, or he might go back by the sidings. He might find the way by the sidings the more convenient of the two ways. He might also very well think that as it was part of his duty to prevent loiterers hanging about any part of the station premises, he would go over by the sidings and would take a look round as he came back. All these things are conjectural. All we have found in the case is that he chose to go back to the station by these sidings. There is no case made against him that he was guilty of wilful misconduct. I do not think that could be maintained. Of course there was more risk in crossing the sidings while there may have been shunting operations going on than there was in going

¹ Haley v. United Collieries, Limited, 1907, S. C. 214.

² Mitchell v. Glamorgan Coal Co., Limited, June 7, 1907, 23 T. L. R. 588; M'Nicholas v. Dawson & Son, L. R., [1899] 1 Q. B. 773, at p. 778.

Nov. 22, 1907. by the ordinary entrance to the station. But he was a railway servant and able to look after himself, although sometimes through inadvertence a railway servant meets with an accident, and sometimes a railway servant does not take sufficient care and is killed. But the question really is, Was the deceased when he was on that spot and killed in such a position that the accident which happened arose out of, and in the course of, his employment as a servant of the Railway Company? I should be prepared to affirm that statement, and would be prepared to make that really our answer to the question which is put to us by the Sheriff in a somewhat unfortunate form.

Grant v.
Glasgow and South-
Western
Railway Co.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

LORD LOW.—I have felt the question at issue to be attended with much difficulty, chiefly by reason of the way in which the case has been stated by the Sheriff-substitute, but in the end I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship.

No doubt a person claiming compensation under the Act must prove that the injury arose out of, and was sustained in the course of, the injured party's employment. But I agree with Mr Menzies that the onus may be shifted, especially when the claim is by a dependant of a workman who has been killed, and whose evidence is therefore not available. If in such a case facts are proved the natural and reasonable inference from which is that the accident happened while the deceased was engaged in his employment, I think that it falls upon the employer, if he disputes the claim, to prove that the contrary was the case.

Here the workman was station policeman at the railway station at Ayr. He had been in the town lodging certain money-boxes at a bank in the performance of his duty, and when last seen alive he was walking along Smith Street (which is near the station) towards the station. The inference is irresistible, that having fulfilled a special duty, he was returning to the station to resume his general duties. The next thing which is known is that he was found mortally injured upon a siding close to the station, having no doubt been knocked down by a train which was being shunted. It cannot be said that the place where he was found negatived the idea that he could have been in the course of his employment when the accident happened. On the contrary, I do not think that it can be disputed that the station siding was, so to speak, within his jurisdiction as station policeman.

Therefore, although the way in which the case is stated, and especially the form of the second question (which is the only one we have to dispose of) is very embarrassing, the main facts are plain enough, and therefore I think that the difficulty may be overcome by answering the question as proposed by your Lordship.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. I consider that the second question as put is unfortunately stated, and that the course to be taken ought to be as your Lordship suggests. The facts here apparently are quite simple, and I have some difficulty in seeing how the Sheriff-substitute could have any doubt as to certain portions of the case. This unfortunate man, now deceased, was what is known as a railway policeman.

But then he had some other duties, and one of them, as stated very distinctly in the case, was to go to a bank in Ayr from the station with cash-boxes and deposits. It is also stated that on the morning on which he was killed he had been attending a vanman to the bank, and after the cash-boxes were deposited the vanman went away to the stables with his horse, and this policeman in the discharge of his duties, having discharged one of them, went back to discharge another of them—namely, the duty of acting as policeman at Ayr Station. In doing so he was seen last in Kyle Street about 10.20, and at 10.40 unfortunately he was run over at a siding. I think it is perfectly evident from these facts, so much so that I may say it is proved, that in returning from his duty of depositing the cash-boxes and going back to his duty as a policeman at the station he took a route which led him across the said siding, and in doing so was run over in the way narrated in the case. Now, he had a right to be on the siding; and furthermore, we can readily imagine, as has been said by your Lordship in the chair, that one reason why he may very reasonably be supposed to have taken this route was that he could take a look round the sidings at the end of the passenger platform to see that no evil-disposed persons or mischievous boys were loitering about. That would be essentially in the discharge of his duty as a policeman; and accordingly I think it is proved, or, if not directly proved, it is a clear inference from the facts which have been held to be proved, that when this accident happened he was in the course of his employment as a station policeman. Now, the Sheriff-substitute has put in a clause in the second question which I do not think it was necessary or proper to put in when he says “that it was not proved why he came to be at that spot at the time of the accident, or for what purpose he had gone there.” In addition to what Lord Low has said in regard to the onus shifting, I think a very proper observation was made by Mr Menzies, that while in the general case it would be incumbent upon the claimant in an arbitration of this sort to prove why a deceased person was at a particular place, and to prove that the purpose he had gone there for was a purpose necessarily in the course of his employment, yet that in the case of a policeman the matter is really very different. Of course, every case must be taken upon its own facts. A railway policeman’s duties are to go anywhere about a station for the purpose of seeing whether there are evil-disposed or mischievous persons loitering about, ready either to pilfer articles from carriages or trucks, or damage the Company’s property; and it might be absolutely impossible in many cases for those claiming on the death of a railway policeman to tell what was in his mind in being at a particular place. He would keep that to himself. He might have been drawn anywhere about the station premises in the discharge of his duty, but nobody could tell after his death what was the particular purpose that took him there. I therefore think this case, which is the case of a policeman, cannot be decided on the same footing as an ordinary case would be, and that the same kind and amount of proof is therefore not required, provided the deceased was in a place where he had a right to be, and where it may be reasonably supposed that he would not have gone except in the discharge of his duties as a policeman. I therefore agree with the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

Nov. 22, 1907.

Grant v.
Glasgow and South-
Western
Railway Co.
Lord Ardwall.

Nov. 22, 1907. LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

Grant v.
Glasgow and South-
Western
Railway Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the two questions of law . . . by declaring that the accident arose out of, and in the course of, the deceased's employment with the appellants: Therefore affirm the award of the arbitrator: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

HUTTON & JACK, Solicitors—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 32. THE PARISH COUNCIL OF KINLOSS, First Parties.—C. A. Macpherson.
Nov. 22, 1907. RACHEL MORGAN AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—D. Anderson.
MARGARET MASON AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—D. Anderson.

Parish Council
of Kinloss v.
Morgan.

Charitable Trust—Poor—Bequest for "the poor of the parish."—Held that a bequest to the Parish Council of K. "for the benefit of the poor of the parish of K." was not limited in its application to the "legal poor," but might be applied for the benefit of poor persons who were not in receipt of parochial relief.

1ST DIVISION. THE Reverend John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar, of Seapark and Kinloss, in the parish of Kinloss, died on 11th November 1905, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. The fourth purpose of that deed was as follows:—"I leave and bequeath in the first place for the benefit of the poor of the parish of Kinloss the sum of Two thousand pounds; and in the second place for the benefit of the poor of the burgh of Forres the like sum of Two thousand pounds; declaring that the legacy to the poor of Kinloss parish shall be paid over by my trustees to the Parish Council of that parish to be administered by them for behoof of said poor, and that the legacy to the poor of the burgh of Forres shall be paid over by my trustees to the Town-council of Forres, to be administered by them for behoof of said poor."

Questions having arisen as to the class of poor persons entitled to the benefit of this bequest, a special case was presented to the Court on 14th May 1907, to which the Parish Council of Kinloss were the first parties; Rachel Morgan and others, inhabitants of the parish of Kinloss, were the second parties; and Margaret Mason and others, paupers on the roll of the said parish, were the third parties.

The special case set forth:—"The said deceased Reverend John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar was a clergyman of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. He was proprietor of Seapark and Kinloss in the parish of Kinloss, to which he succeeded on the death of his mother in 1899. On his succession to said estates and from that time until his death he resided permanently at Seapark. He took a great interest in the parish of Kinloss, and being of a charitable disposition he applied a large part of his means generously to the assistance of a great number of poor persons in the village of Findhorn and throughout the parish of Kinloss. This he did by periodical gifts of coal and other comforts, as well as by donations of money. In dispensing this charity, the deceased included as the objects of his bounty both poor persons in receipt of parish relief, who were on the roll of the parish poor, and poor persons, who were not paupers and did not come under the description of legal poor. . . . The second parties hereto are poor persons resident in the parish of Kinloss who came within the latter category, and, in the lifetime of the late Mr Dunbar Dunbar, though not paupers in receipt of parochial relief, they were in the habit of receiving from the deceased, especially at Christmas time, assistance, usually in the form of gifts of coal. They are parishioners of the parish of Kinloss and resident therein, and have accordingly an interest in the due management and administration of the charitable bequest and legacy above mentioned. The third parties hereto are on the roll of the parish poor, and during Mr Dunbar Dunbar's lifetime, both before and after the date they were placed on the paupers' roll, were in the habit of receiving from the deceased gifts of various kinds. They are accordingly interested in the management and administration of the fund in question."

The contentions of the first and second parties were stated to be as follows:—"The first parties maintain that the bequest being given for the benefit of the poor of the parish, subject to administration by them as the proper parochial authority, is a bequest exclusively for behoof of the legal poor persons entitled to parochial relief. The second parties, on the other hand, maintain that the terms defining the objects of the bequest are open to construction, and that on a sound construction of the clause in question in said trust-disposition and settlement, the intention of the testator was to benefit the occasional poor, or poor persons not in receipt of parochial relief, or at all events to include such within the class of persons entitled to participate in the benefits of the bequest."

The first question of law for the determination of the Court was as follows:—"Is the bequest for the benefit of the poor of the parish of Kinloss contained in said trust-disposition and settlement limited to the poor of said parish who are in receipt of parochial relief? or, are the first parties entitled to apply said bequest for the benefit of poor persons who are not in receipt of such relief?"

There was also a second question as to the method of administration if the bequest was limited to the legal poor, which, in the event, did not fall to be answered.

Argued for the first parties;—"Poor of the parish" presumably meant the legal poor, and that presumption was greatly strengthened where, as here, the bequest was entrusted to the body charged with the duty of administering legal relief in the parish, viz., the Parish Council.¹

Argued for the second and third parties;—"The words "poor of the parish" were not ruled by a presumption, but were always open to construction.² The meaning to be put on them here depended on the intention of the testator. This testator had been in the habit of relieving other poor persons than the legal poor, and also of giving extra relief to those already in receipt of parochial relief, and it might be assumed that he intended this bequest to be administered in the same way. To limit the application of his bequest to the legal relief of the legal poor would mean that his bequest would go, not for the "benefit" of the poor, but for the relief of the ratepayers. That could ¹ Liddle v. Kirk-Session of Bathgate, July 14, 1854, 16 D. 1075; Whyte v. Kirk-Session of Kinglassie, June 14, 1867, 5 Macph. 869; Flockhart v. Kirk-Session of Aberdour, Nov. 24, 1869, 8 Macph. 176; Paterson's Trustees v. Christie, Feb. 1, 1899, 1 F. 508; Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 52.

² Whyte v. Kirk-Session of Kinglassie, 5 Macph. 869, Lord Curriehill, at p. 880; Flockhart v. Kirk-Session of Aberdour, 8 Macph. 176, Lord Deas, at p. 182.

Nov. 22, 1907. Parish Council of Kinloss v. Morgan. not be assumed to be his intention. The fact that the Parish Council were chosen to administer this bequest did not lead to the presumption contended for by the first parties.¹ The testator wanted to benefit the poor of the parish in which he had lived, and the Parish Council, who administered the affairs of that district, were a very natural body to be chosen to administer this fund.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Rev. John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar, of Seapark and Kinloss, by a clause in his trust-disposition and settlement left a legacy in the following terms. He left “in the first place for the benefit of the poor of the parish of Kinloss the sum of Two thousand pounds; and in the second place for the benefit of the poor of the burgh of Forres the like sum of Two thousand pounds; declaring that the legacy to the poor of Kinloss parish shall be paid over by my trustees to the Parish Council of that parish to be administered by them for behoof of said poor.” The question raised before your Lordships by this special case is whether the Parish Council of Kinloss, who are entitled to this legacy of £2000, are bound to administer it for the “legal” poor alone, as that expression has been currently used—that is to say, are they bound to put this legacy into their coffers along with the rates, or are they entitled to administer it as a separate fund, and to apply the benefit of it to any such people as may be held to fall within the description of “poor” in the ordinary significance of that word.

Like all such matters it turns on the question of testamentary intention; and if it had not been for the complication of authority, I should have thought the matter was too clear for argument. The result of putting this legacy into the coffers of the Parish Council would be, not the relief of the poor, but the relief of the ratepayers of the parish. That such was the intention of the testator cannot for a moment be supposed. There is, however, a certain amount of authority on the interpretation of the word “poor,” but on consideration I have come to the conclusion that it does not stand in the way of giving to this bequest the effect which I believe the testator intended.

The decided cases all turned on what sums fell or did not fall to be dealt with under section 52 of the Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845.² Let me remind your Lordships of what that Act really did. It introduced for the first time into Scotland a thoroughly national system of poor-law administration, and it created powers for a universal assessment for relief of the poor, but it also enabled the new poor-law authorities, who were created by the Act, to make use of any existing funds that were devoted to the relief of the poor. Hence we have section 52, which transferred the existing funds to the new parochial boards. Now, the questions raised on that section were whether certain bequests fell or did not fall within the words of the section. It is to be observed that that section only applied to existing funds, and had no application to any subsequent bequest, and now that it is more than half a century old it is obvious that the questions that arise under such a destination in modern times are very different from those that fell to be decided under that section. There is this further observation to be made, that the question which is now before us could not have arisen in the old days prior to 1845. For in those days the distinction between able-bodied poor and others, with regard to the right of relief, had not been settled, and if you had used the phrase "legal poor" in these days it would not have been known what you meant. The kirk-session, who were then the only body in charge of the poor, relieved any necessitous person, and did not confine their relief to the legal poor in the modern sense. So that in those former days, when a testator left a bequest for such purposes, it would never occur to him that any distinction could be drawn as to the persons to be benefited according as he left the administration of the bequest to the then poor authority, viz., the kirk-session, or to others. He would believe that, however he destined it, it would be applied for the relief of necessitous persons in the same way. Consequently, if in these decisions the words have got a certain significance, that interpretation has been put on them in the light of what I have been saying, and it will not necessarily apply to a bequest made by a modern testator under totally different conditions of the poor-law.

¹ Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 30.

² 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83.

Nov. 22, 1907.
 Parish Council
 of Kinloss v.
 Morgan.
 Ld. President.

There are expressions, particularly in the opinion of Lord Rutherford, in the case of *Liddle*¹ that seem to go the length of laying down the law that the word "poor" means "legal poor" only. I do not think that that view of the law has been adopted in subsequent decisions, and I will only instance the dictum of Lord Deas in the case of Flockhart,² where he says,—"I do not call in question the principle of the cases of *Bathgate*¹ and Linlithgow,³ that the words 'for behoof of the poor' do not necessarily mean those who are called the 'legal poor'—that is to say, the poor who by law may claim relief; and that it is in every case a question of circumstances whether that construction is to be put on the words or not." I think that is a just statement of the law; and, therefore, as far as authority goes, I do not think it can be said that "poor of the parish" is limited to the "legal poor" only.

I also think that the implication that was sought to be drawn from the fact that the body chosen to administer the bequest was the Parish Council loses its force when we consider that the Parochial Board existed solely for the purpose of administering the poor-law, while the Parish Council has many other duties to perform. Where the body chosen existed only for the relief of the poor, the natural implication was that it was intended that the bequest should be administered in the same way as the only other funds in their hands. Here the selection of the Parish Council was no doubt occasioned by the fact that the testator wanted to benefit the people within two areas well known to himself, namely, the parish of Kinloss and the burgh of Forres, and therefore he selected the Parish Council of Kinloss and the Town-Council of Forres to be the administrators, as best defining the areas to be benefited.

I think, therefore, that he used the word "poor" in the sense in which

¹ 16 D. 1075.

² 8 Macph. 176, at p. 182.

³ Hardie v. Kirk-Session of Linlithgow, Nov. 15, 1855, 18 D. 37.

Nov. 22, 1907. it is used in ordinary language, and that the word must be held to cover any necessitous person. The second alternative of the first question will therefore fall to be answered in the affirmative.

Parish Council of Kinloss v. Morgan.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that the Parish Council, who put these questions to us, are in no way restricted as to the class of persons who may be put on the roll of beneficiaries, except in so far that they must be poor persons in the ordinary sense. In so deciding we are in no way enlarging the meaning of the word "poor." It is the Poor-Law Act and the decisions of the Court which, for the purposes of the administration of public funds, have put a limited meaning upon the word, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say, have divided the poor into two categories—those who from age or physical infirmity are unable to gain a livelihood by industry, and those who are able to work, but who are unable to find employment. The first of these classes is the object of the benefits of the poor-law, the second is not. But in the construction of Mr Dunbar's bequest we have nothing to do with this artificial distinction, because his bequest is to be applied for the benefit of the poor of the parish, a description of persons which includes able-bodied but necessitous poor as well as those who are poor and infirm. I have no doubt that it would be open to this Parish Council to give assistance to persons having a legal claim as an addition to the relief given from the rates as well as to others who have no claim upon the rates. I am of opinion that the second branch of the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD PEARSON concurred.

THE COURT answered the first alternative of the first question in the negative, and the second alternative in the affirmative.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—GRIEVE & SIMPSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 33. THOMAS LOGAN (Archibald Clark's Trustee), Pursuer (Appellant).—Morison, K.C.—J. Macdonald.

Nov. 22, 1907. PETER M'ROSTIE, Defender (Respondent).—Chree.

Clark's
Trustee v.
M'Rostie.

Trust—Powers of Trustees—Non-gratuitous Trustees—Trust for behoof of creditors—Right of surviving trustee to act—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84), sec. 1—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 1—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63), secs. 1 and 2.—Held that the powers conferred on gratuitous trustees by the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861, are extended to non-gratuitous trustees by the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884; and that, consequently, the survivor of two trustees, nominated in a trust-deed for behoof of creditors which contained no clause of survivorship, had a good title to pursue an action on behalf of the trust.

Royal Bank of Scotland, May 31, 1893, 20 R. 741, followed.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perth.

ON 18th May 1906 Archibald Clark, grazier, Perth, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, whereby he assigned and disposed "to and in favour of Thomas Logan and William Smyttan Davidson, Perth, as trustees for the purposes after mentioned, and to his assignees, All and Sundry, the whole estates, heritable and moveable" belonging or due and indebted to the granter. The deed contained no provision of survivorship in the event of the death of one of the trustees. The said William Smyttan Davidson died on 29th October 1906, while the trust was still subsisting. Nov. 22, 1907.

On 4th December 1906 an action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Perth by the said Thomas Logan, in which he designed himself as "trustee on the trust-estate of Archibald Clark, grazier, Perth, with the consent and concurrence of the said Archibald Clark." The action was directed against Peter M'Rostie, lately farmer at Findoglen, St Fillans. The sum sued for was £80, 14s., being the balance of an account for wintering sheep alleged to be due by the defender to Archibald Clark.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—No title to sue.

On 7th March 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym), holding that the trust was joint, sustained the plea of no title to sue and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (C. N. Johnston), and on 10th April 1907 the Sheriff affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.*

* "NOTE.—I reach with reluctance the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute upon the case at common law. The dicta in the case of Dawson v. Stirton, 2 Macph. 196, have been quoted for forty years as establishing the proposition that a nomination of trustees in a trust-deed for creditors is joint, and that the appointment falls when one of the trustees fails, and I think that these dicta are binding in the Sheriff Court. There is force in the pursuer's contention that if the powers to assume new trustees and act by a quorum contained in section 1 of the Trusts Act of 1861 be read into this trust-deed, this displaces the rule, because the rule being based upon presumed intention, the conferring of such powers may reasonably be held to shift the presumption as being indicative that it was not regarded as vital that the trust should be administered by both the two trustees named and by nobody else. I doubt, however, whether it is warrantable in the Sheriff Court to treat a well-established rule of law as displaced by such an implication. Further, it is doubtful whether section 1 of the Act of 1861 applies to such a trust as the present. The matter has been treated as an open one by more than one commentator. It seems to stand thus—the Act of 1867 deals with trusts generally, without specifying that its application is limited to trusts where the trustees act gratuitously. In the case of Mackenzie, 10 Macph. 749, it was held (apparently with some difficulty) that the Act is so limited owing to its relationship to the Act of 1861. The Act of 1884 defines trusts for the purposes of the Trusts Acts generally, and it makes the word 'trustee' to include certain officers who do not act gratuitously. It provides, further, that the Trust Acts, 1861 to 1884, are to be read as one Act. Now, in the case of the Royal Bank, 20 R. 741, it was held that this is sufficient to get rid of the inferential limitation to gratuitous trusts in the Act of 1867 when that Act speaks of trustees and trusts without qualification. But section 1 of the Act of 1861 deals specifically with 'trusts under which gratuitous trustees are nominated.' It is not clear that reading into the Act of 1861 the definition of a trust in the Act of 1884, it becomes necessary to read the words 'under which gratuitous trustees are nominated' out of the Act of 1861. The question is a narrow one which might be decided either way without obvious error.

"The present case stands thus—There is a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, the affirmance of which enables the pursuer to take the case to the Court of Session without the expense of further procedure, and does not deprive the interest which he represents of another remedy if he does not think fit to take that course. On the other hand, a reversal of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment infers (1) the disturbance of a hitherto recognised rule of law upon the strength of inferential deductions from statutory provisions not framed with any direct reference to that rule; (2) the decision in pur-

Nov. 22, 1907.

Clark's
Trustee v.
M'Rostie.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and besides an argument on the common law, submitted the following argument on the statutory provisions affecting the question of title:—The dictum in *Dawson v. Stirton*¹ that the appointment of joint trustees, in a deed for behoof of creditors with no survivorship clause, lapsed on the death of one of them, whether sound at common law or not, was at anyrate no longer law, having been displaced by the Trusts Acts.* The Trusts Act of 1861 provided for a right of survivorship in the case of gratuitous trustees, and the provisions in favour of gratuitous trustees therein contained were extended to non-gratuitous trustees by the Trusts Amendment Act of 1884. The case of *Mackenzie*² was decided prior to 1884, and turned only on the provisions of the Trusts Act of 1867. The case of the Royal Bank,³ which was suer's favour of what has hitherto been regarded as a narrow question of statutory construction as to the intended application of the Act of 1861; (3) the probability of further procedure and a proof in the Sheriff Court which may be rendered nugatory by a decision of the Court of Session that the pursuer has no title to sue.

"In these circumstances I conceive it to be my duty to affirm the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, not being clearly satisfied that the result at which he has arrived is erroneous in law."

* The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84), sec. 1, enacts:—"All trusts constituted by any deed or local Act of Parliament under which gratuitous trustees are nominated shall be held to include the following provisions, unless the contrary be expressed; that is to say . . . power to such trustee, if there be only one, or to the trustees so nominated, or a quorum of them, to assume new trustees; a provision that the majority of the trustees accepting and surviving shall be a quorum . . ."

The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), which proceeds on the preamble:—"Whereas by the Acts 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84, and 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 115, certain powers are conferred on gratuitous trustees in Scotland, and it is expedient that greater facilities should be given for the administration of trust-estates in Scotland, . . ." in sec. 1 enacts:—"In the construction of this Act, and of the said recited Acts, the words 'trusts and trust-deeds' shall be held to mean and include all trusts constituted by virtue of any deed or by private or local Act of Parliament; and the words 'gratuitous trustees' in the sense of this Act, and of the said recited Acts, shall mean and include all trustees who are not entitled as such to remuneration for their services, in addition to any benefit they may be entitled to under the trust, or who hold the office ex officio, and shall extend to and include all trustees whether original or assumed, who are entitled to receive any legacy, or annuity, or bequest under the trust. . . ."

The Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63), which in the preamble recites, inter alia, the Acts 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84, and 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97, enacts, sec. 1:—"This Act may be cited as the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, and the said Acts and this Act may be cited as the Trusts (Scotland) Acts, 1861 to 1884, and shall be read and construed together." Section 2:—"In the construction of the said recited Acts and of this Act 'Trust' shall mean and include any trust constituted by any deed or other writing or by private or local Act of Parliament, or by resolution of any Corporation or public or ecclesiastical body, and the appointment of any tutor, curator, or judicial factor by deed, decree, or otherwise. . . ."

¹ Dec. 4, 1863, 2 Macph. 196.

² May 28, 1872, 10 Macph. 749.

³ Royal Bank of Scotland, May 31, 1893, 20 R. 741.

directly applicable here, was decided after the passing of the 1884 Act, and in it the Court, applying that Act, arrived at a directly opposite decision on the same point that had been raised in the case of Mackenzie.¹ Nov. 22, 1907.
Clark's
Trustee v.
M'Rostie.

Argued for the respondent (on the statutes);—The case of *Mackenzie*¹ decided that the Act of 1867 applied only to gratuitous trustees. All that the subsequent case of the *Royal Bank*² decided was that where “trust” was used without qualification in the Act of 1867 it included, by virtue of the provisions of the 1884 Act a non-gratuitous trust. That Act and that decision, however, had done nothing to take away express qualifications of the word “trust,” and therefore had not interfered with the express limitation of the provisions of section 1 of the 1861 Act to gratuitous trusts. Consequently, this not being a gratuitous trust, the provisions of that section could not apply.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that this case is exceedingly clear on the statute, although there is a difficult point that might arise at common law which, however, we are not called on to decide. The facts are that a certain gentleman granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, in which he appointed two trustees, but there was no survivorship clause in the trust-deed. One of these trustees has died, and the other trustee, with the consent of the truster, now sues for a debt due to the truster. The plea taken by the defender is the plea of no title to sue, and that plea has been upheld by the Sheriff-substitute and affirmed, though with obvious hesitation and dislike, by the Sheriff, on the ground that where a trust for behoof of creditors is created in favour of joint trustees, and one of them dies, the trust thereupon falls. At common law that situation presents a very difficult question, but I think upon the statutes it is clear. By the Act of 1861 undoubtedly a title was given to a trustee in this position, but that Act was limited by the expression in the first section to those classes of trust-deeds under which gratuitous trustees were appointed. Then came the Act of 1867, and the Act of 1867 probably, in the eyes of its authors, was really meant to extend the scope of the beneficial legislation of 1861 to trusts of a wider class, but unfortunately there was a very slovenly definition clause which one cannot help thinking had not the effect which its authors wished. Among the clauses of the Act of 1867 was a certain clause 12, which provided that when any trustees cannot be assumed under any trust-deed application should be made to the Court. Now, shortly after that a case was brought in this Court—the case of *Mackenzie*¹—where application was made under that section in the case of a trust where the trustees were not gratuitous. The Court there held that although the word “trust” in section 12 was unqualified in that section, yet it was qualified when you took the two statutes of 1861 and 1867 together, and that consequently the application could not be granted. The plain meaning of that was this, that upon the true construction of section 12 of the Act of 1867 you really had to read “trust” as if it repeated the qualification of “trust” given in the Act of 1861—namely, not all trusts, but only trusts such as are constituted by virtue of any deed or local Act of Parliament under which gratuitous trustees are nominated. Then came the Act of 1884, and in the

¹ 10 Macph. 749.

² 20 R. 741.

Nov. 22, 1907. Act of 1884 there was a definition of "trust" in a much wider sense. There was a provision that all the Trusts Acts should be read together, and there was not repeated the bungle that had been committed in the Act of 1867. Accordingly, shortly after the Act of 1884, there came the case of the Royal Bank.¹ The Royal Bank case¹ exactly repeated the application which had been made in the Mackenzie case,² but with an entirely opposite result, because the Court in that case held that the Act of 1884 succeeded in enacting what the Act of 1867 did not; in other words, the Act of 1884 by means of its general definition read back the word "trust" in the general sense and took away the qualification of the Act of 1861. That seems to me to settle the matter, because if that qualification is read out, then we have the permissive provision of section 1 of the Act of 1861 applied, not to trusts qualified as they were qualified in that section by the words which I have read, but to trusts amplified by the larger definition of the Act of 1884. I am, therefore, for allowing the appeal and remitting the case to proceed upon the merits.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I think that the case of the *Royal Bank*¹ is directly in point.

LORD PEARSON.—I also concur.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute, dated 10th April and 7th March 1907, repelled the first plea in law for the defender, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed.

P. MORISON & SON, S.S.C.—DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 34.

MRS MARTHA GERTRUDE BREEZE OR MACKENZIE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Watt, K.C.—Spens.

Nov. 23, 1907.

CLUNY HILL HYDROPATHIC COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Ure—C. D. Murray.

Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Liability of master for wrongful act of servant—Wrongous Detention—Issue.—A lady, who had been a guest at a hydropathic establishment, brought an action of damages against the proprietors of the Hydropathic, in which she averred that when she was at the Hydropathic she went, at the request of the defenders' manager, to his private room; that she there found a Mr and Mrs R., who were fellow guests; that Mrs R. had conceived an ill-will against the pursuer, and that the defenders' manager knew this; that Mr and Mrs R. placed themselves against the door to prevent the pursuer from leaving the room; that the manager said that he would not allow the pursuer to leave the room until she apologised to Mrs R. for slamming a door in her face—"a thing the pursuer had never done"—and that the manager aided and abetted Mr and Mrs R. in preventing the pursuer from leaving the room for about fifteen minutes.

The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant in respect that the pursuer's averments shewed that the manager was not, on the occasion in question, acting within the scope of his employment.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Salvesen) that the pursuer's averments were relevant.

Form of issue allowed.

¹ 20 R. 741.

¹ 10 Macph. 749.

In October 1906 Mrs Martha Gertrude Mackenzie, residing at 25 Montpelier Park, Edinburgh, brought an action against the Cluny Hill Hydropathic Company, Limited, Forres, concluding for decree for £400 as damages. Nov. 23, 1907.
Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond 2) “ On or about 19th August 1906 the pursuer was residing at the defenders’ hydropathic, Forres, owned by the defenders, who are a limited company. The manager thereof at said date was Thomas M’Nair, who was entrusted by the defenders with the management of the hydropathic and the supervision of the comfort of the guests in the defenders’ hydropathic.” (Cond. 3) “ Late in the evening of the date in question the defenders’ said manager went to the recreation-room, where pursuer was, and requested her presence in his private room, saying that a lady, who was ill, wished to see her, and in accordance with the said request the pursuer went to the said private room. The pursuer went to the said room by request of the said Thomas M’Nair, believing as was the fact, that in making the said request he was acting as the defenders’ manager.” (Cond. 4) “ When the pursuer arrived in the said private room she found there a Mr and Mrs Robertson, of 2 Lilybank Gardens, Hillhead, Glasgow, who were her fellow guests in the hydropathic. The said Mrs Robertson had, for some reason or another unknown to the pursuer, conceived an ill-will against her. There were also present Mrs M’Nair, wife of the said Thomas M’Nair, and the said Thomas M’Nair. The pursuer was detained for a considerable period against her will in the said private room, and an assault was committed upon her by the said Alexander Robertson. The said Alexander Robertson also slandered her by calling her a low woman, and alleging she had previously caused disturbances ‘ here.’ The pursuer endeavoured to leave the manager’s room. She put her hand on the handle of the door and the said Alexander Robertson then stepped between her and the door, and struck her hand from the handle. Mr and Mrs Robertson then both placed themselves against the door to keep it shut. The pursuer then pointed out to the defenders’ manager that she was being forcibly detained in the said room, and asked him to see that she was allowed to leave, but this the said manager refused to do. The said manager, for some fifteen minutes, then aided and abetted the Robertsons in preventing the pursuer from leaving the said room in manner aforesaid. The said manager neither ordered nor even requested the Robertsons to let the pursuer out nor did he ring the bell or take any other steps open to him to have the pursuer’s detention ended. Had the defenders’ manager requested the Robertsons to allow the pursuer to leave the room, the pursuer believes and avers they would have done so. Had the manager summoned assistance by ringing the bell, or in any other way, assistance would have been forthcoming, and the pursuer’s detention ended. Although the pursuer was anxious to leave the said room, and so expressed herself to the defenders’ manager, she was nevertheless detained and prevented from leaving the said room for a considerable period (about fifteen minutes) by the said manager, who said he would not allow her to leave the room till she apologised to Mrs Robertson for slamming a door in her face—a thing she, the pursuer, had never done.” (Cond. 5) “ In asking pursuer to go to his private room, and in detaining her there against her will as aforesaid, the defenders’ manager was acting within the scope of his employment and in the supposed furtherance of the defenders’

Nov. 28, 1907.
Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

interests. He had no right, in the circumstances, to induce the pursuer to go to his room when he knew, as he did, that the Robertsons had an ill-will towards her, and that she would be unprotected, and he was bound to have at once seen that she, the defenders' guest, was allowed to leave the room when she wished to. He failed in his duty, and along with Robertson and his wife, detained her in the said room for a considerable period. Such detention was illegal and improper, and the defenders are liable therefor to the pursuer for the loss, injury, and damage occasioned thereby." (Cond. 6) "Through the illegal actings of the defenders' servant as above condescended on, the pursuer was illegally detained for a considerable period in the defenders' room, and thereafter subjected to assault and slander by the illegal and improper actings of the defenders' said manager in inviting her into the said private room, and thereafter allowing her to be detained there against her will. By the said detention the pursuer suffered in her feelings and health, and was subjected to great indignity, and the matter soon became known in the establishment."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the wrongous and illegal actings of the defenders' servant as condescended on, decree should be granted as craved. (2) The defenders' servant, acting within the scope of his authority from the defenders, having wrongously induced the pursuer to enter his private room, and thereafter having wrongfully detained the pursuer there as condescended on, decree should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

The pursuer proposed the following issue for the trial of the cause :—"Whether, on or about 19th August 1906, the defenders' manager, Thomas M'Nair, acting within the scope of his employment by the defenders, induced the pursuer to enter his private room in the defenders' hydropathic aforesaid, and wrongously detained or allowed her to be detained there, to her loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £400."

The pursuer also raised an action of damages for assault and slander against Mr and Mrs Robertson, and had obtained an award of damages before the reclaiming note in the present action came on for hearing.

On 10th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Finds that the allegations of the pursuer are not relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—The pursuer of this action avers that on 19th August 1906 she was a guest in the hydropathic belonging to the defenders, that on the evening of that day she was summoned by the manager to his private room, and that when she arrived there she was slandered and assaulted by two fellow guests—Mr and Mrs Robertson. She has already raised an action against these persons, in which issues have been adjusted—there being no question of the relevancy of her averments as against them. She maintains, however, that she has a separate ground of action against the present defenders on the ground that their manager detained her in the room against her will for a considerable period (about fifteen minutes). She avers that in doing so he was acting within the scope of his employment and in the supposed furtherance of the defenders' interests.

"The injury which the defenders' manager is said to have done to the

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) There was here a relevant averment of an actionable wrong committed by the defenders' manager upon the pursuer. For the manager of a hydropathic to detain a guest at the establishment in his private room because she would not apologise to a fellow guest was, in itself, plainly an actionable wrong. It might be that the pursuer here did not aver that the manager did anything positive in the way of detention, but he was the manager of the defenders' hydropathic, and it could not be doubted, that with the means which, as manager, he had at his disposal, he could at once have put an end to the scene had he chosen, instead of which he allowed the Robertsons to bar the door against the pursuer for fifteen minutes, which was just the same thing as if the manager had done it himself. (2) In so acting the manager was acting within the course of his employment, and consequently the defenders were liable. Although the particular act might not be authorised, still if the act was done in the course of employment which was authorised,

Nov. 23, 1907.
Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

pursuer is so small as to be almost microscopic. It is not said even in the amended record that he laid hands upon her or that he in any way actively contributed to her detention in the room. This is part of her grievance against Mr Robertson, who is said to have stood against the door and prevented her from opening it. The complaint against the manager seems rather to be that he did not intervene to protect her against the Robertsons by ringing the bell or otherwise summoning assistance, or by requesting the Robertsons to permit her to leave. It is not suggested that he could thereby have prevented the alleged assault, but only that he might possibly have shortened her detention in the room by some minutes. Even against the manager, therefore, it does not appear to me that it would be possible to construct a relevant case. It follows that if there can be no action against the servant because of his non-intervention in the quarrel between the pursuer and the Robertsons there can be no possible claim against his employers.

"There is, however, another and separate ground on which I think that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied. It was decided in the case of Poulton, L. R., 2 Q. B. 534, that the scope of a servant's authority is always limited to such acts as the employers could lawfully do themselves. For a mistake or excess in committing such an act by a servant his employer may well be held responsible, but not for an act which the employers cannot be supposed to have authorised, because they had no authority to do it themselves. I assume that it is part of the duty of a manager of a hydropathic to attend to the comfort of the guests as the pursuer avers, but it would be odd if I were required to hold that this impliedly authorised him to be a party to the detention of one guest in order to gratify the ill-will of another. The pursuer was unable to cite any authority for such a novel proposition. The only case referred to was that of Bryce v. The Glasgow Tramway Company, 6 S. L. T. 49. It has, in my opinion, absolutely no application. The act which the servant in that case was alleged to have done in a careless and reckless manner was an act which it was his duty towards his employers and in their interests to do, and accordingly the action was well directed against his employers.

"I shall accordingly assoilzie the defenders, and I have the less hesitation in doing so as it appears to me to be plainly in the interests of the pursuer that she should not be embarrassed with a second action for damages arising out of the self-same species facti as have already been remitted for trial by a jury. If she succeeds in that case she will recover full compensation for all injury that she has suffered; if she fails it is scarcely conceivable that she could recover against the present defenders."

Nov. 23, 1907.
Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

the master was liable.¹ The case of *Poulton*² did not support the broad general proposition for which the Lord Ordinary cited it; if it did it was wrongly decided. To hold, as the Lord Ordinary had held, that "the scope of a servant's authority is always limited to such acts as the employers could lawfully do themselves," would put an end to all actions of damages ex delicto against an employer on account of the acts of his servant, for an employer could never lawfully do an illegal act. In the present instance it was undoubtedly within the scope of the manager's authority to promote peace and harmony among the guests, and to endeavour to settle any disputes that might arise among them, and if the means he used to that end were illegal and wrongful, he was still acting within the scope of his authority although he was doing it badly. (3) The principle de minimis non curat praetor did not apply to actions of damages ex delicto. Besides, here the indignity of which the pursuer complained was not trifling.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) There was not here any relevant averment of an actionable wrong committed by the defenders' manager. It was not said that he had actually done anything in the way of detaining the pursuer; all that was said was that he had allowed the Robertsons to detain her. The pursuer's proposed issue shewed that she was conscious of this difficulty, for she proposed to put in issue whether the defenders' manager "wrongously detained or allowed her to be detained." If an issue was allowed, the words "or allowed . . . to be detained" ought to be deleted. These words either meant the same thing as "detained," in which case they were superfluous, or, if they meant something different, they were too vague. The issue was also objectionable in putting substantively whether the manager "induced" the pursuer; that per se certainly was not a ground of action. (2) Further, the pursuer had not relevantly averred that the defenders' manager in what he did was acting within the scope of his employment. Where an action was laid upon a contract entered into by a servant on behalf of his employer, the employer was prima facie liable—he took the risk of the servant exceeding his authority; but where the action was founded on a wrong committed by the servant the presumption was the other way. In such a case the pursuer must aver facts from which it could be inferred that the servant was acting in the course of his employment and for his employer's benefit.³ Here the pursuer's condescendence shewed the very opposite. She stated that Mrs Robertson had conceived a feeling of ill-will towards the pursuer; that the manager knew this; and that he intervened on Mrs Robertson's behalf in order to oblige the pursuer

¹ Citizens' Life Assurance Co. v. Brown, L. R., [1904] A. C. 423, per Lord Lindley, at pp. 427-8; Wood v. North British Railway Co., Feb. 14, 1899, 1 F. 562; Ellis v. National Free Labour Association, May 12, 1905, 7 F. 629; Maxwell v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 5, 1898, 25 R. 550; Bryce v. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., June 14, 1898, 6 S. L. T. 49; Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co., 1862, 1 H. & C. 526; Dyer v. Munday, L. R., [1895] 1 Q. B. 742; Ward v. General Omnibus Co., 1873, 42 L. J., C. P. 265.

² Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 1867, L. R., 2 Q. B. 534.

³ Wardrope v. Duke of Hamilton, June 24, 1876, 3 R. 876; Lundie v. MacBrayne, July 20, 1894, 21 R. 1085; Gillespie v. Hunter, May 28, 1898, 25 R. 916; Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co., 1 H. & C. 526; Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Co., L. R., 2 Q. B. 534.

to apologise to Mrs Robertson. In so acting the manager was not acting within the scope of his employment with the defenders. At all events, the pursuer could not have it both ways. Either the manager was acting in concert with the Robertsons, in order to give them an opportunity of gratifying their alleged feelings of ill-will, in which case the manager was not acting within the scope of his employment with the defenders, for it certainly was not part of his duties to give one guest an opportunity of gratifying feelings of ill-will towards another guest; or the manager preserved an entirely neutral attitude throughout the incident, in which case he neither detained nor allowed the pursuer to be detained. (3) The whole affair was trifling and the action ought to be dismissed on the principle de minimis non curat praetor. The pursuer had already obtained damages from the Robertsons, and she was not entitled to split up what was only one incident so as to make it the subject of different actions.¹

Nov. 23, 1907.
Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I cannot see any ground for treating this case as one which ought to be disposed of without the facts being first ascertained. Such cases necessarily depend very much on the particular facts, and if this record does not present such features as make it necessary to assume that the manager of the hydropathic establishment was not acting in the course of his employment, then I think it must be allowed to go to trial.

I do not think a case of this kind can be dealt with on any application of the de minimis principle, at least until the whole facts are found. It is on the facts alone that the question of de minimis can arise.

We had a suggestion from the Solicitor-General that the manager could not be acting in the course of his employment because the pursuer says that he induced her to go to his room because a fellow-guest had conceived an ill-will towards her and he knew it, and that therefore he was acting not as manager but in the private interests of the other guest. That, of course, is a statement which they will be entitled to prove. But the case is of this kind, that this lady says that she went willingly to the manager's room and was detained there against her will for an appreciable time. The manager certainly got her to go there while acting in the course of his employment, and I do not see any ground for saying that on the statements made on this record he must have ceased so to act before she was detained. I must say that I think the statement quoted to us from the opinion of Lord Lindley in the case of the *Citizens' Life Assurance Company v. Brown*² is applicable to this case. "The law upon this subject cannot be better stated than it was by the acting Chief Justice in this case. He said: 'Although the particular act which gives the cause of action may not be authorised, still if the act is done in the course of employment which is authorised, then the master is liable for the act of his servant.'" I can have no doubt that the manager of a hydropathic establishment is authorised to interfere in the way referred to in this case when there is a quarrel between guests, and to bring them together to have the matter put right. If in the course of so doing he commits an actionable wrong, I have

¹ Ferguson v. Colquhoun, July 19, 1862, 24 D. 1428; Hassan v. Pater-son, June 26, 1885, 12 R. 1164.

² L. R., [1904] A. C. 423, at pp. 427-8.

Nov. 28, 1907. no doubt the master is liable. I propose to your Lordships that we allow an issue.

Mackenzie v.
Cluny Hill
Hydropathic
Co., Limited.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—It is only because we are reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary that I add anything to what has been already said by your Lordship. The main question at this stage of the case is whether there are relevant averments of an actionable wrong for which the manager's principal, i.e., the Hydropathic Company, may be liable. I think it must be admitted that the wrong, if wrong there was, was a very small one, for the averments of the pursuer at most amount to this, that the manager persuaded the pursuer to enter his private room, and detained her there against her will for some fifteen minutes.

I think, however, that these averments are relevant, and that the case must go to a jury. I am accordingly in favour of allowing an issue, although I hope that parties may yet see their way to settling this insignificant dispute. I think it unnecessary to attempt to improve on the statement of the law applicable to such cases which has already been made by many eminent Judges. I am content to take the statement quoted by your Lordship from the opinion of Lord Lindley in the Citizens' Life Assurance Company v. Brown.¹ Applying that law, I think the facts must be ascertained, unless it clearly appears from the pursuer's own averments that the servant was not acting in the course of his employment.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. We are asked to throw out this action upon three grounds: (First) that there are no relevant averments of an actionable wrong; (second) that upon the averments it is evident that the manager was not acting within the scope of his employment or in the course of his duty; and (third) that in any event the whole affair was trifling and the damage suffered negligible. In regard to the first of these grounds I have no doubt that a wrong, and in my view not a trifling wrong, has been averred. It is averred that the manager detained this lady in his room for fifteen minutes after the assault had been committed, and refused to let her go until she made an apology. If that be true it was an outrage, and a relevant case has been stated.

As to the second ground I have nothing to add to what has been said by your Lordship. It cannot be doubted that the manager, at first at all events, intervened in his capacity as manager, and there must be inquiry to find out whether in his subsequent actings he abandoned that capacity and acted as a private individual. As to the third ground, if an actionable wrong was committed, it does not matter that prima facie the pursuer sustained but little injury, she is, at anyrate, entitled to ask a jury to assess the damage.

LORD ARDWALL.—I regret that I feel bound to concur with the opinion your Lordships have expressed that this case must be sent to a jury. I cannot accept without considerable qualification the law laid down by the Lord Ordinary, and although the case is a narrow one, I am not prepared to say that it is irrelevant. While there is much force in Mr Murray's con- Nov. 28, 1907.

¹ L. R., [1904] A. C. 423.

 tentation that the whole affair was really one incident, which a jury have Mackenzie v.
 already considered, and for which they have already awarded the pursuer a Cluny Hill certain sum of damages, still, if the averments are carefully scrutinised, it Co., Limited.
 is apparent that two separate wrongs are complained of: (Firstly) slander Lord Ardlwall.
 and assault by Robertson (the case already considered by a jury); (secondly) illegal detention by the manager (the case in which an issue is now asked).
 It cannot, therefore, be maintained that the pursuer is not entitled in law, if not in equity, to bring a second and separate action. I express no opinion as to the nature of the injury she sustained; that is a question for the jury.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and allowed an issue in the following terms as amended, viz.:—
 “Whether, on or about 19th August 1906, the defenders’ manager, Thomas N’Nair, acting within the scope of his employment by the defenders, having induced the pursuer to enter his private room in the defenders’ hydropathic establishment, wrongously detained her there,—to her loss, injury, and damage?

“Damages laid at £400.”

BRYSON & GRANT, S.S.O.—ROBERT STEWART, S.S.O.—Agents.

GEORGE EADIE AND OTHERS, Petitioners (Respondents).—Dickson, K.C. No. 35.
 —Hon. W. Watson.

THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM BILSLAND AND OTHERS (Magistrates, &c. of Nov. 21, 1907.
 Glasgow), Respondents (Reclaimers).—Hunter, K.C.—Macmillan. Eadie v.
 JAMES AITCHISON JOHNSTON AND OTHERS, Minuters.— Glasgow
 Corporation.
Hon. H. D. Gordon.

*Burgh—Burgh Accounts—Objections to accounts—Time for lodging objections—Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act 1822 (3 Geo. IV. cap. 91), secs. 1, 3 and 10—Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 76), sec.
 32—Glasgow Municipal Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxiii.), sec. 10.—
 The Royal Burghs Act, 1822, sec. 1, enacts that accounts relating to the Common Good and revenues of royal burghs shall be made up annually to the day preceding the date of the annual election of magistrates, i.e., in November.*

Sec. 3, enacts that every such annual account shall be deposited with the Town-clerk within three months after the annual election of magistrates, and that the account shall remain, for thirty days, open to the inspection of burgesses who may state objections within that period or within two months thereafter.

The Royal Burghs Act, 1833, sec. 32, enacts that the magistrates and councils of royal burghs shall on or before 15th October make up the annual account down to that date, and that the account shall be kept open to the inspection of any of the registered electors from 15th October till the election of the council.

These Acts, though repealed generally by the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, still remain in force, as regards the sections above referred to, in Glasgow, in virtue of a resolution by the Corporation under section 109 of that Act.

The Glasgow Municipal Act, 1879, alters the date for making up the accounts for Glasgow from 15th October to 31st May.

Nov. 21, 1907. On 7th May 1907, within the time allowed for objections by the Royal Burghs Act of 1822, certain burgesses of Glasgow, by a letter addressed to the Town-clerk, objected to an item charged in the Common Good account for the year ending 31st May 1906, and on 7th June 1907 presented a petition and complaint praying the Court to disallow the charge.

Eadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

The Corporation of Glasgow, besides answers on the merits, maintained that the objections were too late, contending that the alterations made on the date for lodging the annual account involved a corresponding change in the date for objecting to the account.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Johnston) that the statutory provisions in the Act of 1822 as to lodging objections to the annual account were not affected by the alteration of the date for making up and lodging the account.

Process—Citation—Corporation—Citation of Corporation by citing its members—Disclaimer of defence by certain members.—A corporation was cited by calling its members by name, as representing the corporation but not as individuals. The majority of the corporation resolve to defend the action. Held that they were entitled to lodge defences in name of the whole members as representing the corporation, and that dissenting members were not entitled to disclaim the defences.

1st Division.
Exchequer
Cause.
Ld. Johnston.

ON 7th June 1907 George Eadie and two others, all burgesses of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow, presented to the Court a petition and complaint in terms of the Acts 3 Geo. IV. cap. 91, and 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 56, and relative Acts of Sederunt, in which they objected to an item entered in the accounts of the city and burgh of Glasgow for the year ending 31st May 1906. They prayed that the petition should be served upon "the Right Honourable William Bilsland, residing at 28 Park Circus, Glasgow, Lord Provost; Peter Gordon Stewart, brush manufacturer, 518 Victoria Road, Glasgow," and thirteen others, all therein named and designed, "all magistrates; and Robert Harvie, baker, 145 Greenhead Street, Glasgow," and sixty-four others, all therein named and designed, "all members of the Town-Council of Glasgow, being the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and members of the Town-Council of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow."

The petitioners set forth that the last annual election of the Magistrates of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow took place on 9th November 1906, and that the last stated annual account of the Common Good and revenues of the said city and royal burgh was an account for the year from 1st June 1905 to 31st May 1906. That in the balance-sheet stated in said account there was entered the following item:—"Taxation of land values (suspense account), including £1142, 9s. 6d. spent during the year, £2457, 2s. 1d." That they objected to this item; and on 7th May 1907, by letter addressed to the Town-clerk, they stated objections in writing, including, inter alia, the following:—"We object to the item of £2457, 2s. 1d. appearing at page 16 of the Common Good accounts for year ending May 31, 1906, under the heading of 'Taxation of Land Values,' on the ground that the sum has been illegally spent in promoting a public Parliamentary Bill for the whole country, called the 'Taxation of Land Values Bill,' notwithstanding the instructions of the Town-clerk, Sir James Marwick, that such expenditure would be illegal. We also call for the production of the vouchers vouching the above entry, and give notice that we intend to bring the above illegal expenditure and failure to comply with said Act, by way of complaint before the said Court." They further stated that no vouchers had been produced for their inspection, and that accordingly they objected to the said item, except in so far as it might be duly vouched to represent expenditure in petitioning Parliament in favour of the bill or in asking Members of Parliament to support the bill; and they craved the Court "to disallow the said item of £2457, 2s. 1d. as a charge against the Common Good or revenues of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow, or so much of said item as may be found in the course of the proceedings to follow hereon not to be chargeable against the said Common Good or revenues, and to ordain the said account to be rectified accordingly."

Nov. 21, 1907.
Eadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

The making up of the annual accounts of the royal burgh of Glasgow, and the stating of objections thereto by the burgesses, are regulated by the following statutes. The Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1822 * ("Sir William Rae's Act") provides by section 1 that an account of the Common Good and revenues of every royal burgh shall be made up to "the day preceding the general annual election of magistrates in each burgh"; and, by section 3, that it shall be deposited within three months thereafter for inspection by the burgesses, and that objections may be stated thereto by any burghess within a fixed period (amounting in cumulo to five months and thirty days) from the date of that election.

The Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1833 † ("The Burgh Reform

* The Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1822 (3 Geo. IV. cap. 91), enacts:—
Sec. 1. "From and after the passing of this Act, a particular account of the Common Good and revenues of every royal burgh of Scotland, made up to the day preceding the general annual election of magistrates in each burgh, shall be annually stated and deposited in the manner directed by this Act, which account shall be so made out as to exhibit a complete state, showing the Common Good of each burgh classed under different heads. . . ."

Sec. 3. "And be it enacted that every such annual account shall be deposited in the office of the town-clerk of the burgh to which it appertains within three months after the annual election of the magistrates thereof; and such account shall remain there for thirty days after the expiration of the said three months open to the inspection of the burgesses, who may state objections thereto in writing, either during that time or within two months after the expiration of the said thirty days, and be entitled to call in writing for the production of any particular vouchers, and if upon such objections being made the party or parties making the same shall not be satisfied with the explanations which may or shall be thereupon given, it shall and may be lawful for any three or more burgesses of such burgh, within three calendar months after the expiration of the said thirty days to make complaint in writing to the barons of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, who shall proceed to determine the same in a summary manner, and to make and establish such rules and regulations, as to the said barons shall seem meet, for hearing and determining all matters that may come before them upon such complaints; provided always that no objections shall be stated in any such complaint that had not been previously during the time above mentioned stated in writing to the accounts, unless upon sufficient cause shewn, to the satisfaction of the said barons, why such objection was not then stated."

Sec. 10. " . . . In the event of no complaint being made to any annual account within the time herein limited, it shall not be competent thereafter to complain to such Court in regard to such account."

† The Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 76), enacts:—Sec. 32. "And be it enacted that the existing magistrates and council in all royal burghs shall, on or before the fifteenth day of October, in the present and in all future years, make up a distinct state of their affairs subscribed by the chief or senior magistrate, town-clerk, and treasurer, containing an account of all the funds, properties, and revenues in their admini-

Nov. 21, 1907. Act") provides, in section 32, for the accounts of all royal burghs being made up on or before the 15th day of October in each year, and deposited for inspection by the electors on that day.

Eadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

The Glasgow Municipal Act, 1879,* provides in sec. 10 that the annual accounts of the burgh of Glasgow may be made up as at the 31st of May in each year, "and no other annual state of affairs or account than that hereby authorised shall be required to be made up." Neither of the Acts last referred to contained any provisions with regard to the stating of objections to the accounts.

The Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. 49), repealed the Acts of 1822 and 1833 above referred to, and enacted a uniform system of keeping, exhibiting, and auditing the annual accounts of burghs in Scotland, but it contained a provision enabling certain of the larger burghs, of which Glasgow was one, by resolution to determine that the provisions of the repealed Acts with regard to the annual accounts should continue to apply to these burghs in lieu of the new provisions introduced by the Act of 1900. The burgh of Glasgow exercised that option, and resolved that the provisions of the said Acts of 1822 and 1833 should apply to Glasgow in lieu of the provisions of the Act of 1900.

Answers were lodged to the petition on behalf of all the persons called as respondents, "all members of the Town-Council of Glasgow, being the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and members of the Town-Council" of Glasgow. The answers, besides stating defences on the merits, contained this statement:—"The present answers have been lodged on behalf of the members of the Town-Council of Glasgow in their official and representative capacity with a view to having the general question raised by the petitioners judicially determined, in terms of a remit made at the meeting of the said Town-Council on 19th June 1907 to the Town-clerk and the City Finance Committee, empowering them to lodge answers to the present petition and complaint. It is explained, however, that at the said meeting five of the members of the Town-Council called as respondents hereto intimated that so far as they were personally concerned they did not authorise the lodging of answers on their behalf, while a number of the members of the Town-Council called as respondents were not stration, and of all their transactions in relation to such funds, properties, and revenues, since they came into office, which account shall be brought down as nearly as may be to the said fifteenth day of October, and shall be kept in the town-clerk's or treasurer's office, for the inspection of any of the registered electors, from the said fifteenth day of October down till the time of the election; and a full and distinct abstract of the said account, with a balance-sheet containing all necessary particulars, shall be printed and published by the said magistrates on or before the twentieth day of the said month of October."

* The Glasgow Municipal Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxiii.), enacts:—Sec. 10. "The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council may cause the state of affairs which they are required to make up annually on or before the fifteenth day of October in each year, by section 32 of the Act third and fourth William the Fourth, chapter 76, to be made up as at the thirty-first day of May in each year, with the annual accounts or statements of the various other trusts under their administration, and the said thirty-first day of May shall be substituted for the said fifteenth day of October; and no other annual state of affairs or account than that hereby authorised shall be required to be made up by them."

members thereof when the whole or part of the expenditure complained of was incurred or authorised, or do not admit that they concurred in sanctioning the same, and, accordingly, disclaim personal responsibility therefor.”

Nov. 21, 1907.
Eadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

A minute was subsequently lodged in process on behalf of James Hunter and nineteen others, all respondents in the action, which stated that “they gave no instructions or authority for appearance being entered or for answers being lodged in their names in this petition and complaint, and they therefore disclaimed, and hereby disclaim, the entering appearance for them and the said answers so far as they are concerned.”

On 19th July 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustains the minute of disclaimer for James Hunter and others, No. 27 of process: Finds the remaining compearing respondents liable in expenses to the said James Hunter and others: Modifies the same at £3, 3s., for which sum decerns against the said remaining respondents: Having heard counsel for the petitioners and complainers, and for the said remaining respondents, on the preliminary objection for the latter, that the petition and complaint has not been timeously brought, and considered the cause, repels the said objection: Appoints the said remaining respondents to produce in process, at or prior to the first box-day in the ensuing vacation, a detailed account, with relative vouchers, of the item on page 16 of their abstract of accounts, No. 23 of process, which is the subject of objection and complaint: Grants leave to reclaim.”*

* “OPINION.—(After narrating the objects of the petition)—The Corporation, or rather those members who appear to defend, for a large number have disclaimed the defence, state the preliminary plea that the objection was not timeously taken, and that it is now, by virtue of section 10 of Sir William Rae’s Act of 1822, incompetent to complain to the Court in regard to any entry in the account for the year ending 31st May 1906. . . .

“I think that the objection was timeously stated, and that there is nothing to prevent my entertaining the complaint on the merits.

“As the contention was seriously maintained, and as the Corporation intimated that they desired an authoritative construction of the statutes bearing upon this point, which is doubtless of importance to the Finance Department of the city, it is right that I should explain at some length my reasons for coming to the above conclusion.”

(His Lordship pointed out that secs. 1 to 4, and 9 and 10 of Sir William Rae’s Act of 1822, and sec. 32 of the Burgh Reform Act 1833, remained in force, or were revived, with regard to Glasgow, and continued)—

“I would now draw attention to the enactments of Sir William Rae’s Act of 1822. It proceeded on the preamble that it was expedient that regular accounts should be annually stated and exhibited of the Common Good of the royal burghs of Scotland, shewing the property and funds as well as the encumbrances affecting the same and the receipts and disbursements in every year, and that provision should be made for preventing and redressing any error or wrong that may be committed in the administration of the Common Good, and therefore enacted (sec. 1) that ‘a particular account of the Common Good and revenues of every royal burgh in Scotland, made up to the day preceding the general annual election of magistrates in each burgh, shall be annually stated and deposited in the manner directed by this Act.’ This account was to be certified by the Provost in terms of a statutory certificate.

“It was then enacted (sec. 3) that”—(His Lordship quoted the section).

“I must here note that the annual election of the magistrates is not a

Nov. 21, 1907. The respondents reclaimed.

—
Fadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

After the reclaiming note had been sent to the roll a minute of disclaimer was lodged on behalf of James Aitchison Johnston and others, being six of the remaining respondents, which was in these terms:—
“Gordon, for the minuters, stated to the Court that they gave no instructions or authority for appearance being entered or answers being lodged in their names or on their behalf in this petition and complaint, or for their being represented in the procedure therein before the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer Causes; that they were not members of the Corporation when the expenditure objected to was incurred, and strongly object to it, and only recently was it brought under their notice that appearances had been made or answers lodged in their names or on their behalf: And he further stated that the minuters gave no instructions or authority for the presentation of the reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor of 19th July loose expression intended to refer to the election of the council. The Act in several passages carefully distinguishes between the council as a whole and the magistrates, and when it refers to the annual election of the magistrates it means, in my opinion, the election of magistrates, properly so-called, by the council. Under this statute, therefore, the maximum period for the lodging objections to the burgh accounts was three calendar months plus thirty days plus two calendar months, and for complaining to the Court of Exchequer one calendar month more. And it is admitted that the petitioners’ letter of objections of 7th May 1907 and their subsequent complaint to this Court were timeous if the limitation of time imposed is to be found in this statute. I should have said that the Act (sec. 10) further enacted ‘that in the event of no complaint being made to any annual account within the time herein limited, it shall not be competent thereafter to complain to such Court in regard to such account.’

“But, then, matters do not rest on this statute alone. The Burgh Reform Act of 1833 provided, by section 32, which, as above mentioned, notwithstanding its repeal, remains in force or is revived quoad Glasgow, that”—(His Lordship quoted the section).

“This is the whole provision contained in the Act of 1833 regarding corporate property and accounts, and it is quite clear that its provisions had a totally different purpose from, and did not supersede those of, Sir William Rae’s Act of eleven years previous. The object of that Act was to secure honest and accurate accounting, the exposure of the burgh accounts to the inspection of the burgesses, and their correction, if necessary, by the Court of Exchequer. But the object of the Burgh Reform Act of 1833 was electoral merely. In contemplation of the annual election in the month of November, it provided for the inspection of the burgh accounts, not by burgesses with a view to correction, but by registered electors, clearly because the disclosures of the burgh accounts for the past year had or might have a material bearing on the question of the election and re-election of candidates. And consequently the Act of 1833 contained no provision for objection or complaint to the Court of Exchequer or any other authority. Hence I am clearly of opinion that, though there may have been an awkward overlapping of dates, involving the statutory deposit of the same accounts on two different dates, for two different purposes, and with entirely different consequences, that is no possible reason why the important and salutary provisions of the former statute of 1822 should be held as virtually abrogated by those of the later statute of 1833.

“Nor do I think that this virtual repeal is effected by the qualification introduced into the Act of 1833 by the local Glasgow Municipal Act of 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxiii.). This Act (sec. 10) provides that the Council may cause the state of affairs which they are required to make up 1907 in their names or on their behalf, and accordingly the minuters Nov. 21, 1907.

disclaim all said proceedings unwarrantably taken in their names or on their behalf.”

Eadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

Parties were heard on this minute on 9th November 1907, when the following opinion was delivered :—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point which is before us arises out of a petition and complaint presented by certain burgesses of Glasgow in order to have certain expenditure of the Common Good fund of the city of Glasgow, which they allege to be illegal, checked. The Common Good of Glasgow is administered by the Corporation of Glasgow, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council, and accordingly in the prayer of the petition, which is based, inter alia, upon an Act 3 Geo. IV. cap. 91, warrant is asked for service upon “The Right Hon. William Bilsland, Lord Provost,” then follows a string of names and addresses, and at the end of these names and addresses come these words “all members of the Town-Council of Glasgow, being the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and members of the Town-Council of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow, and to ordain annually on or before 15th October by sec. 32 of the Act of 1833, ‘to be made up as at the 31st day of May in each year, with the annual accounts or statements of the various other trusts under their administration, and the said 31st day of May shall be substituted for the said 15th day of October.’ Pausing there and reading sec. 10 of the local Act of 1879 into sec. 32 of the General Act of 1833, it only amounts to this, that the Council shall on or before 31st May in each year make up a state of their affairs brought down as near as possible to that date, which account shall be kept in the Town-clerk’s or Treasurer’s office from the said 31st May down to the time of the election, and an abstract shall be printed and published on or before 20th October. The result is merely to anticipate the date of closing the burgh’s accounts for the year, and to subject them to the inspection of the registered electors for a very much longer period. But as, in my opinion, the provisions of sec. 32 of the Act of 1833, in their original form, in no way abrogated the provisions of Sir William Rae’s Act of 1822, neither do they do so where qualified by section 10 of the local Act of 1879.

“But then the last-mentioned section concludes, ‘and no other annual state of affairs or accounts than that hereby authorised shall be required to be made up by them.’ The only result, so far as I can see, of this latter provision, is to remove any doubts as to whether two different accounts, one under the Act of 1822, and the other under the Act of 1833, as modified by that of 1879, were required. If before there was any doubt on the subject, for the future one account only was required to satisfy the provisions of both sets of enactments. But this does not result in the provisions for its exhibition to the registered electors for the purposes of the Burgh Reform Act of 1833 superseding the necessity of its exhibition to the burgesses for the purposes and under the conditions of Sir William Rae’s Act of 1822. I am here concerned with the purposes of the last-mentioned Act only, and for these purposes the calendar or series of dates specified in that Act still regulates procedure. And as on that hypothesis it is admitted that the objections and complaint now before me are timeous, I must repel the preliminary objections stated for the Corporation, and I think that the best step which I could take at this period of the session to advance the process is to ordain the Corporation at or prior to the first box-day in vacation to produce in process a detailed account, with relative vouchers of the item on page 16 of their abstract of accounts, No. 23 of process, which is the subject of objection and complaint.”

Nov. 21, 1907. them to lodge answers hereto, if so advised, within eight days after such service ; and thereafter, upon resuming consideration hereof, with or without answers, and after such inquiry as to your Lordships shall seem proper, to disallow the said item of £2457, 2s. 1d. as a charge against the Common Good or revenues of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow . . . and to ordain the said account to be rectified accordingly." Now, to this petition answers have been put in, and these answers have been put in in precisely the same form as was set forth in the prayer of the petition, viz., "For the Right Hon. William Bilsland, Lord Provost," &c., followed by the list of names, and by the concluding words I have just read, "all members of the Town-Council of Glasgow, being the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and members of the Town-Council of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow."

Eadie v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

Ld. President.

Mr Gordon appears for six of these gentlemen, and in a minute he says that they gave no instructions or authority for appearance being entered in their names, and upon that he moves that his disclaimer should be sustained, that the names of these parties be taken out of the case, and that they be found entitled to their expenses against the others who have lodged defences. It seems that something of the same character was done in the Outer-House upon the motion of certain other of the defenders, but that is a matter which is not before us.

I have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for this motion. If answers were put in for these individuals as individuals, and if these individuals say that they never gave any authority, it is clear that they are entitled to have their names taken out of the unauthorised paper, and entitled to their expenses against the persons who put in the unauthorised paper. But it seems clear that the simple answer here is that there was no appearance for these individuals as individuals.

The common way of citing a corporation is to cite it by its corporate name. This seems to be the appropriate manner of citing all common law corporations, and I think the Corporation of Glasgow is a common law corporation. But further, the Corporation of Glasgow has the right of citing and of being cited by its corporate name assured to it by several Acts. But though that is so, I have never heard that a pursuer might not cite members of a corporation, provided he goes on to explain that he cites them not as individuals but as members of the corporation. That this has been done here is clear from the print. So I think that when these answers were put in, echoing the prayer of the petition, they were put in for the Corporation and not for the individuals cited. Mr Gordon's clients may say that they do not wish to defend the action, but they cannot avoid being there, in their representative capacity only, as long as the majority of the Corporation desires to defend.

LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, and LORD PEARSON concurred.

THE COURT refused the minute.

At the subsequent hearing on the reclaiming note the reclaimers argued ;—(1) Competency of objections—These objections were incompetent, for they had not been timeously stated. It was not disputed that they were timeously stated if the date from which the time fell to be counted was still the date of the election of the magistrates. But Nov. 21, 1907. that was no longer the date, for, as the making up of the accounts no longer depended on the date of the election of magistrates, that date had ceased to be of significance. With the alteration of the date for making up the accounts the whole time-table of dates that followed and depended thereon, including the date for stating objections, must be held to have been altered also, and to count from the new date for making up the accounts. To hold otherwise would lead to the absurd result that accounts made up as at 31st May could not be objected to for nearly six months thereafter. If the period for stating objections fell to be reckoned from the 31st of May these objections were not timeously stated. (2) Production of vouchers—It was not necessary that vouchers should be produced here, as the nature of the expenditure sufficiently appeared from the accounts. In any event, vouchers only for the £1142 incurred during the year to which the accounts applied should be called for, the rest of the sum in the item complained of had been incurred during previous years, and in all probability it would be impossible now to produce complete vouchers of all that expenditure.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

On 21st November 1907 the following opinions were delivered :—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only point raised in the petition and complaint at this stage was whether certain objections that had been stated to the petition and complaint at the instance of the burgesses against the Town-Council are in time or not, and that depends upon the regulations laid down for making objections to the accounts in the Act of Parliament dealing with the accounts. The Act of Parliament that deals generally with the accounts of municipal bodies in Scotland is the Act of 1900. But there is a provision in that Act by which what are known as the larger burghs are enabled by resolution to prevent the Act applying to their accounts, and really to maintain the status quo ante. That provision was taken advantage of by Glasgow. The Act which deals with the Common Good, the expenditure of which is here called in question, is the Act of 1822. That Act, by the first section, requires that the accounts of the Common Good and revenues of every royal burgh in Scotland, made up to the day preceding the general annual election of magistrates in each burgh, shall be annually stated and deposited in the manner directed by this Act. Then in section 3 there is what I may call a time-table, which I really need not go through, but which provides for the time within which objections may be taken and explanations called for, and then, if the explanations are unsatisfactory, there is allowed an appeal to the Court of Exchequer. Assuming that that time-table applies, it is admitted that these objections are in time. But the respondents, the Town-Council of Glasgow, say that they are not in time, and for this reason. They say that although under the Act the accounts are to be made up to the day preceding the annual election of magistrates, which is sometime in November, this has been changed by subsequent Act of Parliament, and that the time has been changed with it, and if the time-table is reckoned from the 31st May, which is what I may call the modern date, then it is equally admitted by both parties that these objections are not in time.

Now, the first change that took place was in the Burgh Reform Act

Nov. 21, 1907. of 1833, which changed the time of making up and bringing down the Eadie v. account from the date of the election to the 15th day of October. One can Glasgow easily see for what reason that was done. It was done at the time of the Corporation. great reform of municipal corporations, and it was done, not I think for the Ld. President. purpose of making any difference in the objections that might be made to the accounts, but for the purpose of allowing the electors—who were now brought into existence, in the proper sense of the word, for the first time—to consider whether there had been undue expenditure or not, in view of their choice of their future representatives. But that again was altered so far as Glasgow was concerned by the private Act of 1879, called the Glasgow Municipal Act. That Act in section 10 provides that the state of affairs which was required to be made up annually—that is the then existing one, the one on or before 15th October—shall be made up as at the 31st day of May, and then it goes on to say that “no other annual state of affairs or account than that hereby authorised shall be required to be made up by them.” That, of course, is perfectly plain; the date provided by that Act of 1879 for the Glasgow annual state of affairs is the 31st May, and no other date in the year. But the Act does not deal with the question of objections to the accounts; that is allowed to remain upon the old statute.

It has been urged to us by Mr Macmillan, the learned counsel for the appellants, who said everything that could be said, that it is very awkward and very ungainly to have a time-table for objections starting from a different date from the time at which the account is to be made up. I think that may be conceded. But nevertheless what the learned counsel is asking us to do here is to take away these burgesses' right of objection—for that is what it comes to—simply because these burgesses have not been able to put together two Acts of Parliament and spell out a different result from that which the Act of Parliament really says. I do not think that argument can be given effect to, for this very plain and simple reason that, if in the Act of 1879 the Glasgow Town-Council wanted to change the calendar during which objections could be made, nothing in the world was easier than to say so. If, on the contrary, they left the matter alone, then I think the Act of Parliament must be read according to its plain letter as it stands, and we are not by inference to read into the Act of Parliament different dates from what are there set forth. Therefore I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right decision.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should have thought that a great corporation like the municipality of Glasgow, when any part of their administration is challenged, would be anxious that the fullest light should be thrown upon the management of funds entrusted to them. Agreeing with your Lordship as to the proper construction of these statutes, I do not participate in the scruples which the Magistrates and Council seem to have as to the regularity of the present proceedings, but think they are perfectly within the scope of the statutes. Indeed, it is as much in the interest of the Corporation as of the ratepayers that the legality of this expenditure should be determined by the Court, in order that in future cases there may be a guide to Town-Councils as to how far they are entitled to burden the Common Good. I rather think I have seen some indications that municipal bodies are inclined Nov. 21, 1907.

to take too much out of the Common Good, and it is just as well that they should be reminded that such charges are subject to statutory audit or ^{Eadie v.} Glasgow inquiry when necessary. The question will always be, whether the subject ^{Corporation.} of the expenditure is fairly within the scope and duties of municipal bodies, Lord M'Laren.
and is for municipal purposes. I agree in all the observations your Lordship has made upon the Acts of Parliament.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree upon the simple ground which your Lordship has stated, that we cannot disregard the plain words of the Act of Parliament in order to make a series of Acts more coherent than Parliament itself has found necessary.

LORD PEARSON.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There was one point that was urged upon us in pronouncing an order as to what accounts the respondents are to produce.
Mr Macmillan first of all suggested that we need not order the production of vouchers, and second, he suggested that in any case the order should be limited to the sum of £1142 instead of to the sum of £2457. As far as regards the vouchers, I think the objectors here are entitled to the vouchers, because they are entitled to know precisely how this money was spent, and I think Mr Dickson's remark was quite right that, if the respondents choose to put in an admission that this expenditure was illegal, then, of course, he would not want anything more. But to put in simply a so-called admission that this was spent on Taxation of Land Values Suspense Account really does not put the matter much further, because Taxation of Land Values Suspense Account may, in one sense, mean anything. Of course, I am not meaning that one has not got a general notion, drawn from what is in the pleadings in the case—because in this class of matter one is not entitled to take cognisance of anything except what is brought before one in the case—
I do not mean that one has not a general notion, in a certain way, of how the money has been spent, but then it is perfectly evident that the money may not have been even spent on that—there may be, so to speak, expenditure within expenditure which would be perfectly illegal, and which, even supposing it was held that what I may call the dominating head of expenditure was correct, might yet fall to be disallowed; and accordingly, without the vouchers to shew how the sum was split up, it is impossible to know where we are. Therefore I think, first of all, that the vouchers must be produced, and, secondly, that the sum to which the order shall apply is the sum stated by the Lord Ordinary—£2457—because that is the sum which is put into the accounts. If there has been—I find it difficult to use a word, because I do not want to use a word which suggests that anything in the slightest degree wrong has been done in the account—if there has been an arrangement by means of a suspense account by which items, so to speak, have escaped detection for the moment, that is because of the way in which the accounts are arranged, and the respondents have only themselves to thank for that state of affairs. I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong in the way in which the accounts are stated; what I am

Nov. 21, 1907. saying is that until one sees the full account it is impossible to form a judgment upon that matter.

Eadie v.

Glasgow

Corporation.

Ld. President.

Mr Macmillan says quite frankly that there might actually be some vouchers in that £2457 which, being in past years, might be very difficult to find. Well, we must deal with that when it comes before us. It is quite clear that the order must be pronounced, and if it is impossible to obtemper that order and good reason is given, I suppose the matter will end there. But at anyrate we cannot do all that in the dark. At the present moment I have not even a notion of what this Suspense Account is. A Suspense Account, as one knows in book-keeping, may mean anything. What this means I cannot tell until I see it. I think, therefore, the scope of the Lord Ordinary's order was correct. That is the judgment of the Court.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, except in so far as it decerns for the sum of £3, 3s.: Of new repel the objection that the petition and complaint has not been timeously brought: Of new appoint the respondents to produce in process . . . a detailed account, with relative vouchers of the item of their abstract accounts . . . which is the subject of complaint," &c.

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—
CALDER, MARSHALL, & WALKER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 36. G. W. WHITEHOUSE, Pursuer (Respondent).—McClure, K.C.—Christie.
R. & W. PICKETT, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Watt, K.C.—Munro.

Nov. 16, 1907.

Whitehouse v.
Pickett.

Innkeeper—Limitation of Liability to guests—Negligence—Onus probandi—Deposit expressly for safe custody—Innkeepers Liability Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 41).—The Innkeepers Liability Act, enacts, sec. 1, that no innkeeper shall be liable to make good to any guest of such innkeeper any loss of property brought to his inn to a greater amount than £30, except (1) where such property shall have been lost through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ; or (2) where such property shall have been deposited "expressly for safe custody" with such innkeeper.

A hotel exhibited on the wall of a corridor a printed intimation that the proprietors "will not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but will take charge of same in office. See extract from Act of Parliament, chap. 41, Vict. 26 and 27, in entrance hall." The extract in the entrance hall contained section 1 of the Act.

A commercial traveller for a manufacturing jeweller left a bag containing jewels to the value of £1800 at the office on a Saturday afternoon. He was in use to visit the hotel, and the hotelkeepers knew that he was in the habit of carrying jewellery with him. At 11.30 p.m., when he asked for the bag with the view of taking it to his bedroom, it was discovered that his bag had been stolen. Another bag of the same size and appearance had been left at the office by one of three guests in the hotel who disappeared the same evening without paying their bill, but leaving behind them certain burglar's tools.

In an action by the jeweller against the hotelkeepers for the value of the bag, the defenders pleaded, inter alia, the statutory limitation of liability to £30.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia—(1) that the goods having been deposited with the defenders for safe custody he was entitled to indemnity; and (2) that the goods having been stolen through the default or neglect of the defenders or of their servants, they were liable in reparation.

After a proof, in which the facts above narrated were established, the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) held that the goods had been lost through the negligence of the defenders or of their servants. Whitehouse v. Pickett.

On a reclaiming note the Extra Division held (rev. the judgment) (1) that the bag had not been deposited expressly for safe custody within the meaning of sec. 1, subsec. (2), of the Act; (2) that the onus of proving "default or neglect" on the part of the defenders or of their servants lay upon the pursuer, and that that onus had not been discharged; and therefore (3) that the defenders were entitled to the benefit of the statutory limitation of liability.

In this action G. W. Whitehouse, manufacturing jeweller and diamond mounter, Birmingham, sought decree against R. & W. Pickett, hotelkeepers, Imperial Hotel, Edinburgh, for payment of the sum of £1966, 5s. 6d., as being the value of a bag of jewellery belonging to the pursuer which formed part of the luggage of John Buckley, one of his commercial travellers, and which was stolen while the traveller was a guest in the defenders' hotel. The defenders denied liability, but tendered £30 in full of the conclusions of the summons. EXTRA DIVISION.
Lord Salvesen.

The defenders stated, inter alia,—"There is a bar on the ground floor of the Imperial Hotel, and there is another bar at the office on the first floor. Both of these bars are used for the supply of refreshments to customers. The bar on the first floor is mostly used for the supply of customers who are staying in the hotel. In a conspicuous place in the entrance hall of the hotel there is, and has during the defenders' occupancy of the hotel, been exhibited a notice under and in virtue of the Act to amend the law respecting the liability of innkeepers, and to prevent certain frauds upon them, 13th July 1863 (26 and 27 Victoria, caput 41), narrating the provisions of section 1 thereof. There are also notices to a similar effect exhibited in the corridors and bedrooms of said hotel.* Mr Buckley never told defenders of the contents or value of said bag, and never deposited it with them for safe custody."

The following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—

"The facts in this case as they have been disclosed in the proof are comparatively simple, and, so far as material, admit of brief statement. The pursuer's traveller, John Buckley, who has been in the same employment for sixteen or seventeen years, arrived at the Imperial Hotel, belonging to the defenders, on 17th February 1906, in the course of one of his regular journeys on the pursuer's business. Outside the hotel he was met by James Sim, the boots or hotel porter, who relieved him of two bags which he was carrying. One of these was a stock or sample bag, in which Mr Buckley was in the habit of carrying the jewels belonging to his employer, and which he sold to retail dealers. Sim knew Buckley as an old customer. He also knew his occupation, and the fact that one of the bags contained valuable articles of jewellery. On reaching the first floor, accordingly, Sim carried this bag straight into the office, and deposited it in a dark

* At the proof it appeared that these notices were in the following terms:—"The proprietors of this hotel respectfully beg to intimate that they will not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but will take charge of same in office. See extract from Act of Parliament, chapter 41, Vict. 26 and 27, in entrance hall." The extract in the entrance hall contained section 1 of the Act.

Nov. 16, 1907. corner between an ice chest and the wall. He then obtained from Whitehouse v. Pickett. Mr Reginald Pickett (who is for some unexplained reason called 'Harry' throughout the proof) the key of Mr Buckley's bedroom and carried the other bag, which contained the latter's personal effects, up to the bedroom. Mr Pickett accompanied Mr Buckley into the coffee-room, where there was an acquaintance of his, and left him there.

"It being Saturday afternoon, Mr Buckley had no occasion to display any of the contents of his bag. It was his practice, however, when he retired to rest to carry his bag with him up to the bedroom; and, accordingly, he inquired for it about 11.30 the same evening. He was handed a bag which somewhat resembled his own, but which he at once discovered was not his. Sim had left for the night, but was sent for, and at first thought that the bag was Mr Buckley's. The defenders, however, being satisfied that it was not, sent for the police, who, on opening, discovered that it contained only a wooden frame, a piece of sheet zinc, and some other articles; the contents being so arranged as to give the bag the appearance of being full.

"Suspicion was at once thrown upon three persons who had been guests in the hotel, one of them who gave the name of 'Hall' having occupied a bedroom since the Wednesday previous. These men disappeared the same evening without having paid their bill, and leaving behind them some effects, including a skeleton key and a pair of diamond scales, which left little doubt as to the profession to which they belonged. The police bill which was issued with a view to capturing the three persons in question published a minute description of all the articles which could give a clue to the thieves; but, although Mr Buckley's bag contained nearly 1600 articles of small jewellery, principally rings, many of them being marked with the initials of the pursuer, none of the property has been traced, nor have the thieves been captured.

"The only other piece of evidence bearing on the theft is that about 6.30 P.M., one of the suspected individuals handed to Mr R. Pickett the brown leather bag which was left instead of Mr Buckley's, and asked him to take charge of it. Mr Pickett did so, placing it in the same recess as that in which Mr Buckley's bag was placed. How the theft was committed remains unexplained, but, as Mr Buckley's bag was not handed to any of the three men in mistake, it must have been removed by one of them without the knowledge or consent of the defenders or their servants."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said goods being lost to the pursuer while in the custody of the defenders as part of the luggage of the pursuer's said traveller, while he was a guest residing at the defenders' hotel, the defenders are, under the edict Nautæ, Caupones, &c., bound to compensate the pursuer for said loss as concluded for. (2) The said goods having been deposited with the defenders for safe custody as libelled, they are bound to indemnify the pursuer for the loss thereof. (3) The said goods having been stolen through the default or neglect of the defenders or their servants, the defenders are liable in reparation to the pursuer as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case, and, in any event, the action is irrelevant in so far as laid on the edict Nautæ, Caupones, &c. (3) The bag referred to not having been deposited with the defenders expressly for safe custody, they are not responsible for its value to the pursuer. (4) The pursuer not having suffered any loss or damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, the defenders should be assoil- Nov. 16, 1907.

zied. (5) The defenders having complied with the provisions of the Whitehouse v. Pickett.
Act 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 41, are not liable to the pursuer in more than the sum of £30.*

On 23d November 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen), after a proof, pronounced an interlocutor, in which he decerned against the defenders for payment of the sum of £1790, 3s. 6d., with expenses.†

* The Innkeepers Liability Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 41), enacts :—

Sec. 1. “No innkeeper shall, after the passing of this Act, be liable to make good to any guest of such innkeeper, any loss of, or injury to, goods or property brought to his inn, not being a horse or other live animal, or any gear appertaining thereto, or any carriage, to a greater amount than the sum of thirty pounds, except in the following cases ; (that is to say)

“(1) Where such goods or property shall have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ ;

“(2) Where such goods or property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper ;

Provided always that in the case of such deposit it shall be lawful for such innkeeper, if he thinks fit, to require, as a condition of his liability, that such goods or property shall be deposited in a box or other receptacle, fastened and sealed by the person depositing the same.”

† “OPINION.— . . . The pursuer accordingly now sues the defenders for the sum of £1996, 5s. 6d., as the value of the articles of jewellery contained in the stolen bag. The pleadings disclose alternative grounds of liability ; but the case mainly insisted in was that the goods having been put into the defenders’ custody for safe keeping, and having been stolen through the negligence of the defenders or their servants, they are liable to compensate the pursuer for his loss. This ground of action may still be insisted in notwithstanding the Act 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 41, which limits the liability of innkeepers. It is admitted, however, that the effect of that Act was to throw the onus upon the guest, whose property had disappeared in the innkeeper’s custody, to prove that it had so disappeared through the default or negligence of the innkeeper or his servants: failing which proof the liability is limited to the sum of £30. As might be expected, however, there is no direct evidence of negligence ; but the pursuer says that it must be inferred from the disappearance of the goods coupled with the facts disclosed in the proof, which he says instruct both a laxity in the system adopted by the defenders in storing their customers’ property, and negligence on the part of those in charge.

“I have already described the place where the bag was deposited by Sim, and which is called a bar on the plan, but was also used as an office. There is a service window in this room and a door at the side of it. Opposite this door at the other end is a glass door, which gives admission to a private room used by the defenders as their own sitting-room, and this again has a door marked ‘Private’ opening into the lobby. There being at that time no strong room in the hotel (although one has since been added) the place where Buckley’s bag was put was undoubtedly the safest place in the hotel for the purpose. There is usually some person either in the bar or in the private room ; and it is said that when the bar is left vacant the door is generally snibbed, and ought invariably to be so. If that were done, no access could be obtained to the bar except through the private room ; and so long as there was any person in the private room, no unauthorised person could remove any property from the bar without his observing it. I am satisfied, however, that the defenders or their servants did not always adopt the precaution of snibbing the door to the bar. It was not

Nov. 16, 1907. The defenders reclaimed.

Whitehouse v. Pickett. Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary was in error in the inference which he drew from the facts. It was necessary under the Innkeepers Liability Act, 1863, that the pursuer should prove that there was negligence on the part of the defenders or their servants, or that the bag had been deposited expressly for safe custody. (1) Under section 1, subsection (1), of the Act the onus of proving that the goods were lost “through the wilful act, default, or neglect” of the innkeeper or his servant was on the pursuer.¹ In this case there was no proof of negligence on the part of the defenders. (2) With reference to the case made on section 1, subsection (2), of the Act, it could not be held that goods were deposited expressly for safe custody if the deposit and its purpose were not brought to the personal knowsnibbed when Sim took Buckley’s bag and deposited it in the recess, nor was it snibbed in the evening when Mr Buckley went in to take it up to his own bedroom. On both occasions there was no doubt some person in the private room who could more or less watch the bar; but the efficiency of this would depend upon the position that he occupied at the time. From many parts of the private room only a very small portion of the bar could be seen; and, judging from the plan, if the bar door were open, a person might easily reach the recess without being observed by those in charge of the adjoining room. Similarly, if the private room itself was untenanted there was nothing to prevent anyone going from the lobby, through the two doors into the bar, even if there was a person in attendance there, and being unobserved, if that person was occupied at the service window with his back towards the recess. The safety of a guest’s property in the apartment depended therefore, when all the doors were left unfastened, entirely on the vigilance of those who were inside.

“As Mr Buckley’s bag was removed without any person observing it, it follows, either, that there was nobody in the two rooms at the time, or that the person there was not attending to his duties—one of which undoubtedly was the protection of property left in the office. On this point it is not without importance that the defenders exhibited a notice in various parts of the hotel ‘that they would not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but would take charge of same in the office.’ That was an invitation to guests in the hotel to leave valuables in the office, and imposed upon the defenders a duty of taking charge of them there. The place selected by Sim therefore for the deposit of the pursuer’s bag was the recognised place, according to the rules of the hotel, for storing such property; and it is immaterial whether on other occasions Mr Buckley had left his bag under the sideboard in the private room, which was no doubt an equally good place, provided there was somebody in attendance there.

“Mr Watt, for the defenders, pressed upon me that there was no evidence of negligence at all, and that the bag might have been removed consistently with no negligence being attributable to the defenders or their servants. I do not agree. The negligence may have been slight because of the dexterity of the thieves, but I am unable to see how, without negligence, the theft could have been committed. Perhaps the fact that no theft had ever been committed from the hotel before may have lulled the defenders and their servants into a false confidence. Perhaps the exigencies of business (there were two dinners going on at the hotel that evening) may have temporarily ledge of the person with whom the goods were alleged to have been deposited.¹ Accordingly the subsection did not apply in this case, because Buckley gave no instructions as to the deposit of the bag, and it was proved that the defenders were not aware that the bag had been placed in the office. Nov. 16, 1907.

¹ Medawar v. Grand Hotel Co., L. R., [1891] 2 Q. B. 11; O’Connor v. Grand International Hotel Co., L. R., 2 Ir. [1898] 92; Moss v. Russell, 1884, 1 Times Law Reports, 13; Marchioness of Huntly v. Bedford Hotel Co., Limited, 56 J. P. 53.

Whitehouse v. Pickett.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) At common law an innkeeper, unless he limited his responsibility by contract, express or implied, was regarded as insuring the goods of a guest. To make him liable, the only facts that need be proved were that the goods were taken to the inn and that they were lost.² The only change made on the common law by the Innkeepers Liability Act, 1863, was that, as regards liability beyond £30, what had been a presumptio juris became a presumptio facti; and the innkeeper was enabled to escape liability by proving that he had not been in fault. The onus probandi, however, still rested on the innkeeper. An analogy might be found in the law as to the liability of carriers in regard to goods and passengers carried by them.³ This result was in accordance with the general rule of law that the onus of proving a fact which was specially absorbed the whole staff and left the private room and bar untenanted and unlocked. Whatever the reason may have been, I cannot doubt that the thief entered the apartment either by the bar door or the door of the private room, and found no obstacle to his removing the bag. The other bag had no doubt been left in the same place in order to afford the excuse, if the thief were intercepted with the bag in his hand, that he had mistaken Mr Buckley's bag for his own.

"I am therefore prepared to affirm on the evidence that the bag in question was stolen, and that it could not have been stolen but for the negligence of the defenders or their servants. A defence of contributory negligence by Mr Buckley is indicated on record, but it came to nothing. After the theft had been committed Buckley remembered that he had met a man called Hall at other hotels with a bag very similar to the one which had been left, and he jumped to the conclusion that this man had in all probability been shadowing him for some time before. He had, however, at the time no suspicion of Hall, and his appearance was not such as to excite any remark.

"Parties were agreed upon the law applicable to this case, and it is shortly stated at pages 127-8 of 1 Smith's Leading Cases as deduced from Medawar, [1891] 2 Q. B. 11.

"On the view which I reach that the pursuer has sufficiently established negligence on the part of the defenders, it is not necessary to consider a separate point based on the alleged failure to exhibit a notice of the provisions of the Act in a conspicuous place. If I had to decide this point my decision would be against the pursuer. I think it is proved that the notice was exhibited on the staircase leading from the entrance hall to the first floor, and at such a height that it could be read by any person who stopped on the stairs for that purpose. The place selected may not have been the best, but I think it was conspicuous enough to satisfy the statute.

"The only other matter with which I have to deal is the value of the property which was stolen." (His Lordship proceeded to examine the evidence on this point, and came to the conclusion that the value was £1790, 3s. 6d.)

¹ O'Connor v. Grand International Hotel Co., L. R., 2 Ir. [1898] 92; Moss v. Russell, 1884, 1 Times Law Reports, 13.

² Bell's Commentaries (7th ed.), vol. i., p. 495, note 4.

³ Watson v. North British Railway Co., March 18, 1876, 3 R. 637 (the Lord President's opinion); Bell's Principles (10th ed.), secs. 164, 167, and 170.

Nov. 16, 1907. within the knowledge of one of the parties to a case was on that party,¹ and as a guest could not know what had become of his goods after they were entrusted to the innkeeper, it fell on the latter to prove that the loss had not been occasioned by his negligence. Even assuming that under section 1, subsection (1), of the Innkeepers Act the onus was placed on the pursuer, that onus was discharged by the evidence, which shewed that the defenders had been negligent. The defenders were at fault either in not having a place sufficiently secure for guarding valuables or in not having on this particular occasion seen that the doors of the office were kept locked. (2) The evidence proved that the goods had been deposited for safe custody. The office had been selected by the defenders as the safest place for the custody of valuables, and by the notice exhibited in the hotel they had stated that they would take charge of such goods in the office. Buckley was in the habit of visiting the hotel, and acting on the invitation implied in the notice was accustomed to place the bag in the office. Hence when Sim placed the bag, which, as he was aware, usually contained valuables, he must have known that Buckley intended to deposit it for safe custody, and these facts were sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 1, subsection 2, of the Act.

Whitehouse v.
Pickett.

At advising, on 16th November 1907,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The pursuer in this case, who is a manufacturing jeweller in Birmingham, employed Mr Buckley as a traveller to assist in the sale of his goods, and the claim is made against an innkeeper in Edinburgh, with whom the traveller lodged, in respect of the loss of a bag containing jewellery to the value of about £1900. The traveller had been in the habit of resorting to this hotel on his visits to Edinburgh, and seems to have been known to the proprietors of the hotel, the Messrs Pickett, as well as to some of their servants. This bag (containing samples of jewellery) was of a different description and pattern from the ordinary tourist's bag, and was easily recognised as a receptacle used for trade purposes. On the day in question the traveller on arriving at the hotel was met by the porter, who took the bag out of his hand along with another bag in which he carried his personal effects. At the same time one of the Messrs Pickett, who was in attendance in the bar-room—there was a bar-room and a private sitting-room with inter-communication—came forward to book a room for the traveller, telling him at the same time that he would find two of his friends in the coffee-room. While this colloquy was proceeding the porter deposited the bag in the bar-room, not exactly in the spot where the traveller had been in use to put it on former visits, but substantially in the same position and with the same protection from interference by outside persons. The traveller went out in the course of the afternoon and returned again, and after spending some time in the smoking-room he purposed retiring to rest, but before doing so he came to the bar-room and asked for his bag, because he thought it would be safer to have it in his bedroom. The bag was then found to be missing. I think it is common ground that the theft was committed by three professional thieves who had taken up their quarters as visitors at the hotel, apparently with some knowledge about the jeweller's traveller and with the intention of appropriating his bag. The bag may have been taken during the absence Nov. 16, 1907. of the Messrs Pickett from the bar-room where it was left, although their ^{Whitehouse v.} rule was that the office should never be left unoccupied, or it might be ^{Pickett.} that while the proprietor in charge was engaged in conversation by one of ^{Lord M'Laren.} the confederates another slipped round behind his back and walked off with the bag. The Act of Parliament limits the liability of innkeepers to the sum of £30 except under two conditions. One of the exceptions is that negligence is proved, and the other exception is where such goods or property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

¹ Taylor on Evidence (10th ed.), sec. 376A.

In this state of the facts it is maintained for the pursuer (1) that the placing his bag in the bar-room was equivalent to a deposit of the bag expressly for safe custody, and (2) alternatively, that the bag was stolen in consequence of the negligence of the innkeeper. I am not satisfied that either of these grounds of liability is made out.

As to the first ground of action I think that we must ascribe some definite meaning to the word "expressly." Without elaborating the suggested distinction it may suffice to say that the statute contemplates that the innkeeper is to be liable for loss if it is made clear to him when the property is deposited that he is charged with the duty of safe custody—a duty which the innkeeper is not at liberty to decline if he is invited to undertake it. I think the statute also contemplates that there may be a deposit of property which is not for the express purpose of safe keeping or safe custody, and that in such a case, if the property is lost or stolen without fault on the part of the innkeeper, his liability would be limited to the sum of £30. If my second proposition is disputed, and if the liability of the innkeeper is to be just the same whether the purpose of safe keeping is or is not expressed, that is equivalent to saying that the word "expressly" has no definite meaning—is, in other words, a mere expletive. But I am not prepared to treat the word "expressly" when used in a statute as a redundant expression—first, because this would be contrary to what I think is a sound principle of construction, that in general every word in a statute must receive its ordinary meaning; and secondly, because I think it may very well have been in the view of the Legislature that a guest might be content to leave his property in the charge of the innkeeper trusting that he would take reasonable care of it, without seeking to put the innkeeper under the special responsibility that follows from a deposit for the express purpose of safe custody. In this connection I may point out that under the statute if the innkeeper is charged with safe custody he may request the guest to put his property in a box which the guest is to lock and seal. This might not be convenient to the guest; and if the guest is a commercial traveller who wants his bag three or four times in the course of a day, it may very well be that rather than be at the trouble of having his bag locked and sealed every time he returns from a visit, he would be content to leave it in the office without going through these formalities, believing that his bag was secure against all probable risks in the innkeeper's hands.

On the facts of the case it is plain enough that the bag was put into the bar-room by the hotel porter without anything being said by word or sign as to the purpose for which it was left there; and Mr Reginald Pickett, the

Nov. 16, 1907. partner in attendance, who seems not to have observed the placing of the Whitehouse v. bag in the bar-room, had no opportunity of requiring that the bag should be Pickett. put into a box and locked and sealed. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer did not take the necessary step for bringing himself within the Lord M'Laren. second exception of the statute, because he did not bring to the notice of Mr Pickett that he meant to charge him with responsibility for the safe custody of the bag. The fact that Mr Buckley went to the office for his bag late on Saturday night, in order, as he says, to take it to his bedroom, is, as I think, absolutely inconsistent with his case under this head. He did not need the bag until Monday morning, and if he understood that he had deposited it in terms of the statute, he had no occasion to take it to his bedroom, and I can only explain his doing so on the supposition that Mr Buckley considered the bag was lying in the office at his own risk, barring such negligence as would make the innkeeper liable in compensation. This was also the view of the other party, because neither of the Messrs Pickett knew that the bag was there, and cannot therefore be supposed to have entered into an express contract of safe custody regarding it.

Passing to the first exception of the statute, which I consider in the second place, I, of course, assume in this branch of the case that the bag was not expressly deposited for safe custody, but was simply put into a room which was under the control of the partners. This does not relieve the defenders from the obligation of taking all reasonable care of the property entrusted to them. The question then is, whether reasonable care was taken, or whether the property was stolen through the "default or neglect" of the innkeeper. The Lord Ordinary observes that the effect of the Act of Parliament was "to throw the onus upon the guest, whose property had disappeared in the innkeeper's custody, to prove that it had disappeared through the default or negligence of the innkeeper or his servants," failing which proof the liability is limited to the sum of £30.

To this statement of the law I give my unqualified adhesion. But then if this statement is anything more than an unmeaning generality it means this, that you do not fix responsibility on the innkeeper by proving that under the ordinary conditions of hotel business the property disappeared.

If the guest, as a condition of recovering damages, undertakes the onus of proving negligence, he must be able to say in what the negligence consisted—what is the duty to him which the innkeeper failed to perform.
If he can only say, as the Lord Ordinary has said, in his review of the facts, "that the bag in question was stolen, and that it could not have been stolen but for the negligence of the defenders or their servants," this appears to be only another way of saying that the onus of proving reasonable care lies on the defenders, and that in the absence of evidence as to the cause of the disappearance of the property negligence is to be presumed. I cannot help thinking that in formulating the ground of judgment which I have just quoted, the Lord Ordinary has lost sight of the sounder statement of the criterion of responsibility which he developed in the first part of his opinion. It is common ground that the bag was stolen by persons who had obtained admission to the hotel as guests, and I am not prepared to affirm that the fact that property left in the innkeeper's apartments was stolen is conclusive evidence of negligence on the part of the innkeeper.

It was argued to us that there was positive evidence of negligence, because Nov. 16, 1907. the door of the bar-room was occasionally left unlocked, and only closed by Whitehouse v. the latch. Now, I think the care which an innkeeper is required to take of Pickett. the property of his guest will depend on the part of the house in which the Lord M'Laren. property is left.

If a bag is left by the guest in the coffee-room the innkeeper is responsible for the reputed honesty of his servants, but as these servants must occasionally leave the room, it would be hard on the innkeeper to say that he is to be responsible if the bag is stolen while the room is unguarded. In the case of goods left in a bedroom or in a private sitting-room, perhaps some higher degree of care may be exigible, but in no case can the care required by law be greater in degree than is consistent with the management of a hotel in the ordinary course of business. The bar-room and Messrs Pickett's parlour which opened into it were probably the safest places in the hotel for leaving valuables (assuming that it was not intended that they should be put into the hotel safe), because it was their practice not to leave these rooms unoccupied. But it is one question to consider what was the usual practice, and quite another question—what did the innkeeper bind himself to do in order to keep his guests' property safe? I cannot accept the suggestion that by merely receiving the pursuer's bag Messrs Pickett undertook as a duty to the pursuer that so long as he remained in the hotel they would never for one instant leave these apartments unguarded. I do not see how the business of a hotel could be carried on under such conditions, and if such a condition had been proposed to them I think the defenders would have replied—"We cannot bind ourselves that one of the family shall always be in these rooms, but if you wish to be absolutely secure we will put your jewellery into the safe and undertake responsibility in terms of the statute."

On this part of the case my opinion is that the defenders, by receiving the bag without express instructions, only undertook to take such care of it as was consistent with the primary purposes to which these rooms were appropriated, viz., for the administrative business of the hotel, and I see no evidence of neglect on their part. They had no reason to suspect dishonesty on the part of the inmates of the hotel, and the fact that a gang of thieves, who were watching their opportunity to steal the bag, succeeded in purloining it when the innkeeper was either engaged at the bar or momentarily out of the room, does not in my judgment amount to evidence of negligent performance of the innkeeper's duty to his guests. I have not commented on the authorities which were cited, but I consider that the judgment I propose is consistent with the judgment of the Appeal Court in Medawar v. Grand Hotel Co.,¹ because in that case the judgment was for the defendant when the alleged negligence was only inferential and not supported by positive proof.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor under review should be recalled and the defenders found liable in damages to the extent of £30, and quoad ultra absolved.

LORD PEARSON.—The Innkeepers Liability Act of 1863 altered the

¹ L. R., [1891] 2 Q. B. 11.

Nov. 16, 1907. common law by restricting their liability for the property of their guests to Whitehouse v. £30, except in two cases, namely—(1) where such goods or property shall Pickett. have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ; (2) where such goods or Lord Pearson property shall have been deposited expressly for safe custody with such innkeeper.

In these two cases the liability of the innkeeper is still a total liability.

I am not sure that the Lord Ordinary has sufficiently distinguished these two cases, for he says—"the case mainly insisted in was that the goods having been put into the defenders' custody for safe keeping, and having been stolen through the negligence of the defenders or their servants, they are liable to compensate the pursuer for his loss." But clearly they are separate grounds of liability, and must be considered separately.

I take first the second case, under which the question is, whether the jewellery was deposited expressly for safe custody with the innkeeper, because if such express contract is made out, the total liability of the defenders must be affirmed whether there was negligence on their part or not. In my opinion the evidence does not establish any such deposit within the meaning of the Act. The parole evidence taken by itself is, I think, quite insufficient. Nor do I think the pursuer is more successful in making out a special undertaking to that effect founded on the notice which was exhibited throughout the hotel, bearing that the proprietors would not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but would "take charge of same in office," and adding a reference to the statute. That may well be construed as an invitation to make such a deposit expressly for safe custody as the Act contemplates, but it does not, in my opinion, import that the placing of the goods in the office has of itself that effect.

It remains to consider the other case mentioned in the statute, namely, where the goods are stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of the innkeeper or his servant. It was argued for the pursuer that the burden of proof under this head of liability lies upon the innkeeper, and that it rests with him to shew that he took all due care to prevent the loss of the goods. I do not think that this view is sound. The burden of proof may shift in the course of the inquiry, but in the first instance it lies upon the pursuer to establish the "wilful act, default, or neglect" on which he founds. Here the goods were in the office, having been put there by the defender's servant with the cognisance and approval of the guest, and I take it to be established by the evidence that they were stolen from the office by three very expert thieves acting in concert, in one or other of the methods suggested in the argument. The Lord Ordinary holds—and I agree with him, that there is no direct evidence of negligence. But the ground of his judgment is that on the evidence the bag in question could not have been stolen but for the negligence of the defenders or their servants. I cannot assent to that view. On the contrary I think by far the most probable explanation of the theft, upon the evidence as it stands, is that the thieves—who, be it remembered, were at that time accepted and treated by all concerned as honest guests in the hotel—cheated the hotel officials into a false security by some of the tricks of their trade. This being so, I think the proof of negligence fails.

LORD ARDWALL.—This case raises questions of some difficulty in the Nov. 16, 1907. interpretation of the Act 26 and 27 Vict. chap. 41, and its application to the special circumstances which have been established by the proof. Whitehouse v. Pickett.

The action has been raised for the purpose of recovering from the defenders, who are hotelkeepers at the Imperial Hotel, Edinburgh, the value of a bag of jewellery belonging to the pursuer, which was stolen from the office of the hotel, where it had been deposited by the pursuer's traveller on 17th February 1906. The Lord Ordinary has found that the defenders were guilty of negligence, and has given judgment against them for £1790, 3s. 6d. I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be recalled.

The pursuer's traveller, Mr Buckley, who was well known to the defenders, and had been a frequent guest at their hotel over a period of eighteen years, had been accustomed, and was known by the defenders to be accustomed, to carry with him in addition to his ordinary personal luggage a bag of valuables consisting of samples of jewellery and precious stones for exhibition or sale to the pursuer's customers.

The usual notice as to innkeeper's liability in terms of the Act of 1863 was hung up in the hall of the hotel, but there was another notice exhibited on the wall of the corridor of the first flat of the Imperial Hotel, and, it would appear, also in some of the bedrooms, to the following effect,—“The proprietors of this hotel respectfully beg to intimate that they will not be responsible for any valuables left in bedrooms, but will take charge of same in office. See extract from Act of Parliament, chap. 41, Vict. 26 and 27, in entrance hall.”

On the occasion of Mr Buckley's visit in February 1906, when the bag was stolen, his bag of valuables was, at his sight, deposited by the “boots” in a corner of the office, and he got the number of his bedroom, and the “boots” took his other luggage up to that bedroom. But, as hereafter noticed, nothing was said or done to draw the attention of Mr Reginald Pickett, who was in the office, to the fact that the bag was deposited in the office. The evidence shews that there is always someone either in the office or in the bar parlour which adjoins it, there being a glass door between the two apartments which generally stands open. The bar parlour had, however, an entrance from the public passages of the hotel by a door which is generally unlocked. There is also a door into the office from the corridor, close to the “service” window.

On the occasion of the theft the person in the office (Mr Reginald Pickett) most probably had his attention distracted from the bag by one of the thieves while the other slipped in at the door of the bar parlour and took away the bag. Probably the bag was taken away at the time that Reginald Pickett was receiving the thief's bag at the “service” window for safe custody, and it is worthy of notice that he put it down in the very place from which Mr Buckley's bag had been removed a few seconds before. It appears from Mr Reginald Pickett's evidence that this corner in the office and the bar parlour are the safest places in the hotel for putting bags of valuables, and that indeed the defenders had no other place for depositing such a bag as Mr Buckley's, although they might have put the jewels, after being taken out of the bag, in a small safe. In these circumstances two questions arise. (First) Are the defenders liable in respect of the 2d sub-

Nov. 16, 1907. section of section 1 of the said Act? An able argument was submitted by the pursuer's counsel founded on the notice above quoted, which was said to be a direction to guests in the hotel not to leave any valuables in their bedrooms, but to take them to the office, where the proprietors say they will "take charge of same." It was argued that there could be only one object in depositing the bag in question in the office, namely, to put it in safe custody, and that this was the method of putting valuables into safe custody prescribed by the proprietors of the hotel themselves, and that therefore they are barred from maintaining that valuables put into the office are not put in there expressly for safe custody, or that they are not responsible for them, as they impliedly undertake to be by the said notice. I consider there is very great force in this argument, but as matter of interpretation of the statute I cannot hold that depositing valuables in an office in pursuance of such notice as I have quoted, without saying a word about them to the person in charge of the office or hotel, would amount in the words of the Act to "depositing them expressly for safe custody" with the innkeeper.

(Second) But assuming that the pursuer cannot bring his case within subsection 2, the question still remains whether the defenders are not liable under subsection 1, which is in the following terms:—"Where such goods or property shall have been stolen, lost, or injured through the wilful act, default, or neglect of such innkeeper or any servant in his employ." The question under this section is whether the bag in question was stolen or lost through the default or neglect of the defenders or their servants.

According to the evidence of the defenders themselves, the only place where valuables contained in a bag of some bulk could be so deposited in their hotel was the office and bar parlour. These were the safest places in this hotel for the custody of valuables; and further, the office was the place where the defenders invited their guests to deposit their valuables, and undertook to "take charge" of them. This being so, I am of opinion that if Mr Buckley had either handed his bag to Mr Pickett to take charge of, or had said to Mr Pickett, "That is a bag containing valuables, and I must ask you to take charge of it," a special duty would have been laid upon the defenders, and that in the circumstances it would have been their duty not only always to have had some person in the office, but also when there was only one person there who had various duties to discharge at the service window and otherwise, that they should have taken care to have had both the doors locked, so that persons could not slip in and make away with valuables when the single occupant of the two rooms was engaged in other ordinary and necessary duties. But the facts raise a very different case, for I hold it clearly established by the evidence alike of Mr Buckley, Mr Pickett, and the witness James Sim, that the bag was deposited in the corner of the office behind an ice-chest without a word being said to Mr Pickett about the matter or his attention drawn to the bag in any way whatever. It seems that when Mr Buckley and Sim entered the office Mr Reginald Pickett was taking his dinner in the back parlour and came forward just as they were entering, looked up a book and gave a number to the "boots," and then went out with Mr Buckley to introduce him to some friend of his in the coffee-room. So little was Mr R. Pickett aware that a bag of any kind, not to say of value- Nov. 16, 1907.

ables, had been deposited in the corner of the office, that when later ^{Whitehouse v.} on in the evening he went to deposit the bag, handed in by one of the ^{Pickett.}
thieves, in the same corner, he did not know that there should have ^{Lord Ardwall.} been another bag there. Then it appears from Mr Buckley's own evidence, which is corroborated by the evidence of the Picketts, that on the occasion of Mr Buckley's visits his bag of valuables was never as a rule given in charge to either of the Messrs Pickett or other person in the office, but was put at Mr Buckley's pleasure either in the corner from which it was stolen on the occasion in question, or beside the safe under the sideboard in the bar parlour, and then, if Mr Buckley wished to take it out for the purpose of going his round of customers with it, he just went in and took it out as it suited himself; and finally at night when it was no longer matter of convenience for him to have the bag on the first floor, and when he could watch it himself, he walked into either the parlour or the office as the case might be and took the bag up to his bedroom without apparently saying anything about it to anyone. Indeed, it was when he wished to take the bag up to his bedroom on the occasion in question that he discovered that it had disappeared. This being the regular course of conduct on the part of Mr Buckley, it can hardly be suggested that the defenders had any special duty with regard to his bag, nor did he consider it of importance to lay any such duty upon them, which perhaps might have interfered with his having such ready access to the bag as he usually seems to have had. He chose to leave the bag in one or other of the places I have mentioned, content with the amount of security that was afforded by its being out of the view of the public, and in private rooms dedicated to the use of the managers of the hotel, and to which in the ordinary case the public had not access, although apparently privileged customers like Mr Buckley were allowed to come in and out without any locking or unlocking of the doors which led into the passages of the hotel.

In these circumstances I do not think it can be held that the defenders were under any duty to take the special precautions I have above alluded to, and which I think they would have been bound to take if the bag had been in any way, however informally, put under their charge, even though not "expressly for safe custody." They gave the pursuer's bag, and apparently those of other persons what might be called house-room in any part that the customers pleased of the office or bar parlour, but they came under no obligation, express or implied, to work these two rooms otherwise than they were accustomed to do in the ordinary service of the hotel, and if customers chose to take advantage of the permission to leave their bags in these rooms and at the same time to have absolute freedom of access to them whenever they pleased, but without giving warning of any kind to the hotelkeepers that they were putting valuable property under their charge, I do not think that they can impute neglect to the hotelkeepers for not taking precautions beyond those which they usually took to exclude the public from their private rooms.

I may add that it appears to me that the principal neglect in the case was on the part of Mr Buckley in not putting his bag in special charge of the hotelkeepers. It was suggested that it was the duty of James Sim,

Nov. 16, 1907. the "boots," to have done this when he took the bag into the office, and that he was negligent in not doing so. I cannot accept this view of the case. The "boots" was merely the hand of Mr Buckley in carrying in and depositing his bag, and it was for Mr Buckley himself, and not the "boots," to tell Mr Pickett that he was giving the bag into his charge. For these reasons I am unable to hold that negligence within the meaning of the first section of the Act had been proved against the defenders. I accordingly think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled and the defenders assoilzied, with expenses.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and found " (1) that the pursuer's traveller did not deposit the bag of jewellery mentioned on record with the defenders expressly for safe custody, and (2) that it is not proved that the defenders negligently failed to take proper care of the said bag and contents: Ordain the defenders, jointly and severally, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £30 sterling tendered by them on record, with interest thereon as concluded for, in full of the conclusions of the summons: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders, and decern."

CUTHBERT & MARCHBANK, S.S.C.—GARDINER & MACFIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 37. MRS MARGARET BROWNLEE (Brownlee's Executrix), Pursuer (Respondent).—Hunter, K.C.—Morison, K.C.—T. G. Robertson.
Nov. 29, 1907. ROBERT BROWNLEE Junior, Defender (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Campbell
—Graham Stewart, K.C.—More.
Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

Donation—Animus Donandi—Delivery—Proof.—On 24th December 1903 the books of Robert Brownlee junior contained an account-current between him and his father, Robert Brownlee senior, which shewed a balance of £1653, 8s. 6d. at the credit of the father. At the same date the account was squared by an entry of "To cash, £1653, 8s. 6d.," and a docquet was appended, which was signed by Robert Brownlee senior, in these terms "Settled this date."

Of the same date a receipt was granted by the father to the son for £1653, 8s. 6d. "as per account rendered." No cash passed between the parties. At the same date the son gave a receipt to his sister, Miss Brownlee, for £1653, 8s. 6d., and she was credited in his books with that amount.

On 22d February 1904 Robert Brownlee junior gave his father a written guarantee that Miss Brownlee would pay him £2000.

On 16th March 1904 Robert Brownlee junior, by Miss Brownlee's instructions, paid the £1653 and interest to the father's agents.

In an action brought by the father's executrix in 1905 against Robert Brownlee junior for payment of the £2000, the question arose whether in March 1904 the sum of £1653, 8s. 6d. belonged to the father or to the daughter.

The defender alleged that it had been gifted by the father to the daughter on 24th December 1903, and contended that the documents above mentioned instructed an absolute title in the daughter, and, therefore, that the £1653 had been paid by the daughter, and the defender's liability under the guarantee reduced by that amount.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Salvesen) that as the defender admitted that the sum due by him to his father had not been paid by him to his father on 24th December 1903, the onus lay upon him to prove (1) that the father had transferred the title to Miss Brownlee, and (2) that he had done so animo donandi; and that the writings did not, by themselves or along with the parole evidence, instruct either the transfer to her or the Nov. 29, 1907.

animus donandi.

THE pursuer in this action was Mrs Margaret Irvine or Colquhoun or Brownlee, the widow and sole executrix of the deceased Robert Brownlee senior, Glasgow, who died on 29th March 1905, and the defender was Robert Brownlee junior, his son.

Brownlee's
 Executrix v.
 Brownlee.

1ST DIVISION.
 Lord Salvesen.

The action concluded for payment of £2000 alleged to be due to the deceased's estate by the defender under a letter by which he guaranteed payment of that sum by his sister, Miss Catherine Brownlee, to the deceased, to enable him to make a provision for Mrs Barr, his daughter by a former marriage.

In his defences Robert Brownlee junior stated that on 24th December 1903 a sum of £1653, due by him to his father, was by the father transferred to his daughter Catherine as a gift, and that on 16th March 1904 this sum was paid by her to her father, thereby reducing the defender's liability as cautioner by that amount.

The pursuer in answer stated that this sum was not transferred to or gifted by the father to his daughter, and remained his property.

The circumstances in which the action arose and the nature of the action are fully stated in the Lord Ordinary's note.

On 6th November 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen), after a proof, ordained the defender "to make payment to the pursuer of £1950 sterling in full of the conclusions of the summons." *

* " OPINION.—The late Robert Brownlee senior was thrice married. By his first marriage he had one daughter, now Mrs Barr. By his second marriage he had two children, the defender and Catherine Brownlee. During the lifetime of his second wife he contracted an intimacy with Mrs Colquhoun, the pursuer in this action, who was then a widow. After the death of his second wife he continued this intimacy with Mrs Colquhoun until 1901, when he married her. The defender and his sister were much opposed to this marriage, and it was kept a secret from them, at all events from Catherine Brownlee. Although the deceased continued on affectionate relations with his wife and regularly visited her, they did not live together, but I see no reason to doubt the pursuer's statement that he would have married her much earlier but for his fear of the defender and Miss Brownlee.

" The deceased was in business for many years as a timber merchant, and was so successful that at one time he seems to have been possessed of a fortune of over £100,000. During his lifetime he distributed his means amongst his near relatives, so that at the time of his death he was absolutely without means; and his funeral expenses have not yet been paid by any of those who benefited by his bounty. The pursuer is his executrix and universal legatory under a holograph settlement which he executed about a year before his death.

" In 1891 the deceased made over to the defender a sum of £30,000, which is admitted by him to have been in large measure a gift. There is contemporaneous evidence that the deceased intended only to lend this sum to his son, but he did not obtain any acknowledgment of the terms upon which the money was given, and the defender refused to give any such acknowledgment, maintaining that the money had been gifted to him. Some years later Catherine Brownlee received a sum of £17,000, in respect of which she granted a full discharge of her rights of legitim. She said in evidence that she told her father at the time that, notwithstanding this discharge, she would expect him to make her further payments; and she admits having received at least £2100 worth of shares subsequently. The pursuer also from time to time obtained sums of money from the deceased, but there is no evidence which enables me to fix the amount. The defen-

Nov. 29, 1907.

Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The documents produced shewed that on 24th December 1903 £1653 was completely and unconditionally transferred by the deceased to Miss Brownlee. The documents themselves were her title, and it was unnecessary for her to prove any other. If the money were now claimed on behalf of the deceased, it could only be on the ground that it had been handed to Miss Brownlee in trust; that could only be proved by her writ or oath, and no such evidence was forthcoming. The authorities relied on by the pursuer were all inapplicable, dealing as they did with the transference of money by indorsement of a deposit-receipt. The ratio of these decisions was that the indorsement of a deposit-receipt was not in itself a complete transference of the money which it represented, and that consequently further proof was required of the title on which the property was acquired. But where, as in the present der and his sister seem to have entertained feelings of intense animosity towards Mrs Colquhoun, so much so that Miss Brownlee admitted in the witness-box that Mrs Colquhoun was to her like a red rag to a bull, and that she could not control either her language or her actings in her presence.

“ In the beginning of 1904 Mrs Barr, having heard of her father's extensive alienations of his estate, thought that it was time that she too was putting in a claim for a share. She had reason to believe, from what her father had told her, that one-third of the sum of £30,000 transferred to the defender's account had been intended as a provision for her. Her father seems to have recognised the justice of her claim, and negotiations were opened between the agents of the parties, which resulted in the deceased undertaking to pay Mrs Barr a sum of £5000. A hitch occurred in the settlement, due to the fact that the deceased's only available means at that time seem to have consisted of a sum of £3000 due to him by the Limited Company which had taken over his business and mills. He accordingly endeavoured to withdraw from his obligation. The defender was aware that Mrs Barr claimed that a share of the money which had been transferred by his father to him had been so transferred for her behoof, and he was accordingly interested in having a settlement effected. Some negotiations followed, and finally a meeting took place on the 23d of February 1904, at which Mrs Barr agreed, on payment to her of £5000, to discharge her right of legitim and all other claims which might be competent to her against the deceased, the defender, Miss Catherine Brownlee, and Mrs Colquhoun, or any of them. In order to get this settlement carried through, the defender at the same time wrote and delivered the letter of guarantee which is printed on page 7 of the Record.* He says that before

* The document referred to was as follows:—

“ Glasgow, 23d February 1904.

“ James Findlay, Esq., Writer, Glasgow.

“ Dear Sir,—I hereby authorise you to make payment to my daughter Mrs Marion Brownlee or Barr of the sum of £5000, in exchange for a discharge by her of her right of legitim and of all other claims which may be competent to her against me, my son Robert, my daughter Catherine, and Mrs Margaret Irvine or Colquhoun or Brownlee, or any of them.—Yours faithfully,

ROBERT BROWNLEE.

“ Robert Brownlee, Esq.

“ Glasgow, 23d February 1904.

“ Dear Father,—With reference to the foregoing, I hereby guarantee payment to you by my sister Catherine of the sum of £2000 towards payment of the within-mentioned sum of £5000.—Yours faithfully, case, the assignment of the property was complete, there was no necessity for the defender to prove donation.¹ Even if it were necessary, the documents together with the parole evidence were sufficient to establish not only delivery of the money, but also the intention of the deceased to bestow it on Miss Brownlee as a gift. Nov. 29, 1907.

“ ROB. BROWNLEE JR.”

Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was the defender's case on record that Miss Brownlee had acquired the money by donation. In such circumstances it was necessary for the alleged donee to prove not merely delivery, but also the intention to make the gift. This was the law, whether the transference was complete or incomplete, and whether it was effected by delivery of a document of title or of the property itself. This rule had been exemplified mainly in cases relating to the indorsation of deposit-receipts,² but it applied equally to the present case. Here the evidence in support of donation was wholly insufficient. The documents founded on did not shew with what intention the assignation of the property in favour of Miss Brownlee was made doing so he had the authority of his sister Catherine to pay over a sum of £1718, which was standing at her credit in his books, and that he took the risk of inducing her to contribute also the balance. At the time that this arrangement was made the defender's position was that he declined to contribute any funds towards a settlement with Mrs Barr out of his own pocket, although he strongly resisted a proposed arrangement between Mrs Barr and the deceased that she should accept £3000 from him, and have her claim against the defender reserved.

"Mrs Barr and her agent naturally expected that the settlement would be carried out at once, but as there was some delay in doing so, Mrs Barr served an action on the deceased for payment of the £5000. Further procedure, however, was obviated by the deceased paying, on 14th March, the sum at his credit in the books of Brownlee & Company, Limited, amounting, with interest, to £3018, 14s. 10d. About the same date the defender signed a cheque for £1718, 8s. as his sister's contribution to a settlement, but refused to make any further payment. The balance of £262 was thereupon advanced by the pursuer in order that the settlement might be carried through, and this was accordingly done. In return for the £5000 Mrs Barr delivered a discharge in terms of the letter of 23d February 1904.

"The sum of £1718, 8s. paid by the defender's cheque is said to have consisted of a sum of £1653, 8s. 6d., and interest from 24th December 1903, which at that date stood at the credit of the deceased in the books of the defender, and bore to have been paid in cash. In the same books the exact amount is credited to Miss Brownlee on the same date, and it is to this transaction that the bulk of the evidence relates.

"The pursuer's case is a perfectly simple one. She sues upon the guarantee for £2000, which she found in the repositories of the deceased. She maintains that, according to its true construction, the defender guaranteed the payment by his sister Catherine out of her own funds of the sum of £2000 towards payment of the £5000 which the deceased had agreed to pay Mrs Barr, and she says that she has now discovered that no part of that sum has been contributed by Miss Brownlee. The deceased received no obligation from Miss Brownlee to pay any sum, and accordingly the pursuer now seeks to enforce the guarantee against the defender to its full amount.

"On record the defender disputes his liability to make payment of any sum, his defence being that his father wrote to him to make up the balance

¹ Macfarlane's Trustees v. Miller, July 20, 1898, 25 R. 1201.

² Crosbie's Trustees v. Wright, May 28, 1880, 7 R. 823; Jamieson v. M'Leod, July 13, 1880, 7 R. 1131; Sharp v. Paton, June 21, 1883, 10 R. 1000; Dawson v. M'Kenzie, Dec. 8, 1891, 19 R. 261.

Nov. 29, 1907. by the deceased; they did not even prove that such an assignation was made at all. The parole evidence of donation, resting as it did on the uncorroborated testimony of the defender and his sister, contradicted by such direct evidence as there was of the true state of mind of the deceased, gave no support to the defender's case.

Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts out of which this case arose are so clearly and fully stated by the Lord Ordinary that it would be useless for me to repeat them. The story of the gradual absorption of old Mr Brownlee's fortune by his nearest relatives is pathetic enough, and were it adequately described would seem more like the closing scenes of the life of Père Goriot than the history of a middle class family in Glasgow. Sympathy, however, is an ill basis for a judgment. And even were it not so, I do not think there of £262, 17s. 3d., and that, as the result of an interview between the parties, he waived all claim under the guarantee. It is not, however, now disputed that the defender cannot rely upon this alleged verbal waiver as a discharge of his obligation, and that in any event he is liable for a sum of £281, 12s., being the difference between the £2000 guaranteed and the £1718, 8s. On the other hand, the pursuer has not endeavoured to prove that the sum of £50, which was included in that remittance, was not paid out of the proper funds of Miss Brownlee, and accordingly the sole controversy between the parties now relates to the sum of £1653 already referred to. The defender's case on record is that this sum was gifted by his father to Miss Catherine Brownlee on 24th December 1903, and that accordingly, when he remitted it on 16th March thereafter, he to that extent implemented his guarantee.

“On the motion of both parties, a proof was allowed habili modo, and parole evidence bearing on the transaction of 24th December was led without objection. The defender's counsel, however, now pleads that the documentary evidence is all that can competently be looked at, and that that evidence instructs that there was in effect an assignment by the deceased to his daughter of this sum of £1653; that either this assignment was by way of gift or was made in trust for behoof of the grantor; that in the latter case the trust can only be established by the writ or oath of the trustee; and that the pursuer's position in this process cannot be any better than if she had brought her action against Catherine Brownlee for payment of the £1653. He protested accordingly against the view that it lay upon the defender to instruct that a donation of £1653 was made to Miss Brownlee on the occasion in question. This ingenious argument, which I hope I have correctly apprehended, was supported by a reference to the case of Dunn v. Pratt, 1898, 25 R. 461.

“In order to deal with this argument it is necessary to consider what are the documents founded on. They consist, in the first place, of an account current, No. 17 of process, between the deceased and the defender. It contains an entry opposite the date 24th December ‘To Cash, £1653, 8s. 6d.,’ which squares the account, and contains a docquet signed by the deceased in these terms, ‘Settled this date.’ There is also a simple receipt, No. 18 of process, of the same date, for the same sum. These are the only documents under the hand of the deceased, and so far as they go they instruct that the account was settled by a payment in cash. It is admitted, however, that no cash passed. The defender, however, founds upon two other documents, the first a simple receipt, bearing date 24th December 1903, in favour of Miss Brownlee for the sum of £1653, 8s. 6d., signed by himself, and a corresponding entry to her credit in his books. These four documents, taken together, he contends, are equivalent in law to a simple assignment under the hand of the deceased in favour of Miss Catherine is room for any in this case. As was naïvely said in the proof by the defender, "the old man had been ground between two millstones," and what your Lordships have to decide is to which of the two millstones this, the very last piece of grist, shall stick. Nov. 29, 1907.

Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

The case of the pursuer is simple enough, being based on an undisputed guarantee by the defender; and the defence is simply that the sum guaranteed, with the exception of a small sum, has been already paid by Miss Brownlee. All turns on whether the sum of £1653 really belonged to old Mr Brownlee or to Miss Brownlee. That sum of £1653 admittedly first appears as a sum of money due by the defender to his father, old Mr Brownlee. Appearing in the defender's books as a credit entry in an account between the deceased and him, it is squared by a debit entry to cash of the same amount. Admittedly no cash passed. But at the same Ld. President.

Brownlee. If, accordingly, an action had been brought against Miss Brownlee, she would have been entitled to have pleaded the Act of 1696, and as no document has been produced qualifying the absolute character of the assignment, the pursuer's case must necessarily have failed, unless she had chosen to refer it to the oath of the trustee.

"In my opinion, this argument fails on two grounds. In the first place, I do not think that the documents are to be treated as equivalent to a formal assignation by the deceased in favour of Miss Brownlee. If such a document had been subscribed, there would have been prima facie evidence of the authority to transfer. Here the documents unconnected by parole evidence instruct no authority. The case of Dunn v. Pratt is differentiated because the pursuer himself supplied the link that would otherwise have been required by averring that the title to the property had, by his authority, been taken in the name of the defender. In the second place, the Trust Act can, I think, only be pleaded by the alleged trustee, and not by a third party. The defender suggests that an action for the £1653, 8s. 6d. might properly have been directed against Miss Brownlee. I cannot conceive what claim the pursuer could have had against her. On the assumption that the £1653 belonged to the deceased it has, so far as Miss Brownlee is concerned, been paid. The action against the defender is based on his own letter of guarantee that £2000 of her money should be made available for payment of the money due to Mrs Barr.

"The question, however, remains whether the £1653 was, in March 1904, the property of Miss Brownlee or of the deceased. If it was Miss Brownlee's, it can only have become so by its having been gifted to her by the deceased on the 24th of December 1903. The onus of proving donation is, of course, upon the defender; but I am far from saying that the evidence of the donee and of the defender, who is mainly interested in supporting the theory of donation, might not be sufficient, corroborated as it is by the receipt under the deceased's own hand, if that evidence had satisfied me that the deceased intended to make such a donation, and fully understood that he had done so. The value of the receipt as an adminicle of evidence is, however, completely destroyed by the letter No. 85 of process and the subsequent letter, the draft of which is No. 94 of process. The first of these letters [addressed to Mr Sinclair, a clerk in the defender's office] is dated 19th January 1904, less than a month after the alleged gift, and followed upon an examination of the deceased's account by him in the books kept at the office of the Limited Company. It is in these terms:—'Yesterday I understood you to say that my account with Mr Robert was squared, while according to your own statement of 24th December last there was at that date a balance of £1653, 8s. 6d. in my favour. Will you kindly explain by return what became of this balance,

Nov. 29, 1907. time a receipt was granted by old Mr Brownlee, and in the defender's books in an account with his sister a credit entry of the same amount is made to her; and eventually it is this sum which is paid away for the payment secured by the guarantee. In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary, treating

Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

Ld. President. the case as one of donation, has held that the onus on the defender to prove donation has not been discharged, and that accordingly, the £1653 being the property of old Mr Brownlee, no payment was made by Miss Brownlee of that sum, and the obligation in the guarantee becomes prestable.

Before your Lordships, however, the Dean of Faculty strenuously urged that there was here no necessity to prove donation, because the transaction between old Mr Brownlee and Miss Brownlee was a completed one; and that the onus of proving donation only arose when there was no completed and oblige.—Yours truly, Robert Brownlee.' The reply to this letter, dated 20th January (No. 94), was admittedly instructed or dictated by the defender, and is a merely formal letter that the statement had been settled 'as per enclosed copy receipt.' To this a reply was sent asking particulars of the alleged settlement in a perfectly civil way.* The defender does not think he received a letter in these terms; but I am satisfied from the evidence of Sinclair that he did, and that it made him very angry. The letter itself was destroyed and was never answered. These two letters are, to my mind, most instructive. They shew that the deceased Robert Brownlee did not know when he wrote them that he had made a gift of the money to his daughter, and what is even more important, the defender did not venture to suggest that at the time, although in evidence he puts forward a more or less circumstantial story. If he believed that his father's memory was failing him, nothing would have been easier than for him to have reminded his father of what had taken place, and of the £1653 having been transferred to his sister's name with his authority. The letter of 20th January is, to my mind, most disingenuous, because it relies on a receipt for payment of a sum in cash which the defender well knew had never been made.

"It does not avail the defender to say, as he now does, that the two letters I have referred to were written by young Colquhoun, and that his father could not have known the contents of what he was subscribing. If that were so, it would equally apply to the receipt and docquet on the

*

"City Saw Mills, Port Dundas,
"Glasgow, 20th January 1904.

"Robert Brownlee, Esq.,
"24 Burnbank Terrace.

"Dear Sir,—Replying to your favour of yesterday, I beg to state that the statement rendered on 24th ult., amounting to £1653, 8s. 6d. was settled by you on that date, and I herewith enclose you copy of your receipt.

"I sent to Mr Findlay a detailed statement of this account.—Yours truly, JAMES SINCLAIR."

Note in pencil on back of above.

"I have yours to-day and note explanation, but cannot remember either uplifting the £1653 or paying it away afterwards. If you can give me any information as to what I intended to do with it, I shall be obliged. You might say in what form the money was paid to me; also by whose instructions the statement of the account you refer to was sent to Mr Findlay, as I cannot understand for what purpose this was done. I am sorry to give you so much trouble about this, but my memory has quite failed me in this, and I cannot find any note of this transaction in my books.—Yours truly, transference, but where the titulus transferendi was a document of ambiguous Nov. 29, 1907. import, such as, for instance, an indorsed deposit-receipt; indeed, he went so far as to urge that the law on deposit-receipts formed a kind of special chapter which could not be applied to other subjects. In my opinion this position is unsound. I do not think there is any difference in principle between the cases of donation where the subject of the donation is money exigible as against the bank with which it is deposited in virtue of a deposit-receipt, and cases where the subject is something else. The only peculiarities of deposit-receipts consist in the consideration of how far indorsation of the deposit-receipt is equivalent to delivery of the money alleged to be donated.
"ROBERT BROWNLEE."

The rule seems to be this: When a person is asked to give up something, be it land, corporeal moveables, or money, which he has reduced into possesaccount, and would destroy their value as adminicles of evidence in support of the alleged donation. But further, I am of opinion that if there was undue influence used, it was by the defender and his sister, and not by the Colquhouns; and an incident which arose later, and which depended mainly on the evidence led for the defence, illustrates this.

"The defender says he received a third letter, now destroyed, from his father asking him for payment of the balance of £262, being the amount which had been supplied by Mrs Colquhoun in order to make up the £5000. The defender was admittedly due this, and even a larger sum under the guarantee; but the receipt of the letter seems to have put him into a violent temper. He at once went off to his father, and, according to Miss Brownlee, there were high words, I should imagine entirely on the defender's side, which resulted in the defender's father, an old man of 88 or 89, apologising for having made such a demand. This matter is founded upon by the defender in order to establish a verbal waiver by his father of what is now admitted to be a good claim of debt. It could obviously not be used for such a purpose with any effect, seeing that the obligation said to be verbally waived rests upon a writing preserved by the obligee; but it throws a strong light on the defender's methods of dealing with his father; and of the dominant influence which he possessed over him.

"I am not overlooking the fact that at the same time as the deceased is alleged to have made the gift of money to his daughter he also executed gratuitous transfers in her favour of certain shares, and that these have not been challenged. There is no evidence, however, in this process, such as we have in the two letters before referred to, that the deceased did not know what he was doing; and the two transactions, therefore, stand upon an entirely different footing.

"With regard to the parole evidence of gift, it consists almost entirely of the evidence of the defender, but slightly corroborated by his sister, for at the interview, when the gift is said to have been made, nothing seems to have been said by the deceased; but he simply signed the documents, which were already made out for his signature, without observation. The conclusion which I draw from the evidence is that the deceased knew that the money was being transferred into his daughter's name for his behoof; but that he never intended to make her a present of it; and what Miss Brownlee is reported to have said to Mrs Barr is strong confirmation of this theory. It may have been in the defender's mind that he would be able to appropriate this sum standing in his sister's name in his books towards implement of the guarantee, and that he had previously obtained her consent to his doing so; but if, as I hold, it was really the deceased's money, this will not avail the defender. Besides, I do not believe that Miss Brownlee was the kind of person who would readily have consented to give up to the

Nov. 29, 1907. where there was a question both upon donation inter vivos and donation mortis causa. The donation inter vivos had been perfected by the indorsement of a deposit-receipt which was followed up by transference of the money to the account of the donee; and the dictum of Lord Adam on Brownlee's Executrix v. Brownlee. which the defenders relied was this: His Lordship, speaking of these deposit-receipts, says ¹:—"This case differs from the preceding in respect that it is not a donatio mortis causa, but a present donation inter vivos. Mrs Miller's title to these deposit-receipts appears to me to be complete." Upon that dictum of Lord Adam the defenders argued that it was complete simply because transference was completely made. But if the case is more narrowly looked at I think it will be found that his Lordship does not mean that, but means that it is complete, taking the evidence as it stands as a whole. On looking back to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, which was being reviewed, the Lord Ordinary treats the matter just in the way in which I have urged that it should be treated, and says this: ²—"In the case of the defender Mrs Miller, the alleged donations were not mortis causa, but inter vivos—they consisted of deposit-receipts of the National Bank which were handed to Mrs Miller, and re-deposited in her own name"—that is to say, the money was re-deposited in her own name—"accordingly the transfer of title was completed absolutely in the lifetime of Mrs Macfarlane. As to the animus donandi, I see no reason to doubt the evidence of Mrs Miller herself, though I did not hear her examined." I think when Lord Adam says that it is made out, it is quite evident he means that it is made out upon the evidence as a whole, and that in that case there was what their Lordships thought was satisfactory evidence of the animus donandi.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right in treating the case as one in which donation had to be proved. As to the onus there is the well-known dictum of Lord President Inglis in Sharp v. Paton,³ approved by Lord President Robertson in Dawson v. M'Kenzie,⁴ that "There is a strong presumption against donation, and it requires very strong and unimpeachable evidence to overcome it." On the facts, tested by that criterion, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and have nothing to add to what he has said.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNAR.—I am also of the same opinion.

LORD PEARSON.—The letter of guarantee on which this action is founded was granted by the defender to his father, with reference to a claim by his half-sister, Mrs Barr, for a sum of £5000 in discharge of her claim for legitim. It appears that the deceased was unwilling to contribute more than £3000; and it was arranged that Mrs Barr's half-sister Catherine should furnish the balance of £2000, and that a letter should be granted by the defender guaranteeing payment to his father by Catherine of that balance. The guarantee was duly signed and delivered by the defender, and was found in the father's repositories at his death. The sum of £5000

¹ 25 R. 1208.

³ 10 R. 1000, at p. 1006.

² 25 R. 1203.

⁴ 19 R. 261, at p. 271.

was paid over to Mrs Barr, who granted a discharge in terms of the letter Nov. 29, 1907. of 23d February 1904.

It clearly appears from the evidence that this balance of £2000, though ostensibly paid out of a credit standing in name of Catherine, was, to the extent of £1653 and interest, paid out of moneys which originally belonged to the father, and which in the December previous had existed in the form of a debt due by the defender to his father on account. Admittedly this was a liquid debt, presently due, and bearing interest in favour of the father, and by a series of book entries, no one of which represented the passing of cash or of securities, the defender so arranged matters that the credit, which was originally in favour of his father, found its way into another account in favour of Catherine. Thus the payment by Catherine towards the £5000 which was required for the settlement with Mrs Barr, was really made out of money or credit which had belonged to the father, and if that be the true view, the guarantee by the defender which was found in the repositories of the deceased remains unfulfilled, and the pursuer is entitled to insist for implement of it.

It is said that the documents themselves are conclusive in favour of the defender. I cannot assent to that view. There are here no documents of title properly so called, and it appears to me that the documents which do exist urgently demand explanation. The real defence here is donation, or, as it is put in answer 4 for the defender, "that on 24th December 1903 Robert Brownlee senior made a gift to his daughter Catherine of a sum of £1653, 8s. 6d., which was lying in the hands of the defender at interest." It is said that this money, originally the father's, was gifted by him to his daughter in order to enable her to make the contribution towards the settlement of Mrs Barr's claim, and that the defender's letter of guarantee was thereby rendered unnecessary, and was practically discharged. In such a case I have no doubt of the competency of a proof of the facts and circumstances, in order to determine the question of donation. But it lies upon the defender to make good his position, and I think he has entirely failed to do so. On the question of the intention to make a gift the statements of the alleged donor and the alleged donee would in general be the best evidence. In this case we have only secondary evidence as to the intention of Mr Brownlee, the alleged donor, and so far as it goes it is adverse to the argument on intention. As to Catherine Brownlee, the alleged donee, her evidence conveys the impression that she knew nothing about it, except what she was told by her brother. Then as to the documents on which the defender relies, these are, to my mind, highly unsatisfactory. They include an exchange of receipts, which gives an appearance of formality to the transaction. But the exchange of receipts in such circumstances, where no moneys or securities pass, may import any one of several things. There is not enough, in my opinion, to instruct the donation alleged, and whether the documents are regarded in themselves, or in the light of the parole evidence, I think the defender's case fails.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur also with the judgment of Lord Pearson.

THE COURT adhered.

DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

Brownlee's
Executrix v.
Brownlee.

Lord Pearson.

No. 38. THE CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—

Lord-Adv. Shaw—D.-F. Campbell—M. P. Fraser—A. Crawford.

Nov. 29, 1907.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—

Clyde, K.C.—Cooper, K.C.—Orr Deas.

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Railway—Road—Bridge—Bridge carrying highway over railway—“Public Highway”—Maintenance of Road—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 39—The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 39, enacts that where a line of railway crosses “any turnpike road or public highway,” and the road is carried over the railway by means of a bridge, such bridge and the approaches thereto “shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the [railway] company.”

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Salvesen) that the words “public highway” applied only to roads which were public de jure.

Railway—Road—Bridge over Railway—Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. cxiv.), secs. 4, 26.—The Caledonian Railway Act, 1872, sec. 4, enacts that the Company “may make and maintain” certain railways, and “may execute the other works and operations hereinafter mentioned.” With reference to one of the railways authorised, which crossed a certain road, sec. 26 enacts:—“In constructing railway No. 2 the following provisions shall be binding on the Company, which shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed . . . (3) the road . . . shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than 40 feet wide.”

The railway company by virtue of the powers conferred on them by secs. 4 and 26 of the foregoing special Act, constructed railway No. 2, and, where it crossed the road, carried the road over the railway by means of a bridge.

Held that since the section of the special Act providing for the construction of the bridge did not specify that the road upon it was to be maintained by the railway company, no such duty lay upon it under the provisions of that Act.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Salvesen.

(ANTE, 8 F. 755.)

On 8th November 1904 the Corporation of the City of Glasgow brought an action against the Caledonian Railway Company, in which they sought for declarator “(First) that Broomfield Road, Cumbernauld Road, and Strathclyde Street, in the city of Glasgow, are public highways, and are respectively carried over the defenders’ railway or railways by means of a bridge or bridges; and (Second) that the defenders are bound at all times to maintain at their own expense the portion or portions of the said Broomfield Road, Cumbernauld Road, and Strathclyde Street, carried over the defenders’ railway or railways by means of a bridge or bridges, including in such maintenance in each case the immediate approaches of such bridge or bridges.”

The pursuers founded on sec. 39 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and pleaded;—(2) The said Broomfield Road, Cumbernauld Road, and Strathclyde Street, being public highways within the meaning of the statute condescended upon, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. (3) The defenders being bound in terms of the statute condescended upon to maintain the specified portions of said streets all as condescended upon, and having declined to recognise any obligation on their part for such maintenance, and refused or unreasonably delayed to implement the same, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second declaratory conclusion of the summons, under reservation as stated.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The defenders not being bound to maintain the specified portions of said streets, all as condescended on, are entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses. (4) The said streets having been declared public streets within the meaning of the Glasgow Police Acts, the defenders are not under obligation to maintain any portion thereof. (5) Strathclyde Street not being a public highway when the defenders' railway was constructed, the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, do not apply to it.

On 17th March 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Low) disposed of the case so far as relating to Broomfield Road and Cumbernauld Road, and appointed the cause to be enrolled for further procedure. On 20th March 1906 his judgment was adhered to by the First Division on a reclaiming note—8 F. 755.

The question as to Strathclyde Street arose in these circumstances:—The Caledonian Railway Company constructed a line of railway in virtue of statutory powers conferred on them by the Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872, which incorporated the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.* This line of railway, referred to in the special Act of 1872 as "Railway No. 2," crossed Strathclyde Street, and at the point of crossing the bridge in question was erected by the company to carry the road over the railway.

On 22d May 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments with reference to Strathclyde Street.

* The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), enacts:—Sec. 39. "If the line of the railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then, except where otherwise provided by the special Act, either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road by means of a bridge, of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided; and such bridge, with the immediate approaches and all other necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company . . ."

The Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. xiv.), enacts:—Sec. 2. " . . . The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 . . . are (except where expressly varied by this Act) incorporated with and form part of this Act."

Sec. 4. "Subject to the provisions of this Act the Company may make and maintain, in the lines and according to the levels shewn on the deposited plans and sections, the railways hereinafter described, and all proper stations, approaches, works, and conveniences in connection therewith respectively, and may execute the other works and operations hereinafter mentioned, and may enter upon, take, and use such of the lands delineated on the said plans and described in the deposited books of reference as may be required for those purposes. The railways and other works and operations hereinbefore referred to and authorised by this Act are . . . a railway in this Act called railway No. 2."

Sec. 26. "In constructing railway No. 2 the following provisions shall be binding on the company, who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed: . . . (3) The road or thoroughfare numbered on the deposited plans 4, in the parish of Calton, may be diverted as shewn on those plans, and shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than 40 feet wide between the parapets, and the diverted portion of road shall be not less than 40 feet wide between the fences."

Nov. 29, 1907. On 23d October 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons in so far as they relate to Strathclyde Street, and decerns."*

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

* "OPINION.—The only conclusion which remains undisposed of in this action is that relating to Strathclyde Street. The pleadings on both sides are singularly meagre. The pursuers aver that Strathclyde Street is a public highway of the city of Glasgow, but there is no averment that at the time when the defenders obtained the private Act of 1872, under which the bridge to which the action relates was constructed, Strathclyde Street was then a public highway. If I had been determining a question of relevancy in the first instance, I should have been prepared to dismiss the conclusions of the action so far as Strathclyde Street was concerned, because, in my opinion, section 39 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act does not impose an obligation on the Railway Company to maintain in all time the surface of the roadway which is carried on the bridge, if at the time when the railway bridge was made the road which it crossed was a private road. On the other hand, the defenders do not say that in 1872 Strathclyde Street was not a public highway, their only averment being that it was a private street maintained by the owners of property fronting or abutting thereon, an averment which is not in the least inconsistent, as Lord Low pointed out (8 F. at p. 760), with Strathclyde Street (at that date) being also a public highway. Both parties, however, concurred in asking a proof, and I think I must now decide the case with reference to the evidence that has been adduced, and not with reference to the pleadings in the case, which might easily have been amended had attention been called to their defective nature.

"The first question which I have to solve is the meaning of the words 'public highway,' used in sec. 39. There is no definition of 'public highway' in the statute, nor is there any case which decides what kind of road will answer the description. Both parties are agreed that it must be a carriage-way, because it has been held that the section does not apply to a footpath—Dartford, L. R., [1898] App. Cas. 210. The pursuers maintained that if such a carriage-way is de facto open to the public, it answers the description of being a public highway, while the defenders contend that not merely must it be open to the public, but that it must be a road over which the public have a right to pass. I prefer the defenders' definition. A public right to use a carriage road belonging to private proprietors may be acquired by prescriptive use, by express grant, or by dedication, but I am unable to see how a private road can be described as a public highway which, although de facto used by the public with consent of the proprietors, may at any time be closed to the public. I proceed, accordingly, to consider whether, in 1872—which is admitted to be the crucial date—Strathclyde Street was a public highway in the sense which I have indicated.

"There is really no substantial controversy between the parties as to the facts although they differ widely as to the inferences to be drawn. Prior to 1854, a carriage road existed substantially on the line of Strathclyde Street as it now exists. It led from Dalmarnock Road to a street which is now called Swanston Street, which also communicates with another part of Dalmarnock Road. Both roads were entirely on the private property of the Dalmarnock Trustees. At that time Swanston Street was known as 'the coal road' having apparently been originally formed in order to give access to a coal pit then being worked on the Dalmarnock estate not very far from the Clyde. There was a line of rails on the road used by the hutchers which conveyed the coal from the pit. Opposite Guthrie's farm there was a gate which went right across the road, and which was always closed on Sundays, but was open the rest of the week. There seems also to have been a gate at the other end. Strathclyde Street was then known as 'the field road,' and apparently passed through agricultural land. It may originally have been a farm road, although its origin has not been ascertained in

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—The words “ public highway ” Nov. 29, 1907.
 in section 39 had a wide signification,¹ and the true test of the question whether or not a street was a “ public highway ” within the meaning Corporation of of section 39 was not whether the public were entitled to use it as a Glasgow v. matter of right, but whether the public did use it as matter of fact. Caledonian
 Railway Co.
 From this point of view the pursuers were plainly right, because the evidence was all to the effect that in 1872 the road was in daily use by members of the public. After the road was taken over as a private street in 1870, the Corporation had duties regarding it of lighting and cleaning, and powers of assessment, which were inconsistent with the idea of its being anything else than a public highway.² The case of the Kinning Park Police Commissioners v. Thomson & Co.,³ cited by the defenders, was distinguishable on the ground that it decided a different question under different statutory provisions.
 Strathclyde Street was, as defined by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866,⁴ this process. In the earliest Ordnance Survey it is described as an occupation road ; and in 1858, when the defenders obtained their first Act of Parliament to construct a railway across it, it is again so described in the Book of Reference. In the disposition by Mr Wilson of Dalmarnock in favour of the Caledonian Railway Company, dated 24th November 1858, it is spoken of as a private road which ‘ may be altered, shut up, or otherwise used by the proprietors of the subjects under description at pleasure, as soon as, and at any time after, the tack of the adjoining ground and offices in favour of Mr James Buchanan comes to an end, by expiry of the time therein stipulated, or in consequence of a sale of the ground, or otherwise.’ I cannot doubt, therefore, that prior to 1858 Strathclyde Street was a private road belonging to the proprietors of Dalmarnock estate. It is also in favour of this contention that the original railway crossed what is now Strathclyde Street on the level, although this, of course, is by no means conclusive. In 1854, however, the owners of Dalmarnock estate commenced to feu the ground fronting Strathclyde Street. The earliest feu-contract was one in favour of Muir, Brown, & Company, who took a feu of 6 acres for the erection of a factory. The northern boundary of this feu is described in the feucontract as ‘ the centre line of a contemplated street of 50 feet wide, and about to be formed of its proper breadth (so far, in the meantime, as bounding the ground thereby disposed) along which it extends 248 feet or thereby.’

 It appears from the same feu-contract that the road was at that time only 15 feet wide. It is quite obvious from this contract that the proprietors of the estate intended and expected that the ground fronting the proposed street would be taken off for industrial purposes. This expectation was not immediately realised. The next feu that was given off was one in April 1863, and the northern boundary of this feu is ‘ the centre of a proposed street of 50 feet in breadth.’ Access is given to the ground ‘ by the road presently in use,’ leading in both directions from the conclusion of Hamilton turnpike road to or near the ground hereby disposed. In 1864 Muir, Brown, & Company took a further feu of 2 acres of ground, with a northern boundary in the same terms. In 1865, 1868, and 1870 further feus were granted, in the last of which the boundary is given as ‘ the centre line of street to be formed, 50 feet in breadth from building line to building line.’
 From the parole evidence it appears that by 1872 all these feus had been covered with buildings used for manufacturing purposes, and that the road

¹ Dartford Rural Council v. Bexley Heath Railway Co., L. R., [1898] A. C. 210, at p. 215.

² Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 40, 302, 318, 344, 357.

³ Feb. 22, 1877, 4 R. 528.

⁴ Sec. 4.

Nov. 29, 1907. "open and accessible to the public," who could not have been excluded from it. The fact that it was referred to in the private Act under which the bridge was built¹ shewed that it was then considered to be a public highway, as, had it been a private street, the provisions of the Act would have been inapplicable. In the Book of Reference relative to that Act, the defenders themselves described it as a road occupied by the public, and having obtained their powers on that representation, they were bound by it, and were not now entitled to take up the position that it was a private street.

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

But, apart from their obligation under section 39 of the Railways Clauses Act, the defenders were bound to maintain the bridge, in respect of the duty imposed on them by the private Act under which the bridge was built.² These provisions, which must be read as a whole, gave the defenders power to construct the railway, but obliged them, if they built the railway, to build the bridge also, and, with in question was in daily use by some hundreds of workmen who were there employed. No doubt also it was used by members of the general public, whom there could be no reason to exclude, having in view the character of the district and the number of people who resorted to it for business purposes. Further, in 1870 the road was taken over under the Glasgow Police Act of 1866 as a private street; and the usual assessment notices were from that time onwards issued to the proprietors on both sides. It then became subject to the jurisdiction of the Magistrates of Glasgow for the purposes of the Act of 1866, so far as that Act applies to private streets (I was referred especially to sections 303 to 308, 311, 318, 344, and 347), and for all practical purposes this was a highway used by the public just like any of the other streets in the city of Glasgow. Further, it may be conceded that it was very unlikely indeed that it would ever be closed to public traffic, in view of the desire of the proprietors to promote more extensive feuing and the character and use of the buildings which had already been erected.

"All this, however, is not inconsistent with the road in question remaining a private road in the sense that it was one over which the public had acquired no legal rights. It was decided in the case of The Kinning Park Commissioners, 4 R. 528, that a private street within burgh may yet remain the property of the owners, and may be closed to the public, although it has been used by the public for many years, short of the prescriptive period. I have already indicated that I am unable to see how a public right can be acquired, except by express grant, by dedication, or by prescriptive use. It is not alleged that there was ever any express grant in favour of the public, and it is plain that in 1872 the road had not existed long enough to have enabled the public to acquire a right of way over it. Nor do I find any evidence of dedication to the public. It was argued by the pursuers that dedication to a body of feuars was equivalent to dedication to the public. In the present case for practical purposes it may have been so, but in law I do not think it was. That was indeed expressly decided in the Kinning Park case, where the street which was closed had been dedicated to the feuars on both sides for purposes of access to their feus, and I fail to see how it can affect the legal question whether the body of feuars is a small or a large one. The right to use the road conferred by the titles is confined to the feuars and tenants on the estate; and although such a contingency was highly improbable, I can see no reason why they should not in 1872 have combined to exclude the public, or even agreed to shut up the road entirely. The road, in other words, was, as Mr Colledge describes it, an estate or feu-

¹ Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872, sec. 26 (3).

² Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872, secs. 4, 26 (3).

regard to the whole of the works thus authorised, laid on them the duty, if they constructed them, of maintaining them as well. The duty of maintenance applied not only to the bridge, but also to the roadway, the case of the Magistrates of Glasgow v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary, having been decided on the construction of a different statute, and having no application to the present case. The obligation to construct the bridge included the obligation to construct and maintain the approaches to the bridge.²

Nov. 29, 1907.
Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Argued for the defenders;—The term “public highway” in sec. 39 of the Railways Clauses Act meant a highway over which the public had a right to pass, and the best test of this was the power of the adjoining proprietors to close the road. At the date when the bridge was built there was no doubt that this could have been done ing road, from which the public were not excluded simply because at that time no interest had emerged which would make that desirable. I accordingly reach the conclusion that Strathclyde Street was not in 1872 a public highway within the meaning of the section founded on.

“It was further contended that the defenders are barred from maintaining that the road was not a public highway by the Book of Reference which they lodged relative to the Act of 1872, and more especially the Book of Reference lodged relative to the Act of 1888, under which they obtained further powers. In the Book of Reference of 1872 the road in question is described as being occupied, inter alios, by the public. That seems to have been accurate enough in point of fact; but if the Railway Company had believed that the road was under public administration, the public body administering it would have been entered as occupiers, and not the public, on whom no notice was or fell to be served. So far as it goes the entry in 1872 seems to me in favour of the defenders. In 1888, however, which was six years before the road was taken over as a public street, the defenders in their Book of Reference described the road as being occupied by the public and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow. In a sense that may have been accurate too, because the Magistrates under the Act of 1866 had certain powers already referred to with regard to the administration of the road as a private street; and they also appear to have been owners of gas and water-pipes in the road. In 1888, however, there was no question as to the maintenance of the road, which was being done entirely at the expense of the frontagers, including the Railway Company. And even if I were satisfied that there was an error in the Book of Reference, I do not see how that can affect the Railway Company’s legal rights, or throw upon them a burden of which, as owners, they had been relieved once and for all when Strathclyde Street was taken over as a public street by the city of Glasgow.

“One other argument for the pursuers remains to be dealt with. They pointed out that the bridge in question remains the property of the defenders, notwithstanding that the street which it now in part supports has been taken over by the city. They contended that the obligation to maintain the bridge therefore remains with the Railway Company; and that it was impracticable to distinguish between the structure of the bridge and the surface of the roadway, which they considered was merely a part of the bridge itself. I confess that I do not see the supposed difficulty. In many parts of the city of Glasgow the solum of the streets belongs to the proprietors on each side, and may be, and in many cases no doubt is, occupied as cellars; yet no practical difficulty arises in ascertaining the liabilities of

¹ May 13, 1895, 22 R. (H. L.) 29.

² Addie’s Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 7, 1906, 8 F. 1047. Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 60.

Nov. 29, 1907.
Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

by the superior and the feuars in concert, for there was no suggestion that the public had acquired any rights, either by express grant or by prescription. That the road had been taken over as a private street under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, did not constitute it a public thoroughfare.¹ Nor could any inference be drawn from the fact that this street was referred to in the private Act of 1872, for all through the Railways Clauses Act provision was made for bridges over roads, whether the latter were private or public.² The provisions of the private Act of 1872 imposed no duty on the defenders to maintain the bridge, seeing that sec. 26, which provided for its construction, said nothing as to its maintenance. In any event, the obligation to maintain did not extend to the roadway over the bridge, the English cases of the North Staffordshire Railway Co. v. Dale,³ and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v. The Mayor of Bury,⁴ being distinguishable. Even if such an obligation existed in 1872, it ceased to exist when the road was taken over by the pursuers as a public street in 1894, for it was an obligation in favour only of the Dalmarnock feuars, and did not transmit to their successors, with whom the defenders had entered into no undertaking. A duty to protect a private interest was different from a duty to protect a public interest, and the change of circumstances relieved the defenders from their obligations.⁵

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the Caledonian Railway Company are bound to maintain the highway which goes over their bridge in Strathclyde Street. The case as argued before the Lord Ordinary seems to have turned entirely upon whether the words “public highway,” as used in section 39 of the Railways Clauses Act, do or do not apply to a road or street in the position of Strathclyde Street. That depends on whether the expression “public highway” means public de jure, or means a highway to which as at the date the public are de facto admitted. Upon this matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think we must take the the respective proprietors in maintaining the roadway. But the very distinction which the pursuers regard as impossible has already been successfully drawn by the House of Lords. In the case Magistrates of Glasgow v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 1895, 22 R. (H. L.) p. 29, it was held that although the Glasgow Magistrates as Public Water Commissioners had authority to lay a line of water pipes in a road which, at two places, was carried on girder bridges belonging to the Railway Company, it was ultra vires of the Commissioners to carry pipes through the stone abutments of the bridges, and sling them from the girders. Lord Watson said,—‘From beginning to end of the clause there is no power given to go beyond the soil and pavement of the bridge’; and he distinguishes between such an operation and one involving serious interference with the structure of the bridge. In short, the maintenance of the surface of the roadway is an entirely separate obligation from the maintenance of the bridge which supports it.

“I accordingly reach the conclusion that the defenders fall to be assoilzied from the only undisposed of conclusions of the action, being those relating to Strathclyde Street.”

¹ Kinning Park Police Commissioners v. Thomson & Co., 4 R. 528.

² Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, secs. 39, 42, 43, 46-49.

³ 1858, 8 E. & B. 836.

⁴ 1889, L. R., 14 A. C. 417.

⁵ Magistrates of Perth v. Earl of Kinnoull, June 28, 1872, 10 Macph. 874.

words "public highway" as meaning public de jure, because I think that is the only thing that squares with the general conception of the Railways Clauses Act.

Nov. 29, 1907.
Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

The Railways Clauses Act of course is an Act of general application which is framed with the view of being read into special Acts which should thereafter come into being. When a railway goes through the country it is quite certain that it will meet roads, and those roads must be in one of two conditions. They must either be public roads in the full sense of the term—that is to say, public roads de jure—whether these roads were turnpike or whether they were statute labour does not matter—or they must be private roads. In the case of a railway meeting a private road it would, of course, be necessary, quite apart from the question of a road, for the railway company to take the land, because, quite apart from the question of the road as a road, the soil belongs to the proprietor a caelo usque ad centrum; and if the railway company want to occupy that soil, at whatever height of the stretch that comes a caelo ad centrum, they must of course take the land. Accordingly I think it follows from that quite clearly that there is no necessity for making any special provision as to what railway companies should do when they cross private roads as roads. Of course the effect of taking a person's road, and going through it and blocking it up, may be of great moment to the proprietor in question, and his interests are safeguarded in the Act in other ways, in particular in two ways; in the first place, there are the sections which give compensation for injurious affection; but, more than that, there are all the sections which deal with what are known as accommodation works. I only mention that to shew that I have not forgotten it, and merely in order to exclude that fasciculus of sections which, beginning with the 16th section of the Scottish Act—and there are corresponding sections in the English Act—deal with the interference which railways may make with roads, not with the view of permanency, but with the view of construction of the line. Those stand by themselves upon another basis. But passing from private roads to public roads there is, of course, nobody from whom to take the surface of the road; the surface of the road does not belong to anyone who can be compensated and paid. Probably at different periods of legal history there have existed different theories as to the actual property of the solum of public roads, and I am not sure that even at this modern time the legal theory in England and in Scotland is quite the same. But however that may be, I think I may say without doubt that no one ever heard of a road authority being compensated for the surface of a public road being taken, and accordingly it was necessary to make some provision that public roads should not be interfered with, and that provision is represented by section 39. It seems to me therefore that upon the construction of the general scope of the Act section 39 was only meant to deal with public roads in the fullest and proper sense of the word—de jure public roads.

That, of course, only leaves the question of fact as to whether this was a public road or not. The Lord Ordinary inquired into the whole matter, and I think has come to a conclusion that cannot be avoided, that this road, at the time this railway was authorised, was not a public road, although no doubt it was a road which was used by large numbers of the public, and no

Nov. 29, 1907. doubt practically would always be so ; but still, and none the less, it seems to me the legal position of the road was that, if the superior of the ground and the whole of the feuars had chosen to come to an agreement, they might have shut up the road if they wished, either replacing it by another or not as seemed good to them. Accordingly, on the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has put his judgment, and so far as the case was argued before him, his judgment is perfectly right.

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

But there is another aspect of the case which was argued before your Lordships, but which was not, I think, argued before the Lord Ordinary, and which, I confess, has given me a great deal more trouble to make up my mind upon than the other, and it is this. This particular bridge owes its existence to a special provision of the Act of 1872 under which it was made—Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. cxiv.). First of all, there is what I may call the ordinary works clause in section 4, and one of the works is a railway called Railway No. 2, which is the railway upon which admittedly this bridge stands. Then in section 26 of the same Act there comes the following provision :—"In constructing Railway No. 2 the following provision shall be binding on the Company, who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed." Then certain works, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, are specified, and then subsection 3 says :—"The road or thoroughfare numbered on the deposited plans 4, in the parish of Calton, may be diverted as shewn on those plans, and shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than forty feet wide between the parapets, and the diverted portion of road shall be not less than forty feet wide between the fences." The bridge which is there referred to is admittedly this bridge over Strathclyde Street ; and accordingly the question is whether the fact of this particular bridge being a special work enjoined by the Act of Parliament does not impose upon the Railway Company, quite apart from the general sections of the statute, the duty to maintain.

The 4th section of the Act, the works clause, says that the Company may make and maintain the works aftermentioned, and undoubtedly this bridge is one of the works aftermentioned. But I think it is quite certain that, although at one time it was held both in this Court and in England that such a provision created a contract between the Company and anybody who could shew an interest that the works should be carried out, that doctrine was long ago upset, and the law in this Court was laid down first in the case of Lord Blantyre,¹ and was approved by the House of Lords in several cases, and especially in the case of Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway Company v. Philip.² It is not merely well settled, I think, that, as regards construction, the powers are permissive merely, but I notice there is quite a recent case in which that has been in terms applied not only to the construction, but to the maintenance of a work once constructed. I refer to the case Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company.³ Accordingly, upon those authorities it is, I think, quite clear that the Railway Company are not bound to maintain in respect of the works clause.

¹ 1853, 16 D. 90.

² 1857, 2 Macq. 514.

³ 1893, 62 L. J. Q. B. 572.

Clause 26, however, is not permissive. That clause is an obligatory clause Nov. 29, 1907. on the Railway Company if they construct Railway No. 2 at all. They Corporation of need not construct Railway No. 2, but if they do, then clause 26 is obligatory. Glasgow v.
 Therefore, it is quite certain that they were bound, whether they liked it or Caledonian not, if they diverted the road, to carry it by this bridge over the railway; Railway Co.
 and the whole question therefore comes to be, What is the effect of the Ld. President.
 omission of the word "maintain"?

So far as I can discover, and I have searched with considerable diligence the authorities, this is a new question. I have not been able to discover any case in either England or Scotland where that question arose as in the case of a work which was specially enjoined by the special Act. I have not found a case where the thing in question is a bridge specially enjoined by the special Act and crossing a private road. There are plenty of cases where the bridge specially provided for crosses a public road, but then, of course, the peculiar question does not arise, because it is perfectly obvious that the general sections apply. But upon the best consideration the only conclusion I can come to is that the omission of the word "maintain" is fatal to the construction of the pursuers. It seems to me that the very anxiety with which in the general statute the word "maintain" is always put in shews that if it were not there there would not be an obligation of maintenance. "Maintain" is put in not only in section 39, but it is put in also in all the clauses that deal with accommodation works. In a clause of this sort I think that the person who was stipulating for the work, who, I suppose, would be the proprietor, must fairly be taken as proferens of the clause, and that the clause must be construed literally according as it stands. I am not omitting the consideration that I think this argument really logically leads to this, that the Railway Company are not bound to maintain the structure of the bridge any more than they are to maintain the roadway. I say that notwithstanding the concession on the part of the Railway Company's counsel in one part of the argument that they were so bound. I do not think that concession ought logically to be made. But I do not think that fact in any way shocks me, for this very good reason, that it would be perfectly evident that the Railway Company would be bound to maintain the structure of the bridge, not because they were made to by the terms of the obligation, but for their own security. If they allowed the bridge, being an overhead bridge, to get out of order and become in a dangerous condition, it is quite evident that they would subject their own property to grave risk, and subject themselves to very grave risk of damages if through the falling of any portion of the bridge anybody who was using their railway was hurt. Therefore I do not think that the absence of an actual clause binding them to maintain the structure of the bridge very much matters. Upon the whole matter, and I found the point one of some difficulty upon which to make up my mind, I have come to the conclusion that in a doubtful case we must take the Act as we find it, and inasmuch as there is an obvious distinction made between making and maintaining in other sections where we find making and maintaining, this section must be read literally as it stands. Consequently here there is no obligation upon the Railway Company to maintain this bridge upon the ground of the special clause, because maintenance is not there expressed,

Nov. 29, 1907. doubt practically would always be so ; but still, and none the less, it seems to me the legal position of the road was that, if the superior of the ground and the whole of the feuars had chosen to come to an agreement, they might have shut up the road if they wished, either replacing it by another or not as seemed good to them. Accordingly, on the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has put his judgment, and so far as the case was argued before him, his judgment is perfectly right.

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

But there is another aspect of the case which was argued before your Lordships, but which was not, I think, argued before the Lord Ordinary, and which, I confess, has given me a great deal more trouble to make up my mind upon than the other, and it is this. This particular bridge owes its existence to a special provision of the Act of 1872 under which it was made—Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. cxiv.). First of all, there is what I may call the ordinary works clause in section 4, and one of the works is a railway called Railway No. 2, which is the railway upon which admittedly this bridge stands. Then in section 26 of the same Act there comes the following provision:—"In constructing Railway No. 2 the following provision shall be binding on the Company, who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed." Then certain works, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, are specified, and then subsection 3 says:—"The road or thoroughfare numbered on the deposited plans 4, in the parish of Calton, may be diverted as shewn on those plans, and shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than forty feet wide between the parapets, and the diverted portion of road shall be not less than forty feet wide between the fences." The bridge which is there referred to is admittedly this bridge over Strathclyde Street ; and accordingly the question is whether the fact of this particular bridge being a special work enjoined by the Act of Parliament does not impose upon the Railway Company, quite apart from the general sections of the statute, the duty to maintain.

The 4th section of the Act, the works clause, says that the Company may make and maintain the works aftermentioned, and undoubtedly this bridge is one of the works aftermentioned. But I think it is quite certain that, although at one time it was held both in this Court and in England that such a provision created a contract between the Company and anybody who could shew an interest that the works should be carried out, that doctrine was long ago upset, and the law in this Court was laid down first in the case of Lord Blantyre,¹ and was approved by the House of Lords in several cases, and especially in the case of Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway Company v. Philip.² It is not merely well settled, I think, that, as regards construction, the powers are permissive merely, but I notice there is quite a recent case in which that has been in terms applied not only to the construction, but to the maintenance of a work once constructed. I refer to the case Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company.³ Accordingly, upon those authorities it is, I think, quite clear that the Railway Company are not bound to maintain in respect of the works clause.

¹ 1853, 16 D. 90.

² 1857, 2 Macq. 514.

³ 1893, 62 L. J. Q. B. 572.

Clause 26, however, is not permissive. That clause is an obligatory clause on the Railway Company if they construct Railway No. 2 at all. They need not construct Railway No. 2, but if they do, then clause 26 is obligatory. Therefore, it is quite certain that they were bound, whether they liked it or not, if they diverted the road, to carry it by this bridge over the railway; and the whole question therefore comes to be, What is the effect of the omission of the word "maintain"?

Nov. 29, 1907.
Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
Ld. President.

So far as I can discover, and I have searched with considerable diligence the authorities, this is a new question. I have not been able to discover any case in either England or Scotland where that question arose as in the case of a work which was specially enjoined by the special Act. I have not found a case where the thing in question is a bridge specially enjoined by the special Act and crossing a private road. There are plenty of cases where the bridge specially provided for crosses a public road, but then, of course, the peculiar question does not arise, because it is perfectly obvious that the general sections apply. But upon the best consideration the only conclusion I can come to is that the omission of the word "maintain" is fatal to the construction of the pursuers. It seems to me that the very anxiety with which in the general statute the word "maintain" is always put in shews that if it were not there there would not be an obligation of maintenance. "Maintain" is put in not only in section 39, but it is put in also in all the clauses that deal with accommodation works. In a clause of this sort I think that the person who was stipulating for the work, who, I suppose, would be the proprietor, must fairly be taken as proferens of the clause, and that the clause must be construed literally according as it stands. I am not omitting the consideration that I think this argument really logically leads to this, that the Railway Company are not bound to maintain the structure of the bridge any more than they are to maintain the roadway. I say that notwithstanding the concession on the part of the Railway Company's counsel in one part of the argument that they were so bound. I do not think that concession ought logically to be made. But I do not think that fact in any way shocks me, for this very good reason, that it would be perfectly evident that the Railway Company would be bound to maintain the structure of the bridge, not because they were made to by the terms of the obligation, but for their own security. If they allowed the bridge, being an overhead bridge, to get out of order and become in a dangerous condition, it is quite evident that they would subject their own property to grave risk, and subject themselves to very grave risk of damages if through the falling of any portion of the bridge anybody who was using their railway was hurt. Therefore I do not think that the absence of an actual clause binding them to maintain the structure of the bridge very much matters. Upon the whole matter, and I found the point one of some difficulty upon which to make up my mind, I have come to the conclusion that in a doubtful case we must take the Act as we find it, and inasmuch as there is an obvious distinction made between making and maintaining in other sections where we find making and maintaining, this section must be read literally as it stands. Consequently here there is no obligation upon the Railway Company to maintain this bridge upon the ground of the special clause, because maintenance is not there expressed,

Nov. 29, 1907. and there is no obligation in the general clause, because this bridge is not over a road to which the general clause applies.

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

The fact that there may be bridges to which an obligation of maintenance on the part of a railway company does not apply, seems to me to be recognised—although I do not put too much stress upon this argument—by another statute, namely, the Abandonment of Railways Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 83), which in sec. 22 deals with the matter thus:—"Be it enacted that, where the line of any railway so authorised to be abandoned shall have been wholly or partially laid out, and any road shall have been carried across such line of railway by means of a bridge or tunnel over or under such railway, which bridge or tunnel the Company to whom such railway belonged would, in case the same had not been abandoned, have been liable to keep in repair, then in every such case except where such bridge or tunnel shall, with the permission of said Commissioners, be by such Company removed, and such road restored to the like or an equally convenient and good state as the same was in before it was interfered with by the makers of such railways, to the satisfaction (in the case of difference between such Company and the owner or persons having the management of such road) of the Commissioners, such Company shall pay to the owner of such road, if it be a private road, or to the trustees, surveyors of highways, or other person having the management of such road, if it be a turnpike or other public road, a sum of money, to be determined by arbitration as aftermentioned, in lieu and discharge of their liability to keep such bridge or tunnel, and also the roadway over the same, in repair." Now, I think that is quite consistent with the view that I have taken, because, in the first place, it distinguishes between the case of public and private roads, and then in all these things it distinguishes between the cases where the Company would, if the railway had not been abandoned, have been liable to keep it in repair, and cases where it would not. Accordingly, I think it is fair to say that it was in the contemplation of Parliament when it enacted that section that there might be bridges in just the condition I have come to the conclusion this one was, namely, a bridge carrying a private road which the Railway Company were not under obligation to repair, and I remind your Lordships that that bridge could not be an accommodation bridge, because, so far as an accommodation bridge is concerned, there is always the obligation to make and maintain.

My conclusion, therefore, is that this special point does not disturb the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship that the difficulty in the case is that there are no precedents to guide us as to the construction of the Caledonian Railway Company's private Act. Under the works clause the Company, of course, were under no obligation to make the railway No. 2 over which this bridge is constructed. But then if they did decide to exercise the power to make the railway it was obligatory upon them to construct the bridge. The clause authorising the Company to construct the bridge, from its form and substance, appears to be of the nature of what is called a protection clause—a clause possibly drawn, or at anyrate suggested, by the proprietor whose interests it was intended to safeguard. Therefore I think it must be taken that this protection clause Nov. 29, 1907. represents all that has been claimed from the Company for the interference with the continuity of the road by the railway being run across it. Now, as the Act only puts the Company under obligation to construct, and says nothing about maintenance, it follows, as I think, that no action can be brought by the city to compel the Company to maintain the road. What would happen in the case of a railway being abandoned seems to be quite clear, but, of course, we have not that point before us. It is only useful by way of illustration of what I venture to think is the conclusion to be drawn from the two clauses of this private Act which are under consideration.

Corporation of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Lord M'Laren.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD PEARSON concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

THE REVEREND ANGUS CAMERON AND OTHERS (Mrs Sarah Denholm's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Johnston, K.C.—C. D. Murray. No. 39.

MRS ISABEL DUNLOP OR DENHOLM AND OTHERS (George Denholm's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Hunter, K.C.—Constable. Nov. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Subject of Gift—Power to consume—Gift over of portion unconsumed—Trust—Onus.—In a mutual settlement by spouses the husband conveyed his whole estates to trustees and directed them to pay to his wife, if she survived him, as an alimentary allowance for her and their children, the income of his estate and such portions of the capital as his trustees should deem necessary, "and in like manner and in consideration of what is above written," the wife conveyed her whole estates to her husband under the burden of maintaining her whole children, with full power to him "to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary," and also power "to realise . . . said estates . . . and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as" she could have done herself. She appointed him to be her sole executor. Upon the death of her husband if he survived her (as he did), she conveyed her "said estate or such portion thereof as may be unconsumed" by him to trustees for certain purposes.

The wife died in 1893. After the wife's death the husband realised certain properties which had belonged to her and paid the proceeds into his own bank account, so that they became immixed with his own funds, and could not ultimately be traced or identified. The husband died in 1905.

In an action by the wife's trustees against the trustees under a will left by the husband, held (aff. judgment of Lord Dundas, diss. Lord Ardwall) (1) that under the mutual settlement the husband was not bound to account for his intromissions with his wife's estate, and that consequently his trustees were not bound so to account; (2) that the onus of proving what part of the wife's estate was unconsumed by the husband was upon the pursuers; and (3) that the proceeds of the wife's properties sold by the husband having been immixed with the husband's funds and being now incapable of identification, must be held to have been consumed by the husband in the sense of the mutual settlement. Lord Ardwall was of opinion (1) that the power given to the husband to consume such parts of his wife's estate as he might think necessary was a power to be exercised sub modo, and as a conscientious trustee would exercise it; (2) that there was no evidence that the husband ever exercised that power or thought it necessary to do

Nov. 29, 1907. so ; and (3) that the husband's using the capital of his wife's estate for his own business, while legitimate under the wide powers of administration given him, did not absolve his trustees from accounting for the value of his wife's estate.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

(SEE ante, 1907, S. C. 61.)

2D DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

George Denholm and Sarah Louisa Liddall M'Laren or Denholm, spouses, residing at 45 Manor Place, Edinburgh, on 10th November 1891, executed a mutual settlement. In this deed the husband conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes mentioned, and, inter alia, provided as follows:—"In the event of my said wife surviving me my trustees shall pay to her as an alimentary allowance for herself and our children during the whole days of her life the net income of my estates under burden of" certain "annuities . . . and my trustees are hereby authorised to pay over to her from time to time for her own use such portion or portions of the capital of said residue as my trustees may deem necessary, or which they think she may require, she being always bound to maintain our said children, and that until they are capable of maintaining themselves, and to educate them in a manner befitting their station. . . .

"And in like manner and in consideration of what is before written I, the said Sarah Louisa Liddall M'Laren or Denholm do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispoise to and in favour of the said George Denholm, my husband, in the event of his surviving me, All and Sundry my whole estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever description," under burden of paying her debts and two annuities of £10 each, and of maintaining and educating her whole children, including William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren, her child by a former marriage, "with full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary, and also power to him to realise, sell, and dispose of my said estates, heritable and moveable, by public roup or private bargain, as he may think proper, and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself; and in the event of his surviving me, I appoint my said husband to be my sole executor, and to be tutor to the said William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren should he be in minority at the date of my decease. And upon the death of my said husband if he should survive me, or upon my own death if I should survive him, I give, grant, assign, and dispoise to and in favour of" the persons to whom the husband conveyed his estate in trust under the mutual settlement "All and Sundry my said estate or such portion as may be unconsumed by my said husband, but that in trust only for the uses and purposes following, videlicet"—The spouses finally provided:—"And we hereby reserve full power at any time during our joint lives, by writing mutually executed, to alter or revoke these presents, and also, with full power and faculty to the survivor of us to alter or revoke these presents, but only in so far as regards our separate estates; but in so far as not altered or revoked as aforesaid the same shall remain effectual."

Mrs Sarah Louisa Denholm died on 27th December 1893 survived by her husband, by her son by her former marriage, William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren, and by two daughters, the children of her marriage with George Denholm. George Denholm accepted the office of executor conferred upon him by the mutual settlement, gave up inventories of the wife's personal estate and confirmed thereto. He also made up titles to her heritable estate. Nov. 29, 1907.

The total net amount of the wife's estate was between £10,000 and £11,000. It consisted of the following items:—

I. Heritable Property—(1) 43 Manor Place, Edinburgh; (2) One-half of 92 South Bridge, Edinburgh; (3) One-half of 287 High Street, Edinburgh.

II. Debt due upon bond and disposition in security granted by George Denholm over his estate of Press, dated 15th, and recorded 22d May 1890, £6000.

III. Balance of jus relictæ from estate of Mr W. A. M'Laren, £306.

IV. Paraphernal effects, £44.

George Denholm sold 43 Manor Place in 1895. He received the net proceeds (about £2690) on 15th May 1895, and paid them in to his own bank account with the Commercial Bank. The property 92 South Bridge was sold at Whitsunday 1899, and the net proceeds of Mrs Denholm's share (about £1482) were paid into Mr Denholm's bank account with the Commercial Bank. The property 287 High Street was acquired compulsorily for improvement purposes by the Corporation of Edinburgh in 1900, and the net proceeds of Mrs Denholm's share (about £580) were paid into Mr Denholm's bank account with the Commercial Bank on 9th August 1900. The total amount realised from these three heritable properties was about £4752.

Deducting from £11,103, the amount of the four items, £1103 for debts, duties, and expenses, there remained a balance of £10,100.

It was ultimately not disputed that the whole of Mrs Sarah Louisa Denholm's estate, except the £6000 bond, had been realised, that the proceeds had been paid into Mr Denholm's bank account and immixed with his own funds, and that these proceeds could not now be traced.

Mr Denholm kept no private accounts shewing his total income or his expenditure, but there was evidence that he lived in great style, keeping a carriage and pair and a coachman and footman.

Mr Denholm was a stockbroker with a considerable business. The profits realised from it fluctuated a good deal, and in some years he made a loss. He kept several bank accounts. These accounts were frequently overdrawn. At the date of his wife's death he was the owner of two estates, Press and Bee-Edge, in the county of Berwick, and of 30 Great King Street, Edinburgh. These properties were bonded and burdened for considerable sums in proportion to their value. Between 1893 and 1899 the amount of the bonds and burdens on his heritable estate was greatly reduced. In 1899 he succeeded to about £27,000 under the will of a Mrs Booth. Of this amount he received about £9000 in 1899 and the balance in 1900. Thereafter in 1901 and 1902 he purchased York Lodge, Dunbar, for £1200, and the estate of Hillend in Berwickshire for £10,000. By April 1902 his heritable property was freed of bonds and burdens except the £6000 bond above mentioned, and about £1400, the value of certain annuities.

Mr Denholm, who had meantime been married again, died in June 1905, leaving a will dated 17th April 1902, with two relative codicils, by which he revoked all former testamentary writings executed by him, "including the said mutual settlement," and conveyed his whole

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Nov. 29, 1907. estate, heritable and moveable, "including all means and estate of which I have or may have power of disposal or appointment," to trustees in trust for the purposes therein mentioned.*

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

He was survived by his widow, his stepson W. B. L. M'Laren, and his two daughters by his first marriage. There was no issue of his second marriage.

The net value of the estate left by George Denholm, reckoning the £6000 bond as a debt due by him, was about £35,000.

In 1906 the Reverend Angus Cameron and others, as the trustees under the mutual settlement (hereinafter called Mrs Sarah Denholm's trustees), and as Mrs Denholm's executors ad non executa, brought an action against Mrs Isabel Dunlop or Denholm, widow of George Denholm, and others, the trustees under his will and codicils above mentioned, in which they concluded (1) for declarator that the £6000 bond above mentioned was a valid and subsisting security, and formed part of Mrs Sarah Denholm's estate, that the pursuers were now in right thereof, and that George Denholm's obligation therein contained was now prestable against the defenders; (2) for delivery of said bond to the pursuers, or failing delivery, for payment of £6000; (3) for an accounting of the intromissions of George Denholm, as trustee or executor of Mrs Sarah Denholm, with her means and estate, for payment of £12,000, or such sum as should appear due on an accounting, and failing an account as aforesaid, for payment of £13,000.

It was ultimately admitted by the defenders that the pursuers were entitled to the £6000 bond.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said deceased George Denholm having intromitted with the estate of his wife, the said deceased Mrs Denholm, the defenders, as his trustees and executors, are bound to count and reckon to the pursuers for his intromissions.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The defenders are under no obligation to account to the pursuers, and should be assoilzied

* By this will Mr Denholm provided, inter alia, as follows:—"Further, I specially declare that in the event of my daughters, or either of them, or my stepson, the said William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren, raising any question with reference to the distribution or division of the trust-estate, or taking exception or making any objection to my power to revoke said mutual settlement, or claiming that any part of the trust-estate falls thereunder or is thereby in any way regulated, or raising any question with reference to the distribution or division of the estate left by their mother, my wife, or taking exception or making any objection to the amount thereof, as the same may be set forth in any statement subscribed by me, they or any of them raising such questions regarding such distribution or division or taking exception or making any objection or claiming as aforesaid, with reference either to the trust-estate or to the estate of their mother, shall forfeit right not only for themselves, herself, or himself, but also for their, his, or her issue in and to any share of or interest in the trust-estate as aforesaid."

In Mr Denholm's business ledger there was a statement headed "Statement of the net amount of the estate of the late Mrs Denholm." This statement (No. 10 of process) enumerated the items I. to IV. above mentioned, and gave the net amounts realised by the sale of the heritable properties as narrated above, p. 257, and brought out the net total as £10,100. It concluded as follows:—"The above is as near as possible a correct statement of the estate of my late wife at the date of her death, and is engrossed here with reference to the directions expressed in my will, dated 17th April 1902. The above adopted as holograph. (Signed) GEORGE DENHOLM." It was not dated.

from the remaining conclusion, in respect (a) that under the mutual settlement of the late Mr Denholm and his first wife he took a full vested right in and to her whole estate; (b) that the whole of the said estate was consumed by him within the meaning of the said settlement. Nov. 29, 1907.
Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

On 5th June 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) found that under the mutual settlement Mr Denholm did not take a full vested right to the whole estate of Mrs Sarah Denholm, repelled head (a) of plea 4 stated for the defenders, and quoad ultra allowed a proof before answer.

The defenders reclaimed, but on 7th November 1906 the Second Division adhered. (See ante, 1907, S. C. 61.)

Thereafter proof was led. The facts are sufficiently stated in the narrative, supra, and in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

On 22d February 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons" (subject to a variation as regards interest and a reservation of any claims competent to the defenders for the maintenance and education of the children): "Of consent decerns and ordains the defenders to deliver up to the pursuers the said bond and disposition in security in terms of the conclusion of the summons for delivery: Quoad ultra finds that the whole estate of the said Mrs Sarah Louisa Liddall M'Laren or Denholm, with the exception of the said bond and disposition in security, was consumed by the late George Denholm, her husband, during his lifetime, within the meaning of the mutual settlement referred to on the record: Assolzie the defenders from the whole remaining conclusions of the summons, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—On 5th June 1906 I decided that, upon a sound construction of Mr and Mrs Denholm's mutual settlement, Mr Denholm did not take a full vested right in and to the whole estate of his deceased wife; and quoad ultra I allowed a proof. In the opinion then delivered, I pointed out that I did 'not propose at present to attempt to define the limits of the restriction upon Mr Denholm's right of fee, or those of his power to "consume" his wife's estate.' On 7th November 1906 the Second Division adhered to my interlocutor. The case is reported in 1907, S. C., 61. All, therefore, that was determined up to that point was that Mr Denholm's right was not one of full fee; its precise nature and extent have now to be considered. It may be well to recall the terms of the sixth purpose of the mutual settlement. The words used at the outset of the clause were, standing by themselves, sufficient to confer upon Mr Denholm an absolute fee in his wife's estate. The clause continues 'with full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary, and also power to him to realise, sell and dispose of my said estates, heritable or moveable, by public roup, or private bargain, as he may think proper, and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself.' Mrs Denholm proceeded to appoint her husband to be her sole executor; and upon his death, if he should survive her, she assigned to trustees (who are now represented by the pursuers), 'all and sundry my said estate or such portion as may be unconsumed by my said husband' in trust for the purposes thereafter specified. It seems, therefore, that what would have otherwise been an absolute fee in Mr Denholm is limited by the destination to other parties of so much of the wife's estate as might be 'unconsumed' by him at his death. In Lord Stormonth-Darling's words (1907, S. C., at p. 64), Mr Denholm had 'a right limited to sale, administration, and consumption during his lifetime.' To attempt a closer definition of his right, one must, I apprehend, study the Nov. 29, 1907. The pursuers reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 5th and 6th November 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Argued for the pursuers and reclaimers;—The husband's position here was that he had certain powers qua administrator, and certain powers qua beneficiary. These powers must be clearly distinguished. So far as he acted qua administrator, he was in a fiduciary position and was bound to account for everything which he could not shew was consumed under his powers qua beneficiary. His position qua beneficiary was really indistinguishable from that of a liferenter with a power of encroachment. Qua beneficiary he was not a fiar,¹ but merely a liferenter with extended powers.² Such a power of encroaching, or, as the pursuers submitted, consuming, could only be utilised for purposes of personal user.³ The onus of shewing a due exercise of the power of consumption was upon the defenders. It could not be disputed (1) that the wife's estate, with the exception of the £6000 clause as a whole, and endeavour to give due weight to all its parts. On the one hand, I think that the wide expression—'and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself'—must be read so as to harmonise with the power to 'consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary'; and, on the other hand, the latter phrase must be taken in conjunction with the wider words. The result, in my judgment, is that Mr Denholm was undoubtedly entitled to 'consume' the whole of his wife's estate during his lifetime—though he might not dispose of it by mortis causa deed—subject to the rather unsubstantial qualification that he himself should 'find or think' it necessary to do so. The word 'consume' has no special or technical signification. The main idea etymologically is, I think, that of taking complete possession. Dr Johnson defines it as 'to waste; to spend; to destroy.' The 'unconsumed' portion, if any, of Mrs Denholm's estate must, therefore, in my judgment, be represented by what now remains extant, and can be identified as having formed part of it. I was referred to cases in which clauses, more or less similar to the present, were construed by the Court. The light to be derived from these is at best indirect. It may be sufficient to allude quite briefly to two of the decisions. In Reddie's Trustees, 1890, 17 R. 558, a surviving widow had power under a mutual settlement 'to use or encroach on the funds, means and estate hereby conveyed on either side.' The Court held that these words must be 'read in a reasonable sense'; that the widow was not entitled to give the estate away without consideration; but that, in so far as necessary for her maintenance, she might encroach upon the capital,—'only for herself, and not for anyone else.' The language of the deed in Reddie's case was obviously much more restricted than that here under consideration. A case more nearly resembling the present is Sprot, 1855, 17 D. 840. There, a husband declared that his wife, if she survived him—(which she did),—should 'be at liberty to appropriate out of the stock of my said trust-estate such sum or sums, from time to time, as she may find useful for her own use, over and above the free income, or as she desires to have for her own purposes and disposal, without limitation as to the amount of such sum or sums.' It was held that the widow was not entitled, as in exercise of this power, to dispose of the whole estate by mortis causa deed. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) pointed out that the 'appropriation out of the stock . . . clearly refers to an act of the wife, in her lifetime, taking the sums herself for her own use. Her bond, was realised; (2) that the proceeds were paid into the husband's bank account and immixed with his own funds; and (3) that the proceeds could not now be traced. But this was not enough. Proof of immixture was not proof of "consumption." The defenders must prove that the husband had found or thought it necessary to consume the wife's estate for his personal user—for his greater personal comfort. The defenders had totally failed to prove this. This was especially so as regards the subjects which were acquired compulsorily, but it was really so as regards all the estate that was realised. It might be that the husband was the final judge as to what was necessary for his personal user, but he and his representatives were bound to shew that he had considered the question. The evidence as to the state of his bank accounts proved nothing as to his real financial position. There was no ground for saying that he was pressed for money. The statement of the wife's estate entered by

¹ Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees, 1907, S. C. 61.

² In re Thomson's Estate, (1879) L. R. 13 Ch. D. 144.

³ Reddie's Trustees v. Lindsay, 1890, 17 R. 558; Sprot v. Pennycook, 1855, 17 D. 840.

Nov. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

deed of settlement is not such an act at all. She has appropriated nothing out of the stock'; but his Lordship also made it plain that the widow could, during her life 'have gone any length in the way of expenditure.'

"Subject, then, to the views which I have expressed, the question that arises seems to be one of fact, viz., what, if any, 'portion' of Mrs Denholm's estate can be shewn to have remained extant and 'unconsumed' by Mr Denholm at the time of his death? It is now admitted by the defenders—although they disputed it down to the date of their letter of 21st January 1907, No. 191 of pro.—that one such portion of the estate remains 'unconsumed'; namely a bond in Mrs Denholm's favour for £6000 over the estate of Press, which is described in the summons and condescendence. But it appears that the whole rest of her estate was realised by Mr Denholm during his life, and its proceeds immixed with his own funds, so as to make it impossible to identify them or trace their subsequent history. Mr Denholm was a stockbroker, and prior to 1894 had also an insurance agency. His business books were kept with regularity, but he seems to have made no private record at all of the income and out-goings, either of his own means or of his wife's estate. He had several bank accounts, and would shift money from one to another of these. When he realised successive portions of his wife's heritable estate, he immediately placed the proceeds in one or other of these accounts, immixed them with his own funds, and went on drawing upon the account for his ordinary expenditure and other purposes. Upon this general sketch of the situation, a question as to onus probandi arises. The pursuers' counsel argued that it was for the defenders to prove 'consumption' by Mr Denholm so far as they could do so; that to 'immix' is not necessarily to 'consume'; that, as Mr Denholm had kept no private accounts, it was impossible for the defenders to prove that any definite portion of his wife's estate had been 'consumed' by him; and that the pursuers were, therefore, entitled to receive and administer the amount of her estate as known to exist at the date of her death. I think that this argument is erroneous. It lies, in my opinion, upon those who seek to administer 'such portion' of Mrs Denholm's estate 'as may be unconsumed by' her husband, to identify the whole portion of it which they say is unconsumed, as they have succeeded in identifying the bond for £6000. It is true that Mr Denholm was his wife's executor; but he was also the fiar (subject to the qualifications already explained) in her estate. He was not, I apprehend, under any obligation to keep account of that estate, though it would have been more regular to do so. He intromitted with her estate and mixed it with his own, and if the pursuers are, in these circumstances, unable—as I think they are—to trace or identify it (with the exception of the bond), they fail, in my judgment, to discharge the onus of proving that it remained 'unconsumed' at Mr Denholm's death. Now, the nature and

Nov. 29, 1907. the husband in his books with reference to the will he made in 1902 shewed that at that date he regarded it as still then existing unconsumed and apart from his own estate. It could not be maintained that he had consumed it since 1902.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—(1) Onus. The onus was not on the defenders, but on the pursuers. Under the mutual settlement there was an absolute conveyance to the husband, with full power to realise and consume. All that the pursuers were entitled to was what was “unconsumed.” It was for them to establish the identity of any property of the wife which was unconsumed. The husband was not in the position of a trustee, bound to keep accounts and shew vouchers. If that were so the defenders could not be held to account now. (2) Even if the onus was on the defenders they had proved that the wife's estate, except the £6000 bond, had been consumed. Consumption meant primarily loss of identity. In a value of Mrs Denholm's estate at her death are shewn in a statement, No. 10 of pro., to which I shall afterwards have to allude more particularly. The correctness of the statement is impugned upon certain heads by both parties, but may be held as sufficient for present purposes. If one discards the bond for £6000, which remains ‘unconsumed’; a balance of jus relicte from the estate of Mrs Denholm's former husband; and ‘paraphernal effects’ of trifling value; it appears that that lady's estate consisted, at her death, of three heritable properties. The first of these—a house in Manor Place—was sold by Mr Denholm in 1895 and the price placed immediately in one of his bank accounts. I may observe in passing that I think the pursuers have failed to prove in fact that a part of these proceeds was used in paying off a bond for £917 or thereby upon another property belonging to Mr Denholm; and further that, even if the alleged application of this money had been established, I should have been disposed to hold that Mr Denholm had ‘consumed’ it, within the meaning of the settlement. In 1900, the subjects in High Street were acquired by the Corporation of Edinburgh; and the property in South Bridge had been sold by Mr Denholm in the previous year. In both of these cases, as in that of Manor Place, the price was placed by Mr Denholm in bank, and immixed with his other funds. In my opinion, Mr Denholm thus ‘consumed’ his wife's estate (except the bond), according to the ordinary use of the word, and its meaning in the mutual settlement. But the pursuers' counsel argued that it would be little short of absurdity to say that Mr Denholm could ‘find or think’ it necessary to ‘consume’ the whole of his wife's estate,—excepting the said bond. It was, they urged, proved that he had a stockbroking business worth not less than £2000 a year, besides heritable properties of his own; and in 1899 he succeeded to a fortune of about £27,000 under the will of a Mrs Booth. I think that Mr Denholm's professional income is overstated at the above figure; but the truth is that, as Mr Cockburn Millar frankly puts it, ‘it is somewhat difficult to determine accurately the position of a man who has not made a balance-sheet shewing his own affairs, and I do not know if we have knowledge of all his assets or liabilities.’ Further, it appears to be at least highly probable that, when Mr Denholm sold the Manor Place house in 1895, he might ‘find or think’ it necessary to use and consume the price for his own purposes; because his assets consisted chiefly of heritage, and of certain bank stock which he utilised as cover against overdrafts on his account. A similar observation may, I think, be fairly made as to the sales of Mrs Denholm's other two properties and the ‘consumption’ of their prices by Mr Denholm; for he had not, it seems, actually received any part of his succession from Mrs Booth's estate until after the completion of these transactions. There is at all events no evidence to shew that Mr Denholm did not find or think it necessary to consume the estate which he had in secondary sense, as applied to funds, it involved realisation, conversion, appropriation, and loss of identity. On the pursuers' contention capital consumed productively in the economic sense would not be consumed at all. If consumption involved spending, then spending to pay debts generally was as much consumption as spending to pay a particular debt. The evidence shewed that the husband, although the owner of a considerable amount of property, was in a chronic state of indebtedness, and worked his business on overdrafts. He spent £3000 a year. His average net profits from his business were not more than £1000 a year, and his average income, apart from his business, including the income of the wife's estate, was not more than £700. His heritable estate was heavily bonded. He used his wife's estate to free himself from indebtedness, and it was all so used before he got Mrs Booth's legacy. The proceeds went into his bank accounts, and either were wiped out at once by an overdraft, or were drawn

Nov. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

fact mixed with his own funds. The pursuers' counsel presented a further argument, based upon the statement, No. 10 of pro., to which I have already referred. This statement is contained in Mr Denholm's ledger, and is signed by him as being as near as possible a correct statement of the estate of his late wife at the date of her death, 'and is engrossed here with reference to the directions expressed in my will, dated 17th April 1902.' This will (No. 14 of pro.) is a very lengthy document, and seems to have been the outcome of deliberations between the testator and his law-agent extending over a series of years. It contains a clause of forfeiture directed against his two daughters and his stepson in the event (which has not occurred) of any of them raising questions, inter alia, 'with reference to the distribution or division of the estate left by their mother, my wife, or taking exception or making any objection to the amount thereof as the same may be set forth in any statement subscribed by me.' The pursuers' counsel maintained that Mr Denholm's subscription of No. 10 of pro., coupled with the clause just quoted, sufficiently instruct an intention on his part that the amount or value of the estate belonging to Mrs Denholm at her death should, upon his death, pass to the trustees of her own will, for the purposes expressed by her in the mutual settlement, notwithstanding his intromissions with it during his life. I leave out of account entirely such fragments of oral testimony as exist in the proof as to Mr Denholm's expressions of intention in regard to his wife's estate. Such passages, if competent—which I doubt—are quite vague and inconclusive. In my opinion, the documents founded upon are not sufficient to rebut the strong presumption, arising from the facts of the case, that Mr Denholm intended to consume, as, in my judgment, he actually did consume, during his lifetime, the whole of his wife's estate, except the bond for £6000. The evidence discloses that Mr Denholm was made fully aware by his successive law-agents, Mr Dalziel and Mr Kerr, of his powers of consumption, and that he deliberately abstained from putting his wife's estate beyond those powers by creating a separate trust. Further, it is made clear by Mr Kerr's evidence that the purpose for which the statement No. 10 of pro. was prepared and subscribed was not that which was suggested in the argument for the pursuers. Mr Kerr states that he had no knowledge of Mr Denholm's dealings with his wife's estate; but that he advised him to put upon record a definite statement of the amount of it, as received by him at her death, 'to prevent any question when he was dead. The real purpose was to fix the amount of the estate as at her death as received by him, so that there might be no question by beneficiaries coming forward and saying "this is far more than the sum our mother left."' I confess that I am unable to understand from Mr Kerr's evidence—the truth of which I accept implicitly—the precise idea which he had in mind in so advising Mr Denholm; but, whatever the idea

Nov. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

out for his own purposes within a few months. Such being the evidence, it proved that the wife's estate, with the exception of the £6000 bond, had been consumed. When something was left to a man's judgment the Court could not go behind his judgment and inquire whether it was justified.¹ Whatever was not extant and identified at the husband's death was "consumed."

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is not unattended with difficulty, as is demonstrated by the fact that there is a difference of opinion between your Lordships upon it. Your Lordships have both very fully and very clearly stated the grounds of the opinion you have formed, and by your kindness I have had an opportunity of considering these opinions. Before doing so I had arrived at the conclusion that it could not be held in this case that there was any ground for holding that the funds which are in question had not been consumed by the deceased Mr Denholm during his life, and that having been so consumed, the demand made in this case cannot receive effect, as I hold he was entitled to consume as he did, and was not bound to keep accounts by which the mode and details of consumption should be capable of ascertainment. Having considered your Lordships' opinions, I have come to the conclusion that my view formed on consideration is right. And as Lord Stormonth-Darling's carefully formed and expressed opinion expresses very fully and exactly my views on the case, I feel it to be unnecessary to restate them at length.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This case came before this Division more than a year ago, and was then heard by Lord Kyllachy, Lord Low, and myself. What we then decided, affirming the Lord Ordinary, was that on a sound construction of the mutual settlement by the spouses the late Mr Denholm did not take a full and unlimited right of fee in the estate of his first wife. I then said, delivering the judgment of the Court, that taking all the clauses of the deed together "their true effect was to cut down the may have been, Mr Kerr's statements establish beyond question that it was not in order to secure that the original amount of Mrs Denholm's estate should be taken out of Mr Denholm's estate, so as to be made subject to the trust purposes of her settlement. I may add that, in considering the case, doubts have occurred to my mind as to the admissibility of Mr Kerr's evidence upon this matter, though no objection to its competency was suggested by the pursuers' counsel either at the proof or in his speech at its conclusion. But, for the reasons stated, I should arrive at the same result apart altogether from Mr Kerr's evidence. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I think that the pursuers are entitled to decree substantially in terms of the conclusions of the summons for declarator and delivery; and that, quoad ultra, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

"I have not found it necessary to advert in detail to the evidence given by the accountants engaged on either side. But I may say that these gentlemen appear to have gone into the whole case, upon such materials as were available, with great ability and industry; and I have not failed to study carefully their oral evidence, and the numerous 'states' which they produced as explanatory of and relative to the same."

¹ Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees, 1875, 2 R. 683, per Lord Justice-Clerk, at p. 690.

absolute right of fee originally conferred on the husband, not to a liferent (because a liferent would have been inconsistent with the powers which she (the wife) wished him to have) but to a right limited to sale, administration, and consumption during his lifetime." The Lord Ordinary has now taken a proof, and as the result of it has in substance found that the whole estate of the first wife, with the exception of a bond for £6000 over the heritable estate of the husband, was "consumed" by him during his lifetime within the meaning of the mutual settlement. I think the Lord Ordinary is right.

Nov. 29, 1907.
Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

If the passage I have quoted from the former judgment of this Court be well founded (and it was not challenged), there was an absolute right of fee originally conferred on the husband by the wife's conveyance. It is not qualified in any way by trust or otherwise. It is a conveyance of "my whole estates" under burden of debts, as well as of certain annuities which the lady creates by the settlement, and under burden also of maintaining and educating her whole children, including her son by a former marriage. Then follow certain powers which, as we formerly found, were truly rather limitations of the husband's rights than powers properly so-called, and in the event of his surviving her she appoints him her sole executor. Consistently with that, the trust conveyance which she goes on to make to her own trustees at her husband's death is limited to "my said estate, or such portion as may be unconsumed by my said husband." The conveyance to the husband, therefore, is in point of title absolute, and differs in that respect from the right conferred on the wife in the English case cited by Mr C. D. Murray of In re Thomson's Estate,¹ where it was controlled by the words "for the term of her natural life," although words were added which gave the wife some power of disposition over the capital. These words were,—“To be disposed of as she may think proper for her own use and benefit according to the nature and quality thereof, subject only to the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses and the charge of proving and registering this my will.” The practical effect of this form of conveyance was as nearly as possible the same as Mrs Denholm's conveyance here. But in point of title the Court could not hold that the donee of this power had anything but a life interest, or any right to affect by testamentary instrument what remained undisposed of at her death, which was what the donee in that case tried to do. Here there was no such attempt by Mr Denholm, for he did not try to take advantage of the circumstance that his title was absolute in point of form. I agree that the attempt would have been unsuccessful if he had made it, because of the limitation of his powers to consumption during his lifetime, and there was no real repugnancy between that limitation and the absolute nature of the title.

But that leaves untouched the question, What was the meaning of the "full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary" which Mrs Denholm gave him? It may be that such a power is exceptional, and, if you like, rather anomalous. It does not fit in exactly with our ideas of either fee or liferent. But it was used by a testatrix who had plainly un-

¹ 13 Ch. Div. 144.

Nov. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

bounded confidence in her husband (as shewn, e.g., by her entrusting him with the maintenance and education of her son by a former marriage and making him guardian of the boy), and she must also be taken to have known that although he was a landowner and living at a very bountiful rate, he was a stockbroker and liable to considerable risks in business. Accordingly when she made him the absolute judge of what parts or portions of her estate (amounting in all to between £10,000 and £11,000 in houses and money) it was "necessary" for him to "consume" during his lifetime, and what portion he was to leave "unconsumed" at his death, I think she was doing a very different thing from giving the net income of her whole estate to trustees, and superadding a discretionary power to them to encroach upon capital as they might deem necessary, which was what the husband did in his part of this mutual deed. I therefore attach no importance, except as affecting mutuality, to the recital with which the wife's conveyance opens,—“In like manner and in consideration of what is before written.” The two conveyances, so far as affecting construction, must each be regulated by its own terms. And therefore when the Lord Ordinary comes to the conclusion that the “unconsumed” portion of Mrs Denholm's estate must be represented by what now remains extant, and can be identified as having formed part of it, I cannot but agree with him. Mr Robertson-Durham, after a careful examination of the documents in process and of the books kept by the late Mr Denholm shewing his financial transactions, is asked whether he can identify any of the estate extant at his death as belonging to his wife. And his answer is,—“Only the £6000 bond over Press; everything else, so far as I can follow the items, was consumed by Mr Denholm, immixed with his estate, and swallowed up.”

Now, it is not disputed by the wife's trustees that her estate, both heritable and moveable, was in point of fact realised and immixed with the husband's funds by being paid into his various bank accounts, and that it is impossible now to trace the proceeds. The case would have been different if all that the husband did, when he realised the house property belonging to his wife, had been to reinvest the proceeds in some other recognisable form. That might not have been “consuming” the proceeds any more than if he had put them into the traditional old stocking and had kept them there. But what he did was not that. He used the money to pay off debt and reduce overdrafts, and he dealt with it generally in such a way that the most skilled accountants cannot tell what became of it in the end. For aught I know this very impossibility of tracing the proceeds may account for the extremely wide terms of Mrs Denholm's part of the will. Knowing that her husband was immersed in fairly large money transactions; that he had several bank accounts (frequently overdrawn); that his landed and house property was burdened, and that he had need of capital both for his own and his clients' purposes, she may have wished to give no third party the right to inquire what he did with her money any more than with his own, and so may have used an indefinite term to cover his use of the money in any way that he found most for his advantage. Certainly I cannot accept the reclaimers' main argument, viz., that “consumption” means only personal user, for it seems to me that that, besides creating at the outset the difficulty of settling what “personal user" means, would be giving no effect to the words "as he may find or think necessary," which are the words of the will. Nor do I think that this difficulty is got over by implying some vague kind of trust where there is none. There is always, of course, the ultimate arbitrament of conscience. But I must say, in fairness to the late Mr Denholm, that nothing has either been established by the proof or advanced in argument to shew that there was any failure on his part to observe the rules of good conscience as regards the beneficiaries ultimately and contingently called under his wife's part of the settlement. By his own will he seems to have dealt with them all (his stepson as well as his own two daughters) as one family. By that instrument he no doubt mentions provisions as made both by her and himself for their children, and there is a clause of forfeiture of any share or interest under his own will in the event of any of the children making any claim (inconsistent with his will), or raising any question about a statement subscribed by him relative to her estate at the date of her death. But that statement merely referred (and referred apparently with substantial accuracy) to the different items of her property, heritable and moveable, and does not of course touch the question in any way of what Mr Denholm was entitled to do by way of consumption of his wife's estate during his own life. I do not therefore see that either the statement No. 10 of process or the passages in Mr Denholm's own will materially affect the only question of importance in the case, viz., whether the husband did "consume" the wife's estate by using it to pay his debts, and so making it impossible of identification.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

I think that the test proposed by Mr Constable for the husband's trustees is the true one, viz., whether the husband was bound to keep accounts of his wife's estate? And I think there is no ground for saying that he was. If he was not so bound, there is an end of the argument that the mutual will contained anything in the nature of a trust or quasi trust. I demur altogether to the notion that although Mr Denholm may not have been bound himself to keep accounts, his trustees are under an obligation to account to his wife's trustees for anything except the bond for £6000. Beyond that, what are they to account for, and where are the materials for enabling them to do so? It is suggested that the document No. 10 of process forms an acknowledgment under Mr Denholm's own hand that, to the extent of the difference between the sum of £6000 in the bond and the sum of £10,100 which he acknowledges to have received as the net amount of his late wife's estate at the date of her death, he never "consumed" his wife's estate, nor intended to consume it. That seems to me rather a strong inference to draw from a document made out alio intuitu altogether. It is also an attempt to divert the question from the construction of Mrs Denholm's will in 1893 to the meaning to be attached to a jotting of Mr Denholm's made with reference to his own will in 1902. But the strongest objection to this suggested inference is that the fact of consumption or non-consumption is to be ascertained, not from ambiguous declarations, but from positive acts of his own.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the onus probandi lies on the pursuers. It is for them to shew that there was any portion of the wife's estate "unconsumed" at the husband's death; it is the very groundwork of their

Nov. 29, 1907. title. They have had no difficulty in shewing that with respect to the £6000 bond, because it remained exactly as it was at the lady's death. But quoad ultra, they have, in my judgment, failed to shew that any portion remained unconsumed when their trust title emerged, and on the whole matter I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

LORD ARDWALL.—This is an action raised by the trustees of the deceased Mrs Denholm against the trustees of her husband, the deceased George Denholm. It concludes, first, for declarator regarding a sum of £6000 contained in a heritable bond by Mr Denholm in favour of his wife; the Lord Ordinary has granted decree in terms of that conclusion, and the defenders acquiesce therein. The second conclusion of the action is for count, reckoning, and payment, whereby the amount due by Mr Denholm at the time of his death to the pursuers may be determined. A proof has been led with reference to this conclusion, and it has now to be decided whether, under the mutual settlement of Mr and Mrs Denholm dated 10th November 1891 the pursuers, who are Mrs Denholm's trustees under that settlement, are entitled to the accounting and payment they ask.

The important facts seem to be as follows:—

On 10th November 1891 Mr and Mrs Denholm executed the mutual settlement under consideration. Mrs Denholm died in 1893. She left heritable estate which, after discharging the bonds secured over it, realised about £4752, the bond for £6000 above referred to, and a small amount of money, in all about £10,100. The details of the estate are given with sufficient accuracy in the statement signed and authenticated by Mr Denholm in reference to his own will, to which I shall afterwards refer.

At Whitsunday 1895 Mr Denholm sold the house, 43 Manor Place, Edinburgh, which had belonged to his wife, at a price which, after paying the bond thereon and expenses, left £2690. At Whitsunday 1899 he sold the one-half of the property 92 South Bridge at a price which, after paying expenses, left £1482. The High Street property was compulsorily taken by the Corporation of Edinburgh in pursuance of an improvement scheme in August 1900, and the value of Mrs Denholm's half thereof, after deducting expenses, amounted to about £580. The proceeds of all these properties were at once carried into one or other of Mr Denholm's three bank accounts and merged with his other funds. It is explained by the accountants who examined his books that he kept no private accounts of his expenses of living, education of children, or anything else, so that it cannot be said what he spent year by year in these ways. It is important to notice, however, that long before his wife's death he was possessed of capital to the amount of about £5000, and that in February 1899 he succeeded to a sum of £27,000 under the will of a certain Mrs Booth.

On 17th April 1902 he made a will in which he revoked the mutual settlement so far as regarded his own estate, and gave directions with regard to it, and shortly after he drew up the statement already referred to and had it engrossed in one of his books with reference to the directions expressed in his will. He adopted the statement and docquet as holograph, and in addition had it witnessed by his cashier.

At his death Mr Denholm's estate was found to amount to about £40,000.

He had been from the time of his marriage to Mrs Denholm onwards in Nov. 29, 1907. business as a stockbroker, and it is estimated that he had a professional income, generally speaking, of about £2000 a year, but as he speculated a good deal on his own account it is difficult to say precisely what his annual income was, and possibly the figures above given as to his capital at various times and at his death are sufficient for the purposes of this case.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees. 11 T
Lord Ardwall.

From the above statement it appears that the only portion of Mrs Denholm's estate which can now be said to exist in forma specifica is the £6000, about which there is now no question. The whole of the rest of her estate was immixed with her husband's funds and may be regarded as having been invested in his business, because although it appears, so far as the direct application of it was concerned, to have been used for general expenses, yet by so using it Mr Denholm was enabled to keep more money in his business. It is now indistinguishable from the rest of Mr Denholm's estate, but if the defenders are bound to account for it to the pursuers, there seems no practical difficulty in recovering it, as Mr Denholm's estate is well able to pay the whole amount sued for.

On these facts the Lord Ordinary has held that the whole estate of Mrs Denholm, "with the exception of the bond for £6000, was consumed by the late George Denholm, her husband, within the meaning of the mutual settlement referred to on the record," and he says in his note that the question is what portion of Mrs Denholm's estate can be shewn to have remained extant and unconsumed by Mr Denholm at the time of his death.

I cannot agree with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary and now concurred in by your Lordships. This case was formerly brought before this Division on a reclaiming note by the defenders, and it was then decided¹ that under the said mutual settlement the husband "did not take a full and unlimited right of fee in the whole estate of the wife," and the first question to be determined is what was the nature of the husband's right in that estate. In my opinion he was constituted a trustee upon the said estate, in the first place for payment of Mrs Denholm's debts, deathbed and funeral expenses and executry expenses; second, for paying her two aunts free annuities of £10 sterling each at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year, and for the purpose of maintaining and educating the whole of her children out of the income of the estate. It is not said that Mr Denholm is to have a liferent of the estate subject to these burdens, but I think that must be held as implied.

With regard to the capital there are two powers given to Mr Denholm. First, the power of consuming such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he might think necessary, in other words a power of encroachment—on the construction of which this case largely turns—and, second, a power of administering and using the estate. Then upon the death of her husband, should he survive her, Mrs Denholm disposes and assigns to certain trustees, who are the pursuers in this action, "all and sundry my said estate or such portion as may be unconsumed by" her husband, in trust for certain purposes which are therein specified. I think it plain that these provisions have the effect of placing the husband in the position of a trustee

¹ S. C. 1907, 61.

Nov. 29, 1907. with very large powers of administration and use of the estate but with a limited power of consumption, and the result in law is that should he use the estate by mixing it up with his own or taking investments in his own name, his trustees would, notwithstanding, be liable to account for that estate upon his death, subject only to deduction of such portions as they could shew to have been consumed in terms of the only power to encroach on capital conferred by the deed.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Lord Ardwall.

From the provisions above recited it is, I think, apparent that the husband as trustee was bound to defray out of the income of the estate the life annuities and the expense of maintaining and educating the children, and this could only be done by his retaining the capital of the estate and applying the income to these purposes. The only power given to him to encroach upon the capital I shall afterwards more particularly consider, but it is plain that so far as not consumed in terms of the power, the testatrix intended that the whole of the capital of the estate, however dealt with under the power of administration, should be available for the purposes of her trust after her husband's death, to carry out which trust she appointed trustees in succession to him.

I have difficulty in understanding what view the Lord Ordinary takes of the character in which Mr Denholm held his wife's estate, but he has apparently reached the conclusion that under the combined powers of consumption and administration Mr Denholm was entitled, as soon after his wife's death as he pleased, to realise her whole estate and mix it with his own funds, and thus free himself and his executors from all obligation whatever to account for it to the beneficiaries under the mutual settlement. I do not think that this view is tenable. It is, I think, at variance with the former decision in this case, because it results in this, that while by the general scheme of the deed the husband had not an absolute right to the fee, yet under the powers in the same deed he could at once secure such right to himself, as soon as he pleased after the death of his wife, by the simple process of realising the estate and mixing it with his own, and thus defeat the whole of the carefully drawn provisions with regard to the use to which the income, and finally the capital, of the estate were to be put. The Lord Ordinary adverts to the dispositive clause as helping to lead to this result. It is as follows:—"I the said Sarah Louisa Liddall M'Laren or Denholm do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispone to the said George Denholm, my husband, in the event of his surviving me, all and sundry my whole estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever description, together with the whole writs, titles, and instructions thereof, but under burden always," &c. Now, I would point out that the terms of this gift are of little importance in the present question, because they are the terms in which almost every trust-disposition is granted, and are, as near as may be, the same terms as Mr Denholm himself uses in giving his part of the trust-estate over to his trustees, and although Mr Denholm is not named a trustee, yet, if the directions given him and the powers and duties entrusted to him were those appertaining to trustees, I do not think that his character, as such, is altered by what the Lord Ordinary calls the absolute terms in which the disposition is granted. Mr Denholm by the deed is nominated his wife's "executor," and it has been decided that if an executor is charged with duties implying a continuing trust he is in the same position as if he had been nominated a trustee.—Ainslie v. Ainslie.¹ In the next place it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary has mixed up with the power to consume the power of realising and administering the estate which is a totally separate power and ought not in my opinion to be confused with the very special power given Mr Denholm to consume the capital thereof which precedes it.

Nov. 29, 1907.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Lord Ardwall.

I will now proceed to consider what is the meaning and effect of the clause giving power to consume capital.

(1) I first take the clause by itself, prefixing, however, the words which immediately precede it in the mutual settlement, and which I think are not unimportant. It is in these terms :—"Also under burden of maintaining my whole children including the said William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren, until they are capable of maintaining themselves, and of educating them in a manner befitting their station, with full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary." The word "consume" I take it, simply means to use up, but it is a word which is appropriate to designate use by way of supporting or keeping in comfort a husband or children, and is not so appropriate to designate the squandering and dilapidating of an estate. In Mr Denholm's part of the mutual settlement, which I shall presently advert to, the trustees are directed to pay over parts of the capital to Mrs Denholm, but of course in Mrs Denholm's part, Mr Denholm being himself the trustee, it would have been ridiculous to direct him to pay over to himself, and accordingly the power takes the form of a power "to consume" such parts or portions, &c.—the capital being in his own hands. But the power given is not to consume such parts of the capital as he may think proper, or as he may please, but as "he may find or think necessary." Effect must be given to these last words, and the only reasonable effect which can be given to them is to hold that they limit the husband's power of consuming to what he might find or think necessary for the comfortable maintenance of himself and his own and his wife's children. It would be doing violence to these words to hold that they could possibly apply to such a case as mixing the whole of his wife's estate with his own, or that his doing so can be held in any sense to be an exercise of the limited power of consumption conferred on him.

(2) This settlement, however, is a mutual settlement, and although there was a power of revocation given to the husband, which he has exercised with regard to his part, yet the original mutual deed should be read as one, and being a mutual settlement it ought to be so interpreted as to render the provisions made by the husband and wife, in favour of each other respectively, as nearly as possible counterparts of each other. This observation is applicable to all mutual settlements. It is so more particularly in this case because the provision made by Mrs Denholm, in favour of her husband, which is now under consideration is introduced by these words :—"And in like manner and in consideration of what is before written, I the said Sarah Louisa Liddall M'Laren or Denholm do hereby," &c.

Taking then, first, the provisions under the fourth head of Mr Denholm's part of the mutual settlement, we find them to be these :—(1) The net

Nov. 29, 1907. income of his whole estate, under burden of certain annuities, is to be paid to his wife as an alimentary allowance for herself and "our children"; then follows this clause:—"And my trustees are hereby authorised to pay over to her from time to time for her use such portion or portions of the capital of the said residue as my trustees may deem necessary, or which they think she may require, she being always bound to maintain our said children, and that until they are capable of maintaining themselves, and to educate them in a manner befitting their station." I have above quoted the corresponding clause in Mrs Denholm's part of the deed, and comparing these two clauses I remark that the contemplation of the later clause in the deed is that the capital of the estate shall be preserved for the ultimate beneficiaries, except such portion, not as her husband may consume, but as he may find or think necessary to consume. This is almost in terms the same direction as is given to the trustees by the first portion of the deed, and I think it would do violence to the intentions of both parties to the deed—and it is a mutual one—to hold that the husband was entitled to squander or appropriate all his wife's estate as he pleased, without ever putting the question to himself whether the consumption of capital was necessary presumably for the purposes of the needful expenses of himself and the children. It will be noticed that what the trustees in the former part of the deed are bound to do is to pay over to Mrs Denholm such parts of the capital as they may deem necessary, or which they think she may require, and my opinion is that the power given to Mr Denholm was not intended to be a whit wider than that given to the trustees; in other words, that the power given to Mr Denholm to consume parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he might find or think necessary was a limited power only—a power to be exercised sub modo, although the duty is put upon himself, and not other trustees, to act as a good trustee ought to act, and as the trustees in his own portion of the deed are directed to act.

But now follows a clause which, I think, has been mixed up by the Lord Ordinary with the power to consume capital, but which has nothing to do with it, being concerned with a wholly different power, namely, of administration. That clause is in the following terms:—"As also power to him to realise, sell, and dispose of my said estates, heritable and moveable, by public roup or private bargain as he may think proper, and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself." It will be noticed that this clause is introduced by the words "and also," and that it deals with a power which seems to be purposely kept quite distinct from the power to consume given in the immediately preceding clause. I think, therefore, that it cannot be supposed that the words "to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself" apply at all to the power to consume, but only to the power of realising, sale, and administration. A power of administration and reinvestment will be found in almost every trust-deed, but the peculiarity of the power under consideration is that while in the ordinary case trustees are by law strictly prohibited from using trust funds for their own purposes or investing them in their own businesses, in the present case Mr Denholm has practically unlimited power of using and investing the money, just, in fact, as if for these purposes it was his own, as the power indeed sets forth, and I cannot help thinking that it was the intention of both parties by this clause to enable Nov. 29, 1907.

Mr Denholm to invest in his own business, directly or indirectly, such portions of his wife's realised estate as he thought proper. This, of course, would be a great convenience to him in carrying on the business of a stock-broker, but the fact that he did so invest it in his business through his bank accounts cannot reasonably be held to have the effect of absolving him from all obligation to account for money so invested to those who ultimately have the beneficial right to it. I accordingly am of opinion that this clause adds nothing whatever to the power to consume portions of the capital, and indeed has nothing to do with it. And as matter of construction I consider it out of the question to hold that the words "to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself," are to be tacked on to the clause giving power to the husband to consume such portion of the capital as he might think necessary. It was doubtless with the view of giving Mr Denholm full power to change these investments, and, if he pleased, to have the command of this money during his lifetime for the purposes of his business, that the power took the somewhat unusual form it did, but I think that on a sound construction of the whole of this part of the deed, keeping always in view the provision made by Mr Denholm himself regarding his capital, the intention was that Mr Denholm should have the use of the income of the estate, for the word "liferent" is used in no part of the deed, that he should be entitled to consume such portions of the capital as he might think or find necessary, and should have practically unlimited power to handle the estate and invest it in such way as he pleased. I therefore revert to what I have already said that the deed by first giving an absolute disposition, and then inserting provisions which imply, as has been held by the former decision, limitations on the absolute right, has truly the effect of placing Mr Denholm in the position of a trustee with power to encroach on the capital of the estate should he think or find it necessary for certain purposes, and with the widest powers to invest and use the rest of the capital as he pleased during his lifetime, but subject, of course, to an obligation to account for such capital to the ultimate beneficiaries, an obligation, I may observe, not the least inconsistent with the right to use the capital in his business or otherwise, and to mix it with his own funds.

If I am right in what I have already said, I think it follows that the defenders are bound to account to the pursuers as Mrs Denholm's trustees under the mutual settlement for the whole value of Mrs Denholm's estate except such part thereof as they can shew to have been consumed under the power to consume which I have just been dealing with. In all cases where trustees, or persons in the position of trustees, are charged with the management and administration of funds belonging to a deceased person, it is undoubted that it is for them to account for those funds to persons having the ultimate beneficial interest in the reversion, and if they cannot shew affirmatively that capital funds have been properly consumed or used under the powers in the trust-deed, they must make good these funds out of the general estate of the trustee in the event of his death if such estate is sufficient for the purpose.

Now, there is no doubt here of the sufficiency of the estate, for Mr Denholm left some £40,000, and the fact that under the power of admini-

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Lord Ardwall.

Nov. 29, 1907. Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees.
Lord Ardwall. stration in the trust-deed he mixed his wife's funds with his own cannot absolve his trustees from the obligation to account. It appears to me, I must say, absurd to hold that they can escape that obligation merely because Mr Denholm mixed his wife's estate with his own, and because that estate accordingly does not now exist in its original form. I can find nothing in the scheme of the mutual settlement to countenance such an extraordinary result.

But I think that the pursuer's case derives great support from a consideration of Mr Denholm's will, and the statement which is incorporated and practically forms part of it. I may first observe that Mr Denholm having left the sum I have mentioned, and having been all his life apparently in prosperous circumstances, and all along having had considerable capital at his command, there was really no necessity for him to consume any portion of the capital of his wife's estate, and there are indications in some parts of the oral evidence, the competency of which I cannot admit, that it was not his wish to do so. But a consideration of the deeds I have referred to, I think, makes it plain that not only did he never exercise the power to consume the estate, but that he never intended to do so, and was under the belief that after his death the whole of the capital of Mrs Denholm's estate as at her death should be and would be disposed of in terms of her part of the mutual disposition and settlement. Mr Denholm's will is dated 17th April 1902. It sets forth the reserved power to revoke in the mutual settlement as regarded the separate estate of each party, and that his estate had been very considerably increased since the date of the mutual settlement. The deed then proceeds thus:—"All which make it highly expedient that I should execute a new will giving expression to my wishes as regards the disposal of my means and estate after my death." He then defines that estate, and says that it is to be referred to hereinafter as the "trust-estate."

It may be mentioned that Mrs Denholm had been previously married to a Mr M'Laren, and that her son of that marriage, named William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren, survived both Mr and Mrs Denholm. Then by her marriage with Mr Denholm Mrs Denholm had two daughters, both of whom survived their parents. In Mr Denholm's will the following provisions occur:—"Further, I specially declare that in the event of my daughters, or either of them, or my stepson, the said William Benjamin Liddall M'Laren, raising any question with reference to the distribution or division of the trust-estate, or taking exception or making any objection to my power to revoke said mutual settlement, or claiming that any part of the trust-estate falls thereunder or is thereby in any way regulated, or raising any question with reference to the distribution or division of the estate left by their mother, my wife, or taking exception or making any objection to the amount thereof, as the same may be set forth in any statement subscribed by me, they or any of them raising such questions regarding such distribution or division or taking exception or making any objection or claiming as aforesaid, with reference either to the trust-estate or to the estate of their mother, shall forfeit right not only for themselves, herself, or himself, but also for their, his, or her issue, in and to any share of or interest in the trust-estate as aforesaid, which shall thereupon accrete to the other beneficiaries in their order and in terms of this my will and any codicil thereto." Nov. 29, 1907.

The statement referred to in the foregoing passage is the statement No. 10 of process. It sets forth the whole net value of Mrs Denholm's estate at the date of her death (being over £10,000), and appended to it is the following docquet:—

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.
Lord Ardwall.

"The above is as near as possible a correct statement of the estate of my late wife at the date of her death, and is engrossed here with reference to the directions expressed in my will, dated 17th April 1902.

"The above adopted as holograph. (Signed) GEORGE DENHOLM.

"(Signed) WILLIAM DICKISON, witness, cashier to George Denholm."

But although it is, as it professes to be, a statement of Mrs Denholm's estate "at the date of her death," it is clear from the directions expressed in Mr Denholm's will, and which the statement is signed with reference to, that Mr Denholm intended that the whole amount there set forth should be regarded as the estate of his wife and as falling under the mutual disposition and settlement executed by her. No other satisfactory construction can be put on the passage in his will taken along with the statement. He refers to the possibility of his stepson jeopardising "the provisions made for him by his mother and myself." It will be noticed that what he provides against is any of the children raising questions with reference to the distribution or division of "the estate left by my wife"; not the balance or the unconsumed portion of my wife's "estate," but the "estate left by my wife," and he fixes the amount of it by a reference to the statement. Now, the three heritable properties belonging to his wife had been realised and the proceeds carried into Mr Denholm's bank accounts in the years 1895, 1899, and 1900, and now in 1902 he treats the whole of his wife's estate as extant and as subject to the provisions of her settlement, and he warns her children under penalties against calling in question the amount of that estate as set forth by him in the statement under his hand. I think these propositions are legitimate inferences from the paragraph above quoted from the will taken in connection with the statement I have referred to. (First) That by the phrase "the estate of their mother" or "the estate left by their mother" is meant the estate set forth in the separate statement above referred to, amounting, as therein stated, to £10,100. (Second) That the trust-estate (that is the estate dealt with by Mr Denholm in his will) excludes and is contrasted with the estate of Mrs Denholm, or, as it is called, the estate of their mother. (Third) That Mr Denholm regarded the amount of his wife's estate, as defined in the separate statement, as still extant and falling to be dealt with under the mutual settlement, Mr Denholm's own trust-estate being dealt with by his will.

I do not think it is possible to have clearer evidence that Mr Denholm considered that he had not consumed any part of his wife's estate in the sense now contended for by the defenders, and that notwithstanding that he had taken the use of it in his business and otherwise by throwing a great part of it into his bank accounts, he contemplated that it should be dealt with after his death as his wife's separate estate, and that his trustees should account to Mrs Denholm's trustees for the amount set forth in the statement referred to which is signed with reference to his will, and which includes

Nov. 29, 1907. all the moneys which for many years before had been mixed with his own funds, and could not be traced as separate sums of money. I consider it manifest from this that Mr Denholm did not consider that he had consumed any part of his wife's estate or exercised the power to do so, and this, I think, is the best evidence we can have that he did not, in the words of the mutual settlement, "find or think necessary" to consume any portion of it, and never supposed for one moment that the effect of his taking the use of the money was equivalent to "consuming" it.

Denholm's
Trustees v.
Denholm's
Trustees.

Lord Ardwall.

On the whole matter I am of opinion (first) that the power to consume such parts or portions of his wife's estate as he might find or think necessary was a power to be exercised sub modo, and as a conscientious trustee would exercise it; (second) that there is no evidence that Mr Denholm ever exercised that power or ever found or thought it necessary to do so. On the contrary there is to be found in his own will and the statement referred to therein the best evidence now possible that he did not consider that he had either consumed or appropriated his wife's estate to any extent; (third) that Mr Denholm's using the proceeds of the realised portions of his wife's estate in his own business and for his own purposes, while legitimate under the very wide powers of use and administration given to him, does not absolve his trustees from accounting for the value of his wife's estate, although that may no longer exist in forma specifica, the estate left by him, which includes ex hypothesi the proceeds of part of his wife's estate, being amply sufficient to allow for the payment of the amount of his wife's estate to the pursuers, who are the persons entitled to administer it under the mutual trust-disposition and settlement.

I am accordingly of opinion that the latter part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that the defenders should be ordered to lodge an account bringing out the amount of the capital of Mrs Denholm's estate as at this date, subject to all burdens and expenses properly chargeable against it.

LORD LOW was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

M. J. BROWN, SON, & Co., S.S.C.—BRUCE, KERR, & BURNS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 40. JAMES MARSHALL & COMPANY AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).
—Hunter, K.C.—J. G. Jameson.

Nov. 29, 1907. JAMES PENNYCOOK, Defender (Appellant).—Morison, K.C.—Macmillan.

Marshall & Co.
v. Pennycook.

Cautioner—Relief—Cautioner personally completing executory contract—Obligation of co-cautioner for share of loss.—Under a contract for the construction of water-works for a town-council undertaken by M'Donald, Marshall and Pennycook were taken bound, jointly and severally, as cautioners for the due performance of the contract. On 24th May 1904 the town-council intimated to the cautioners that if the work was not carried on satisfactorily within eight days the contract would be taken off M'Donald's hands, and the cautioners would be held liable for any loss. The work was thereafter carried on satisfactorily till 13th July when M'Donald became incapacitated by ill-health from continuing the contract, whereupon Marshall, who was himself a builder and contractor, after asking and being refused the co-operation of Pennycook, with consent of the town-council but without any further formal demand by them upon him, took up the contract as Nov. 29, 1907. cautioner and completed it. The result was that there was never any failure to carry it on regularly. In completing the contract Marshall sustained loss. It was proved that if he had not acted as he did the loss would have been greater. Marshall & Co.

v. Pennycook.

Held that in these circumstances Marshall was entitled to intervene personally at the time when he did so, and that Pennycook was bound to pay to him one-half of the loss sustained by him, including half of a fee to him for superintending the work.

Cautioner—Extinction of Obligation—Release of Security—Water-works Contract—Retention Money.—By a contract for the construction of water-works for a town-council it was stipulated that payments should be made to the contractor monthly on certificates of the engineer at the rate of 80 per cent of the value of the work executed, the remaining 20 per cent being payable half on completion of the work, and the balance at a later period, the town-council “always having power to withhold payment on any certificate should the works not be carried on regularly or to their satisfaction.” The contractor became incapacitated by ill-health from completing the contract. A sum of £400 was then certified as payable to the contractor by the town-council. One of two cautioners for the contractor intervened and completed the contract, with the effect that there was never any failure to carry it on regularly. The town-council, after the cautioner had intervened, with his consent but not with consent of the other cautioner, paid away the £400 to assignees of the contractor.

Held that as the works had been carried on regularly the council would not have been entitled under the contract to withhold payment of the £400, and that by paying it over they did not free the non-consenting cautioner from his obligation.

Observed that the cautioners would have been freed if the town-council had paid over the 20 per cent before the time stipulated.

By contract, dated 13th October 1902, entered into between the 2D DIVISION.
Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Selkirk, first Sheriff of party, and D. M'Donald & Sons, contractors, Hawick, and James Roxburgh, &c.
Alexander M'Donald, the sole partner of that firm, second party, the second party agreed to construct certain water-works for the first parties. Under this contract (first) James Marshall & Company, builders and contractors, Hawick, and James Marshall, sole partner of that firm, and (second) James Pennycook, builder, Hawick, bound themselves, jointly and severally, as cautioners “for the due performance and execution of the above contract” by M'Donald. The contract provided:—“It is hereby declared and agreed to, that the” sum payable to the contractor under the contract “shall be paid to the second party and their foresaids, at the times and in the manner and subject to the conditions set forth in the aforesaid specification, bill of quantities, and general conditions and stipulations, and under any reservations therein or herein mentioned, and particularly and without prejudice to said generality, payments shall be made monthly only on certificates of the said engineer, at the rate of 80 per cent of the estimated value of the work executed by the second party, the remainder being paid, one-half on the date of completion of the work, and the balance on the expiration of the period of maintenance before mentioned, the first party, however, always having power to withhold payment on any certificate should the works not be carried on regularly or to their satisfaction.” *

* The general conditions and stipulations mentioned in the contract provided:—“(15) Bankruptcy.—If the contractor shall from bankruptcy, Nov. 29, 1907. Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook. M'Donald proceeded to carry out the work specified in the contract. The work was delayed by unavoidable causes during the winter of 1902-3. Part of it was executed in the summer of 1903, and operations were resumed in 1904. The rate of progress was not satisfactory to the Town-Council of Selkirk, and on 23d May 1904 they resolved to inform M'Donald and his cautioners that if the work was not carried on satisfactorily after the expiry of eight days the contract would be taken off M'Donald's hands, and the cautioners held liable for any loss sustained in the completion of the work by the Town-Council. On 24th May the Town-clerk by letter informed M'Donald and his cautioners of this resolution, and at a subsequent interview with Marshall further explained the effect of it. Marshall went to Selkirk to see about the work, and with his assistance satisfactory progress was made until 13th July, when M'Donald was taken seriously ill, and became incapacitated, mentally, bodily, and financially, from continuing the contract. Marshall thereupon, without any further demand from the Town-Council, but with their consent, and after asking Pennycook to assist him, and being refused any assistance by him, alone took up the work and completed the contract as cautioner, and in doing so sustained loss.

On 13th July, when M'Donald became incapacitated, there was a sum of £400, due to him on the contract, for payment of which the engineer had granted a certificate. Subsequently the Town-Council with consent of Marshall, but without the consent of Pennycook, paid this £400—£266, 13s. 4d. to a Glasgow firm (Stevenson & Company) who had supplied to M'Donald the pipes required for the works, and £133, 6s. 8d. to Messrs Purdom, solicitors, Hawick, for a bank which had advanced the money for wages, M'Donald having assigned his rights to these persons prior to 13th July by cash orders and formal assignation respectively, all duly intimated to the Town-Council before that date.

insolvency, or any other cause, be prevented from proceeding, or neglect to proceed, with the work with the requisite expedition, or at any time fail to perform the same in a proper manner, or to comply with the orders of the engineer, the Council may, by writing under the hand of their Town-clerk for the time being, give notice to him to suspend the works forthwith, when they may take the same either wholly or in part out of his hands, and take possession of, and retain either for their own use, or for the use of the parties they may employ, all or any tools, materials, engines, or implements which the contractor may have or leave upon the works, and employ such other workmen by contract, or day work, or otherwise, and procure additional plant and materials, and proceed with the said works or the part thereof taken out of the hands of the contractor, and complete the same. Should a part only of the works be taken out of the hands of the contractor, all expenses incurred in completing such part according to the specification shall be awarded by the engineer, and paid by the contractor, or deducted from the unpaid contract moneys in the hands of the Council, but should the Council by such notice take the whole of the works out of the hands of the contractor, on the expiration of such notice this contract shall, at the option of the Council, become void as to the said contractor, but without prejudice to any right of action by the Council to which the said contractor may be subject for any neglect or breach of contract as aforesaid; and in that case the amount already paid to the contractor shall be deemed to be the full value of the works executed by him up to that time when such notice shall have expired, and no further claim shall be made by the contractor for work which may have been done by him up to that time."

Marshall after completing the contract claimed one-half of the loss sustained by him in doing so from Pennycook. In his account, by which he brought out the sum claimed by him, Marshall included this item, "To fee for superintending and expenses for 9 months, £75." Nov. 29, 1907.
Marshall & Co.
v. Pennycook.

Pennycook having refused to pay the sum claimed from him, James Marshall & Company, and Marshall, as sole partner of that firm, raised an action against Pennycook in the Sheriff Court at Hawick, in which they craved decree for payment of £129, 12s. 3d. subsequently restricted to £121, 8s. 2d., being the defender's half of the cost incurred by the pursuer in performing the Selkirk Water-Works contract.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The principals having failed, and the parties being jointly and severally bound as cautioners and sureties for the due fulfilment and execution of said contract, were equally bound on the failure of the principals to complete the same. (2) The defender having failed to discharge or to join with the pursuers in discharging his obligations under said agreement, and the pursuers having duly executed the work themselves are entitled to relief against the defender, their co-cautioner, all as craved. (4) Pursuers were not in the circumstances bound to wait till called upon before taking up said contract, and are not barred by having taken it up as they did.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(6) No intimation of failure of performance by the principal having been made, and the cautioners never having been called upon, they were not bound to complete the contract, and, separatim, the defender not having been called upon or consented to the completion of the contract by the pursuers, he is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (7) The pursuers not having been called upon were not entitled to execute the work themselves and to claim relief against the defender, unless with his previous consent. (8) The cautioners having been freed . . . by the Selkirk Town-Council homologating payments to the assignees, they were not under any legal obligation to finish the contract. (10) In any event the sum sued for is excessive, and the pursuers' position being one of trust, they are not entitled to charge for their services.

Proof was allowed and led.

It was ultimately held to be proved that the pursuer had intervened as cautioner and because he was cautioner; that he had asked the defender to assist him as his co-cautioner; that the loss to the cautioners would have been greater if the pursuer had not, immediately on M'Donald's incapacity emerging in July 1904, taken up the work and completed it; and that in consequence of Marshall's prompt intervention there never was any failure to carry on the work with due expedition or to perform the same in a proper manner. Certain circumstances which rendered it highly advisable in the interests of all concerned—including the cautioners—that Marshall should intervene as he did are stated in the opinion of Lord Low, infra.

On 26th July 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Baillie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact that M'Donald & Son and James M'Donald, the sole partner, on 13th October 1902, entered into a contract with the Selkirk Town-Council for the construction of the Selkirk Water-works, and that pursuer and defender became bound, jointly and severally, as cautioners for due execution of the contract; that in May 1904, M'Donald was not implementing said contract expeditiously, and that on 23d May the Town-Council resolved to inform him and his cautioners that if the work was not carried on Nov. 29, 1907. Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook. satisfactorily after an expiry of eight days the contract would be taken off M'Donald's hands and the cautioners held liable for any loss sustained in the completion of the work by the Town-Council; that on 24th May the Town-clerk by letter informed the cautioners of said resolution, and at a subsequent interview with pursuer further explained to him the effect of the Town-Council's resolution; that satisfactory progress was with pursuer's assistance made until 13th July, when M'Donald was taken seriously ill and incapacitated from continuing the contract; that pursuer thereupon asked defender to assist him, and on his refusal, alone took up and completed the contract as cautioner, and has incurred loss thereby: That the half of said loss is, for the reasons stated in the note, computed at £92, 15s. 8d.: Finds in law that pursuer, having under said circumstances undertaken the work as cautioner on default of the principal obligant, is entitled to be repaid the half of said loss: Therefore grants decree against defender for £92, 15s. 8d.," &c.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Chisholm), who, on 14th December 1906, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuses the appeal; adheres to the interlocutor . . . complained of, with these variations—(1) That in the last finding in fact, the figures '£93, 14s. 8½d.' are substituted for the figures '£92, 15s. 8d.'; (2) that in the decree granted, the said sum of £93, 14s. 8½d. is substituted for £92, 15s. 8d.; and (3) that before said finding in fact this additional finding in fact is inserted, viz.:—"That the loss to the cautioners would have been greater if the pursuer had not, immediately on M'Donald's incapacity emerging in July 1904, taken up the work and completed it"; and decerns."

The defender appealed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 13th and 14th November 1907.

Argued for the defender and appellant;—(1) The pursuer did not intervene as cautioner, but as negotiorum gestor for M'Donald. (2) There was never any default in the sense of the contract. The obligation of a cautioner ad factum præstandum was not himself to perform the obligation specifically but to pay damages if there was default on the part of the principal contractor. Such a cautioner, with consent of his co-cautioners, on default occurring, and demand being made on the cautioners, might come forward and perform the obligation specifically, and if by doing so he minimised the loss his co-cautioners would be liable to him in relief. But he could not be compelled to do anything except to pay damages. Here the Town-Council never declared the contractor in default or ordered him to stop work, and never called upon the cautioners either to pay or perform. The pursuer intervened ultroneously without any demand having been made upon him. The warning of 24th May was not a demand, and in any view its effect was spent, for the work after that date and after the expiry of eight days thereafter, was carried on satisfactorily till 13th July. The Town-Council ought to have made a fresh demand on the cautioners on 16th July. The only explanation of their not having done this was that there was no default. What the pursuer did was to prevent the cautionary obligation arising. He was not entitled to call upon the defender to share the loss which he had incurred by doing so. (3) But if there was default in the carrying out of the contract, and the pursuer intervened legitimately as a cautioner, then the defender was released from his obligation by the payment away of the £400 with consent of the pursuer. It could not be said, at the same time, that there was default, and that the work was being satisfactorily carried on. If the Town-Council were entitled to call upon the cautioners, then they were bound to retain the £400, and if they failed to do so, a cautioner who did not consent to the payment was freed, either in a question with them, or with a co-cautioner who consented to the payment.¹ The liability of the cautioner, and the right to retain, arose at the same moment. Omission to exercise the right of retention was sufficient.² The creditor had a duty to see that the position of the cautioner was not prejudiced by the loss of a security. This was not a case of giving time, but of giving up a security. The principle was that the cautioner was entitled to the beneficium cedendarum actionum. The assignments in favour of the contractor's creditors made no difference. The assignees were in no better position than their assignor.³ The right to retain was preferable to the assignments. The benefit to the work, and so indirectly to the cautioners, from the payment being made, was irrelevant in a question with a cautioner who did not consent to the payment.⁴ If the Town-Council had retained the £400 that would have been more than sufficient to defray the pursuer's loss, which therefore arose not from the performance of the contract, but from his consent to the payment. After default had occurred the right to retain the whole of the amount certified to be due was the same as the right to retain the 20 per cent. (4) In any view, the pursuer was not entitled to charge a fee for superintendence against his co-cautioner. If he had employed and paid someone else he might have been entitled to make the charge, but if he chose to do it himself he could not. He was in this respect in the same position as a trustee.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—When the principal obligant in fact failed to perform his obligation, the accessory obligation of the cautioner became prestable, and a cautioner became entitled and bound immediately to intervene and perform the obligation in the way least burdensome to himself, and on such performance to obtain relief from his co-cautioners for their shares. This was clear in the case of money obligations, but there was no difference in the case of obligations ad factum præstandum. Notice to the cautioners was not necessary. The pursuer here was bound to intervene, but it was enough for the purposes of his contention that he was entitled to do so. If notice were necessary, then there had been notice here. The intimation of 24th May was sufficient notice. The right of the cautioner to intervene was specially clear in this case. M'Donald was incapacitated in mind, body, and estate. Instant action was essential to avoid the risk of great loss from floods and the disorganisation of the whole work by dispersion of workmen and otherwise. The pursuer, in any view, in this case was entitled to intervene to protect himself by minimising the loss. It was proved here that the course ¹ Bell's Prin. secs. 254, 255, and 264; Bell's Com. (ed. M'L.) vol. i. pp. 366, 376, and 377; Sligo v. Menzies, 1840, 2 D. 1478, per Lord Mackenzie, at pp. 1489-90; Hume v. Youngson, 1830, 8 S. 295; Calvert v. London Dock Co., 1838, 2 Keen, 638, 44 R. R. 300; Mayor of Kingston-upon-Hull v. Harding, L. R., [1892] 2 Q. B. 494, per Bowen, L. J., at p. 507.

² Ersk. Inst. iii. 5, 11.

³ Hudson on Building Contracts, (3d ed.) vol. i. pp. 646 and 661.

⁴ Calvert v. London Dock Co., 1838, 2 Keen, 638, per Lord Langdale, M. R., at p. 644.

Nov. 29, 1907. Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook. adopted by the pursuer was the most economical, and in fact minimised the loss of the cautioners. It was also proved that in fact there was default on the part of the principal contractor on 13th July. It was not essential to the occurrence of a breach under this contract that the contract should be formally taken out of the contractor's hands under article 15 of the conditions. The rights conferred by that article were purely optional, and formed no part of the bargain with the cautioners. The law regarding a cautioner's right of relief was conveniently reviewed and summarised by Wright, J., in the case of Wolmershausen v. Gullick.¹ (2) The power to withhold payment of a sum certified as payable was purely discretionary in its nature. The creditor was not bound to exercise it in the interest of the cautioners. No security fund was established as matter of contract with the cautioners by the clause founded on. This was not a case of a heritable or other security. It was more analogous to the case of a landlord's hypothec.² If the money had been held back the work would have been stopped. The creditor was not bound to exercise this discretionary power to his own detriment. The 20 per cent to be retained under the contract was in a different position. The right to retain it was an absolute right, to the benefit of which the cautioners were entitled. That was the kind of right of retention which was under consideration in the case of Mayor of Kingston-upon-Hull.³ The ground upon which a cautioner was freed from his obligation by the creditor giving time or releasing a security was the same, namely, that the creditor had innovated upon the contract with the cautioner. Unless what the creditor did amounted to such innovation the cautioner was not freed. Mere omission to do anything at all was not sufficient.⁴ But further, the circumstances in which the creditor was entitled to exercise this right to withhold payment never arose. The works were never in the position of not being carried on regularly and to the satisfaction of the creditor. Further, the creditor before the breach had recognised the rights of the contractor's creditors, and could not have thereafter withheld payment from them. (3) The pursuer was entitled to charge a reasonable fee for supervision. There was no analogy between his position and that of a trustee.

At advising,—

The opinion of the Court (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD STORMONT-DARLING, LORD LOW, and LORD ARDWALL) was read by LORD LOW.—A cautionary obligation for the due performance of a contract for the construction of works, generally, I imagine, results in a payment of damages for any loss sustained by the employer in the event of the contract not being duly performed. If, however, upon the failure of the contractor, the cautioner is able and willing to step in and complete the work, I see no reason in principle why he should not implement his cautionary obligation in that way, especially if, as in the present case, the creditor in the obligation consents to his doing so.

¹ L. R., [1893] 2 Ch. 514, at p. 518.

² See Hume v. Youngson, 8 S. 295, per Lord Pitmilley, at p. 298.

³ L. R., [1892] 2 Q. B. 494.

⁴ Hume v. Youngson, 8 S. 295, per Lord Pitmilley, at p. 298; Fleming v. Wilson, 1823, 2 S. 336.

Upon the evidence I think that there is no doubt that the pursuer inter-^{Nov. 29, 1907.}
vened and carried on M'Donald's contract because he was cautioner, and as ^{Marshall & Co.}
cautioner, and it seems to me also to be proved that that was the best course ^{v. Pennycook.}
to follow in the interests of the cautioners, because the pursuer's witnesses, ^{Lord Low.} whose evidence is uncontradicted, say that if when M'Donald became incapacitated the pursuer had not carried on the contract, and the Town-Council of Selkirk had been forced to do the work themselves, the loss would have been much greater.

If that be so, then the action of the pursuer was for the benefit of the defender, because if the Town-Council had been compelled to take up the work, the defender would undoubtedly have been liable for any loss which was incurred.

The defender denies that he was aware that the pursuer had taken up the contract as cautioner, and although he admits that the pursuer asked him to go to Selkirk and assist with the work, he says that he understood that he was asked to do so merely in the capacity of a friend and not as co-cautioner. I regret to say that I cannot regard the defender's evidence as being at all trustworthy. I am satisfied that he knew perfectly well that the pursuer was taking up the work as cautioner, and it is also proved that he was pressed both by the pursuer and Mr Purdom to co-operate, but that he refused to do anything, or to express any opinion upon the course which ought to be adopted. My impression is that he hoped that by refusing to say or do anything, while the pursuer completed the work, he might ultimately escape liability altogether.

If there were nothing else in the case I should have no hesitation in agreeing with the learned Sheriffs, but there was one point argued before us which does not seem to have been stated in the Court below, and which requires careful consideration.

In the contract for the execution of the works it was provided that monthly payments should be made to the contractors "only on certificates of the said engineer, at the rate of 80 per cent of the estimated value of the work executed by the second party, the remainder being paid, one-half on the date of completion of the work, and the balance on the expiration of the period of maintenance before mentioned, the first party, however" (and these are the important words), "always having power to withhold payment on any certificate should the works not be carried on regularly or to their satisfaction."

Now, when on the 13th of July 1904 M'Donald was seized with an illness which incapacitated him bodily and mentally, there was a sum of £400 due to him, for payment of which the engineer had granted a certificate. Subsequently the Town-Council, with the consent of the pursuer, paid that sum partly to a Glasgow firm who had supplied to M'Donald the pipes required for the works, and partly to a bank which had advanced the money required for wages, M'Donald having assigned his right to these parties. The defender argued that the Town-Council ought to have exercised the right given to them by the clause which I have quoted, and withheld payment of the £400, which would have been more than sufficient to cover the loss sustained by the pursuer in completing the works; and that as the Town-Council chose to pay away the fund, and thereby deprive the defender, as cautioner, of a

Nov. 29, 1907. security to the benefit of which he was entitled, he was freed from his obligation, and neither the Town-Council nor the pursuer, who consented to the Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook. payment, had any claim against him.

Lord Low.

In considering that argument I think that it is necessary to read, along with the clause in the contract upon which the defender founds, certain provisions in the general conditions and stipulations which were appended to, and formed part of, the contract.

By the 15th of these conditions it was provided that if the contractor should from bankruptcy, insolvency, or any other cause, be prevented from proceeding with the work with the requisite expedition, or fail to perform the same in a proper manner, the Town-Council might, after written notice to the contractor, take the whole works out of his hands, and complete them themselves, in which case the contract should, at the option of the Council, become void as to the contractor, and "the amount already paid to the contractor shall be deemed to be the full value of the work executed by him up to that time, and no further claim shall be made by the contractor for work which may have been done by him up to that time."

Now, if the pursuer had not intervened it seems to be certain that the result of M'Donald's illness would have been that the work would have come to a standstill, because M'Donald had no means and no one to carry on the contract for him. The position of matters contemplated by the 15th condition would therefore have arisen, and the Council would have been compelled to take the work into their own hands, or to employ another contractor. In that event I do not doubt that they would have been entitled to retain, and probably, in a question with the cautioners, would have been bound to retain, the £400 in question. But the occasion never arose for the Council to consider whether or not they would put an end to the contract and do the work themselves, because the pursuer stepped in and carried on the contract in M'Donald's name, and there was never any failure to carry on the work with the requisite expedition, or to perform the same in a proper manner. And it seems to me that the pursuer gives very good reasons for taking up the contract at once, and not allowing any interruption or delay to take place. He had for some time been visiting the work every day and keeping M'Donald up to the mark, and he knew exactly what the position of matters was. It appears that the pipes were being laid near the River Ettrick, and below the level of the river, and during the very week in which M'Donald became ill, the pipe trench had been flooded, and it was very important that the damage thereby caused should be put right at once, as delay would apparently have resulted in increased damage and greater expense. Then there was a squad of men employed who knew the work, and the pursuer desired to retain their services, because if he had not done so there might have been considerable delay in getting another set of workmen together, and in the meantime the works would have been stopped and the Council might have exercised their powers under the 15th condition, which according to the evidence would have resulted in greater loss to the cautioners. It therefore seems to me that the pursuer by his prompt action did what was best in the interests of all concerned—of the cautioners as well as of the Town-Council.

The circumstances, therefore, never having arisen in which the Town-

Council were entitled to put in force the powers of the 15th condition, were Nov. 29, 1907.
they entitled (and therefore bound in the interest of the cautioners) to Marshall & Co.
withhold payment of the £400 in terms of the clause in the contract? v. Pennycook.

Now, under that clause the Council are authorised to withhold payment Lord Low.
only "should the works not be carried on regularly and to their satisfaction." As matter of fact that condition of matters did not exist, because, owing to the intervention of the pursuer both before and after M'Donald's illness, the works had been and were being carried on regularly and to the entire satisfaction of the Council. No doubt the Council knew that what had induced the pursuer to carry on the contract was the fact that he was cautioner, but I do not think that that is of any importance as regards the present question. What is of importance is that M'Donald's contract was carried on without interruption and in a satisfactory manner. That being so, the Council had no right to withhold payment of a sum which had been certified as due and payable to M'Donald. In like manner the pursuer could not have required the Council to withhold payment of the money, because, by virtue of the right to intervene which his position as cautioner gave him, he had simply stepped into M'Donald's place, and was carrying on the contract for and in the name of the latter.

It therefore seems to me that the pursuer having adopted the course which he did, there could be no question of withholding payment of the £400. Accordingly, the defender cannot found upon payment of that sum as freeing him from his obligation. If he is freed from his obligation it must be because the pursuer was not justified in adopting the course which he did, and that his having done so has been to the defender's prejudice. I have already said that in my opinion, so far from that being the case, the course adopted by the pursuer was the best which he could have followed in the interests of the cautioners, and accordingly the defender is, in my judgment, bound to relieve the pursuer of one-half of the loss which has been incurred.

Some English authorities were quoted for the purpose of shewing that payment, by an employer in a contract such as the present to the contractor, of money which the employer was entitled to retain as security for the due completion and maintenance of the work had the effect of freeing the contractor's surety or cautioner, at all events to the amount so paid. These authorities would have been directly applicable to the present case had the Town-Council of Selkirk paid away the 20 per cent which under the contract they were entitled to retain, one-half till the completion of the work and the balance till the expiration of the period of maintenance, but, in my judgment, they have no application to the £400 in question, which was not a security fund under the contract, but a sum which, although it had been certified as due and payable to the contractor, the Council would have been entitled to retain if a condition of matters had arisen which in fact never did arise.

The only other question is in regard to one item in the account lodged by the pursuer, bringing out the loss sustained in completing the contract. That item is a charge of £75, being fee for superintending the work for nine months. It is proved that if a fee for superintendence is allowable at all the amount charged is moderate. I am of opinion that the charge

Nov. 29, 1907. must be allowed. It was necessary that someone should superintend the work, and if the pursuer had not done so himself he would have required Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook. to employ and pay someone else. I think, however, that the pursuer was quite right to supervise the work himself, because the attitude taken up by the defender had placed him in a very delicate position, and he was bound to see that the work was conducted as economically and efficiently as possible. To superintend the work, however, took up time which the pursuer would otherwise have devoted to his own business, and caused him additional expense in carrying on that business to an amount apparently, at all events, equal to the fee charged.

Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed and the interlocutor of the Sheriff affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the defender's appeal against the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff of Roxburgh dated respectively 26th July and 14th December 1906, find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the said interlocutor of 26th July 1906, as varied by the said interlocutor of 14th December 1906: Of new ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £93, 14s. 8½d., with interest at 5 per cent from the date of the Sheriff-substitute's decree.

P. MORISON & SON, S.S.C.—FYFE, IRELAND, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 41. MRS ELIZABETH MARGARET M'DOUGALL OR FENTON LIVINGSTONE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Sol.-Gen. Ure—Macphail.

Mar. 9, 1907. JOHN NIGEL EDENSOR FENTON LIVINGSTONE, Defender (Respondent).—
Hunter, K.C.—Sandeman.

Fenton
Livingstone v.
Fenton
Livingstone.

Husband and Wife—Donation inter virum et uxorem—Revocation—Sums of money consumed.—In an action by a wife against her husband for the recovery of certain sums of money, she alleged that these sums had been lent or paid to, or applied for behoof of, her husband by her, as donations inter virum et uxorem, and that these donations had been revoked by her.

The Court (aff. the judgment of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary) allowed a proof prout de jure quoad those sums which ex facie did not bear to have been applied and consumed, but quoad those sums which ex facie had been applied and consumed, repelled the pursuer's claim as irrelevant.

1st Division. Lord Mackenzie. MRS ELIZABETH MARGARET M'DOUGALL OR FENTON LIVINGSTONE brought an action against her husband, John Nigel Edensor Fenton Livingstone of Westquarter, Stirlingshire, for payment of £2187, 2s. 1d.

The pursuer averred that the sum sued for was made up of various sums which she had at various dates during the marriage lent or paid to, or applied for behoof of the defender; that these various sums were either loans to him or donations inter virum et uxorem; that she had revoked all donations during the subsistence of the marriage; and that the sums in question, whether loans or donations, now fell to be repaid.

The pursuer also averred that the money so paid and applied was part of the capital of a trust-estate in which she had a vested right of fee, and which she had, with the consent of the liferentrix, uplifted from time to time under pressure by the defender.

The defender denied the pursuer's statements, and averred that the alleged payments by the pursuer, so far as not for individual debts incurred by the pursuer, were payments for family expenses, and otherwise for the joint welfare of the pursuer and defender and their family.

Mar. 9, 1907.
Fenton
Livingstone v.
Fenton
Livingstone.

The pursuer pleaded;—The various sums of money detailed in the statement referred to in the condescendence being of the nature either of donations inter virum et uxorem, which have been revoked, or of loans by the pursuer to the defender, decree ought to be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant.

On 24th October 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) ordained the pursuer to lodge a minute specifying which sums were loans and which donations.

Thereupon the pursuer lodged in process (first) a statement, No. 75 of process, detailing the sums lent by her to the defender, and (second) a statement, No. 76 of process, of the donations which she had revoked.*

On 26th December 1906 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“(1) Allows the pursuer a proof by writ or oath, in support of her statement No. 75 of process; (2) allows the pursuer a proof prout de jure in support of her statement No. 76 of process quoad the sums which do not bear, on the face of said statement, to have been

* The statement of donations, No. 76 of process, was as follows:—

Date.	Particulars of Payment.	Amount.
1893.
Aug. 4.	(1) George S. Bellfield, jeweller, Edinburgh, being payment for brooch presented by defender to pursuer on her twenty-first birthday, the latter being compelled to meet the account owing to the defender's lack of funds,	£42 0 0
	(2) George M'Intosh, W.S., defender's agent, being payment for two accounts due by pursuer, for settlement of which defender had previously been supplied by her with funds,	24 13 8
„ 11.	(3) J. N. E. Fenton Livingstone, the defender,	35 0 0
„ 28.	(4) J. N. E. Fenton Livingstone, the defender,	15 0 0
Sept. 1.	(5) Mrs A. Sinclair, nurse, being payment of wages due by defender,	3 6 8
„ 9.	(6) J. N. E. Fenton Livingstone, the defender, for his expenses in London,	15 0 0
Dec. 15.	(7) Barbara Humphrey, servant, being payment of wages due by defender,	1 17 6
1898.
Mar. 1.	(8) Mrs M'Dougall, 30 Stafford Street, Edinburgh, being payment for board of pursuer and family,	40 0 0
„ 23.	(9) Helen Batcham, servant, being payment of wages due by defender,	3 0 0
Apr. 1.	(10) Professional and Civil Service Supply Association, Limited, Edinburgh, for household supplies,	2 10 0

Items 12, 19, 20, 23, 26, 28, and 30 were in the same terms as 3 and 4, but for various sums, the highest being £400.

The other items were similar to 5, 7, 8, 9, and 10 above quoted.

Mar. 9, 1907. applied and consumed, viz.:—Items Nos. 3, 4, 12, 19, 20, 23, 26, 28, and 30, and to the defender a conjunct probation: Finds as regards the sums which ex facie of the statement have been applied and consumed, viz.:—Items Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 29, 31, 32, 33, and 34, that the same are not relevant to be remitted to probation: Repels the pursuer's claim thereto accordingly, and decerns. . . .” *

Fenton
Livingstone v.
Fenton
Livingstone.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer was entitled to proof prout de jure of all the items in No. 76 of process. It was averred by the pursuer that donations by her to her husband were made out of capital and not out of income, and the plea of bona fide consumption did not apply to such donations. *Hutchison v. Hutchison's Trustees*¹ did not apply as there (as was shewn by the interlocutor in *Allan v. Hutchison's Trustees*²) the payments were made out of income. This was true also of the payments referred to by Lord Watson in Edward v. Cheyne.³ It was a question of intention whether the payment of money was a donation, and if it were shewn that the payments in question were intended to be donations to be put to use as capital, the pursuer was entitled to recover the sums sued for whether the money was extant or not.⁴ The payments were not of the nature of a remuneratory grant, as was the case in Cuthill v. Burns.⁵

Argued for the defender and respondent;—There was no authority for the proposition that where a wife gives money to her husband to spend on a purpose agreed on between them she can recover that money as a debt. Contributions made by a wife for the joint welfare of the spouses could not be recovered.⁶ Unless money were given to be applied to a capital use, as an investment, and was in that way earmarked and extant, it could not be recovered.⁷ In the case of all the items, as to which the Lord Ordinary had held that the pursuer's claim was irrele-

* “OPINION.—The pursuer has now lodged two statements, No. 75 specifying the sums said to have been lent, No. 76 specifying the sums said to have been given, by the pursuer to the defender.

“As regards No. 75 there is no difficulty. The pursuer is entitled to a proof by writ or oath. As regards No. 76, her case is that these are donations which she is now entitled to revoke. In my opinion a distinction must be drawn between the sums which on the face of the statement have been applied and consumed, and those which ex facie of the statement may or may not have been. As regards the former, I think the cases cited establish that the pursuer has no claim. Hedderwick v. Morison, 4 F. 163; Hutchison v. Hutchison's Trustees, 4 D. 1399, 5 D. 469, at p. 472; Edward v. Cheyne, 15 R. (H. L.) 37, affirming 13 R. 1209.

“As regards the latter, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to a proof prout de jure. I may say, however, that if all the pursuer is able to prove is that the sums specified were given to the defender without earmarking them in any way as now extant, this would not avail her. The intimation by the pursuer that she revokes a donation made to the defender does not create the relationship of debtor and creditor between them.”

¹ June 10, 1842, 4 D. 1399.

² Feb. 1, 1843, 5 D. 469, at p. 472.

³ March 12, 1880, 15 R. (H. L.) 37.

⁴ Laidlaw v. Laidlaw's Trustee, Dec. 16, 1882, 10 R. 374.

⁵ March 20, 1862, 24 D. 849.

⁶ Allan v. Hutchison, Feb. 1, 1843, 5 D. 469, at p. 472.

⁷ Hedderwick v. Morison, Nov. 22, 1901, 4 F. 163.

vant, the pursuer had obviously from their nature acquiesced in the money being spent. Mar. 9, 1907.

At advising,—

Fenton
Livingstone v.
Fenton
Livingstone.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only question here is whether the allowance of proof as to certain items, and the disallowance of proof as to certain other items, made by the Lord Ordinary is right.

I am of opinion that it is, and I think that the opposite view was really based on an error as to what donation between husband and wife properly is. A donation between husband and wife may, of course, be revoked, but the thing to be revoked must, I think, be a thing which is in the proper sense of the word extant. Of course if we take the cases in the books, the commonest cases are of revocation of deeds, and a deed sought to be revoked is always extant. So, too, in the case of corporeal moveables; if the subject of the donation be still extant, the donation can be recalled and the corporeal moveable brought back to the person who gave it. With regard, however, to sums of money, I do not think it possible ab ante to lay down a rule, because a sum of money may be in an extant state in which it can be revoked, or it may not. But I think the great confusion made in the argument addressed to us on behalf of a universal proof lies in this, that it is not everything which in a popular sense may be said to be a donation that truly is so. That is to say, that if a husband or wife, as the case may be, allows part of their funds to be devoted to what are, after all, mutual purposes, then, though one spouse may have more enjoyment out of the money than the other, that would not be donation between husband and wife. Thus, for example, if a husband were to give his wife money to buy a ticket and go on holiday to the seaside, or to take lodgings at the seaside, in one sense no doubt he has given her the money, but he has not made a donation in the sense of the law. It is simply a husband saying, "I will allow my money to be spent in a certain way for household purposes, though you are to get more enjoyment out of it." On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary, looking at the particular items which I have gone carefully through, is perfectly right, and that the allowance of proof must be as he has fixed it. Of course I say nothing at all at present as to what will be the fate of these particular sums of money, because that will depend on the circumstances of each case, of which I know nothing.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship, for the reasons you have stated.

LORD PEARSON.—I also agree.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that Lord M'Laren, who was absent at the advising, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT adhered.

J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—WADDELL & M'INTOSH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 42.

ARCHIBALD L. NIVEN, Appellant.—Scott Brown.

JOHN STEWART, Respondent.

Nov. 29, 1907.

Niven v.
Stewart.

Election Law—Burgh Occupation Franchise—Tenant and Occupant—Joint Tenants—Valuation-Roll—Occupancy—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 65), secs. 11 and 12.—The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, enacts:—Sec. 11. "Every person . . . shall be entitled to be registered . . . and to vote at elections for" any burgh "who, when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim for registration, shall have been, for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July . . . in the occupancy, either as proprietor, tenant, or liferenter, of any house," within the limits of the burgh of the yearly value of £10. Sec. 12. "Where such premises shall be of the yearly value of £20 or upwards, and shall be jointly occupied by more than one person, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered and to vote, provided his share and interest in the same shall be of the yearly value of £10 or upwards."

A and B and three other persons were, at a rent of £45, joint tenants under a lease of premises in a burgh which were used as billiard and reading rooms by an organisation (consisting of about 100 persons) of which they were members. During the currency of the year ending 31st July 1907 B ceased to be a member of the organisation and his name was deleted from the Valuation-roll.

A having been put on the roll of burgh voters as joint tenant and joint occupant of the premises, on the ground that the rent of the premises was sufficient to afford a £10 qualification to him and to each of the other three remaining occupants, the Court in an appeal held that A's name fell to be deleted from the roll, on the ground that as B still remained a joint tenant under the lease A's interest was under £10.

Question, per Lord Johnston, whether the four persons occupied the premises as joint tenants or merely as members of the organisation, sharing the occupancy with the other hundred members.

Registration
Appeal Court.
LdStormonth-
Darling.
Lord Pearson.
Ld. Johnston.

AT a Registration Court for the burgh of Glasgow, held on 2d October 1907, Archibald L. Niven, a voter on the roll, objected to the names of John Stewart, brush manufacturer, residing at Park Road, Giffnock, and three other persons being on the roll in respect of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow.

The Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) repelled the objections.

The objector obtained a case for appeal with respect to Stewart's right to be on the roll, which was taken to rule the right of the other three persons.

The case set forth that the objections as lodged in Court were to the following effect:—

"The parties objected to have not been the occupants of the premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow, for the statutory period, and they are not the occupants of the premises.

"There are five parties responsible for the rent of these premises, and the rent is insufficient to give a £10 qualification to each."

The case further set forth that the following facts were disclosed at the hearing:—

"1. That the name of the said John Stewart appeared in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown division of the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1907-8 as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road.

"2. That in said list of voters the names of Peter G. Stewart, brush manufacturer, residing at 27 Queen Mary Avenue, Glasgow; William D. Tait, compositor, 17 Castle Mansions, Cathcart; and John Watt, Nov. 29, 1907.

compositor, residing at 110 Thistle Street, Glasgow, also appeared as joint tenants and joint occupants of said premises.

Niven v.
Stewart.

"3. That under the lease (which was produced in Court) said premises are let to the said John Stewart, Peter G. Stewart, William G. Tait and John Watt, and Thomas Anderson, Glasgow, at an annual rent of £45.

"4. That under said lease the said premises are let to be occupied for the purposes of an organisation termed the Independent Labour Party.

"5. That, under the provisions of the Lands Valuation Acts, the factor for said premises returned to the Assessor for the burgh of Glasgow the names of the said John Stewart, Peter G. Stewart, William D. Tait, John Watt, and Thomas Anderson, as tenants and occupants of said premises for the year 1907-8, and that said names were entered in the Valuation-roll by said Assessor.

"6. That the name of the said Thomas Anderson was deleted on appeal from the Valuation-roll by the Assessor, on the ground that he had ceased to be a member of the said Independent Labour Party, and proof was led before me which established that Thomas Anderson had no connection with the Independent Labour Party as occupiers of the premises in question.

"7. That the rental of said premises entered in the Valuation-roll is £45 per annum.

"8. That the said premises are occupied as reading and billiard-rooms of the said Independent Labour Party, and are the headquarters of said organisation in the locality, and that there are about 100 members of the said organisation.

"9. That the said premises have been occupied in this way for the qualifying period, and that the names of the said John Stewart, Peter G. Stewart, and John Watt, were enrolled as voters for the burgh of Glasgow in respect of said premises for the year 1906-7."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was the said John Stewart properly entered in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown division of the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1907-8 as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow? (2) Was the rental qualification of the said John Stewart sufficient to entitle his name to be entered in said list in respect of said premises?"

The undernoted authorities were cited at the hearing by the appellant.¹

There was no appearance for the respondent.

At advising,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire pronounced in a Registration Court for the burgh of Glasgow, repelling certain objections to the entry of the name of John Stewart in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown Division of the burgh as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow. It appears from the facts stated in the case that there is a written lease, which was produced in Court; that under it the premises are let to John Stewart and four other persons at an annual ¹ Russell, Jan. 24, 1863, 1 Macph. 306; Blair v. Torrance, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 319; Blackwood v. Moffat, Oct. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 7; Wainwright v. Aitken, Nov. 27, 1893, 21 R. 162.

Nov. 29, 1907. rent of £45, and that they are so let to be occupied as reading and billiard-rooms for the purposes of an organisation termed the Independent Labour Party, which contains about one hundred members. It is also stated in the case that the name of one of these five persons (Thomas Anderson) was deleted on appeal from the Valuation-roll by the Assessor on the ground that he had ceased to be a member of the said Independent Labour Party, and the Sheriff-substitute adds that a proof was led before him which established that Thomas Anderson had no connection with the Independent Labour Party as occupiers of the premises in question. The effect of this deletion of Anderson's name from the Valuation-roll (I assume on his own appeal, for I do not see that anybody else had any right or interest to bring it) and the establishment of the fact of his want of connection with the Labour Party may have thrown some doubt on his right to occupy the premises at the date when the Sheriff considered the case, but of course it could not affect the question of his liability for the rent during the endurance of the lease, both past and future.

Niven v.
Stewart.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

The Sheriff-substitute notes that the qualification of three persons, being three of the five persons named in the lease (other than the respondent and Thomas Anderson), depend on the same questions of law, and the questions are—“(1) Was the said John Stewart properly entered in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown division of the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1907-8 as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow? (2) Was the rental qualification of the said John Stewart sufficient to entitle his name to be entered in said list in respect of said premises?” I am of opinion that both questions must be answered in the negative.

The statutory right of a person to be entered in the list of voters for a burgh as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises in that burgh depends on the combined effect of section 5 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, section 7 (7), and section 12 of the same Act, and sections 11 and 12 of the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65. Section 5 of the Act of 1884 provides —“Every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or borough in the United Kingdom of a clear yearly value of not less than ten pounds shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election for such county or borough in respect of such occupation, subject to the like conditions respectively as a man is, at the passing of this Act, entitled to be registered as a voter and to vote at an election for such county in respect of the county occupation franchise, and at an election for such borough in respect of the borough occupation franchise.” Section 7 (7) defines the “borough occupation franchise” in Scotland as meaning the franchise enacted by the 11th section of the Act of 1832. That section is only partially repealed by the Act of 1884, section 12, and even this partial repeal is subject to the exceptions of enactments containing “conditions made applicable by this Act to any franchise enacted by this Act.” Now, one of the conditions of section 11 of the Act of 1832 which are thus saved is that the person whose claim is under consideration by the Sheriff must have been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July in any year after 1832 in the occupancy of any qualifying subjects in such burgh. So far nothing is said about joint occupants.

But section 12 of the Act of 1832, after enacting certain provisions about Nov. 29, 1907. successive occupancy of premises of the requisite value and so on, provides ^{Niven v.} that "where such premises shall be of the yearly value of twenty pounds or ^{Stewart.} upwards, and shall be jointly occupied by more than one person, each of ^{LdStormonth-} such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered and to vote, provided ^{Darling.} his share and interest in the same shall be of the yearly value of ten pounds or upwards."

Now, keeping in view that during part at least of the qualifying period of twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July five persons were responsible for the rent of £45, can it be said that the share and interest of any one of them was of the yearly value of ten pounds or upwards? Clearly not, and on this short ground I move your Lordships to sustain the appeal and delete from the roll the names of the respondent and the other persons whose rights are dependent on the same questions of law.

LORD PEARSON.—In this appeal we are under the disadvantage of having no appearance for the respondent. After careful consideration I have not been able to find any sufficient answer to the appellant's argument on the case as stated by the learned Sheriff. It is agreed that the value of the premises is £45 a year. That value will afford a £10 qualification for four joint tenants and occupiers but not for five. Now, it is true that the result of the Sheriff's judgment is to place four joint tenants and occupiers on the roll and no more, and this is in conformity with the Valuation-roll as altered by the Assessor on appeal. But the Valuation-roll, while it is prima facie evidence of the statements which it contains, may be overruled by better evidence; and here the Sheriff expressly finds that under the lease (which was produced in Court) the premises were let to five gentlemen, including the claimant, at an annual rent of £45. Now, that is the best possible evidence that five persons were joint tenants of the subjects, and as the value will not support five votes it seems to follow of necessity that none are qualified. The learned Sheriff, in paragraph 6, explains the Assessor's deletion of one of the names upon a ground which has no necessary connection whatever with the continuance or cessation of his liability as tenant under the lease. And while the remainder of that paragraph may be read, though I doubt whether it really can be read, as meaning that there were only four occupiers during the qualifying period, there were at any rate five joint tenants during that period or during part of it, and that is enough to shew that none of them is entitled to be put upon the voters'-roll.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The first question which requires to be considered in this case is the effect of the entry in the Valuation-roll. The original entry in that roll was of five persons, including the respondent John Stewart, as tenants and occupants of the premises 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow. But on appeal the Valuation-roll was altered by the deletion of the name of one of the said five persons, Thomas Anderson, not because he had ceased to be tenant, but because he had ceased to be a member of the Independent Labour Party, for whose behoof the said five persons were tenants, apparently in trust, of the premises. I am at a loss to know what concern the Valuation Appeal Court had with this fact. Anderson's defection from the ranks of the party did not affect his tenancy, however

Nov. 29, 1907. much it may have affected his actual occupancy of the premises, and the Assessor was perfectly right in inserting his name as tenant in the Valuation-roll. The rental is fixed by the Valuation-roll at £45.

Niven v.
Stewart.

Ld. Johnston.

The Valuation-roll is made conclusive as to the value of premises by the Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 11—Harkness v. Scott,¹ the authority of such cases as Stevenson v. Millar,² and Dunbar v. Rule,³ decided under prior statutes, being now superseded. But the Valuation-roll is not made conclusive on any other point, and is therefore no bar to our considering the real facts of this case so long as we accept the value of the premises as £45 as appearing in the Valuation-roll.

This, then, being a claim to the burgh occupation franchise, the evolution of that franchise has been as follows:—The Reform Act of 1832 conferred the franchise in respect of “occupancy” either on “proprietor, tenant, or liferenter” of premises in burghs of the value of £10.

The Representation of the People Act, 1868, introduced the household franchise irrespective of value, which is in a sense an occupation franchise but involves occupation, not merely as owner or tenant or liferenter, but as inhabitant, and is irrespective of the value of the premises. It is therefore designated not as an occupation, but as a household franchise. This Act further introduced a county occupation franchise depending on tenancy of a £14 value in counties, but it leaves the burgh occupation franchise of 1832 untouched.

The Representation of the People Act, 1884, assimilated the occupation franchise in counties and burghs, declaring by section 5 that “every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or burgh” of £10 value shall be entitled to the franchise in the county or burgh respectively, subject to the like conditions respectively as governed the county occupation franchise and the burgh occupation franchise at the passing of the Act. Although this section refers to nothing except “occupation,” the interpretation clause, section 7, subsection 7, refers back for the meaning of burgh occupation franchise to the Reform Act of 1832, section 11. This section I have already referred to, and pointed out that it requires as the basis of the occupancy either ownership, tenancy, or liferent. But then the interpretation section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, section 7, subsection 8, adds that “any enactments amending or relating to the county occupation franchise or burgh occupation franchise other than the sections in this Act on that behalf mentioned shall be deemed to be referred to in the definition of the county occupation franchise and the burgh occupation franchise in this Act mentioned”—(see also the same Act, section 12). That appears to me to let in the provisions of the Reform Act, 1832, section 12, which, with reference to the occupation franchise created by the previous sections of that Act, provides thus for a case of joint occupancy:—“Where such premises shall be of the yearly rent or value of £10 or upwards, and shall be jointly occupied by more than one person, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered and to vote provided his share and interest in the same shall be of the yearly value of £10 or upwards.” There must therefore not only be joint occupancy, but that occupancy must be as owner, tenant, or liferenter, and the share and interest in the tenancy must be of Nov. 29, 1907. £10 value. Mr Anderson having retired from the Independent Labour Party the four other tenants may have the sole occupancy, but their share and interest depends, not on the occupancy, but on the tenancy, and in calculating that share and interest they cannot discard Mr Anderson, their joint tenant. The share of each is therefore only a fifth of £45, or less than £10 in value. Stewart has therefore no sufficient tenancy qualification for the occupation franchise.

¹ 1899, 2 F. 268.

² 1880, 8 R. 8.

³ 1883 11 R. 167.

I desire at the same time to reserve my opinion as to whether Stewart, and the other three persons who are in the same position, are occupiers in the sense of the statutes. They may be joint tenants, but I doubt whether they occupy as joint tenants, and not merely by reason of membership of the Independent Labour Party's Club, sharing the occupancy with the 100 other members of whom we are told it is composed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the questions of law in the case in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Remit to the Sheriff to alter the register of voters for the burgh of Glasgow by deleting the names of John Stewart, designed in the case, and of Peter G. Stewart, William D. Tait, and John Watt, designed in the list annexed to the case, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to £3, 3s. of modified expenses, and decern."

S. F. SUTHERLAND, S.S.C., Agent.

WILLIAM CORY & SON, LIMITED (Owners of the s.s. "James Joicey"), No. 43.

Pursuers (Respondents).—Hunter, K.C.—Spens.

ANDREA KOPAJTIC (Master of the s.s. "Kostrena"), Defender (Reclaimer).—Murray—Carmont.

Nov. 27, 1907.

The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

Et e contra.

Ship—Collision—Fog—Duty of stopping—Foreign Vessel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, Art. 16—Merchant Shipping Act, 1897 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 419, subsec. (4).—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 419, subsec. (4), enacts, that where in a case of collision it is proved that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship infringing the regulation shall be deemed to be in fault unless the circumstances made departure from the regulation necessary.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, Art. 16, provide, inter alia:—"A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog-signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over."

About noon on 10th February 1907 a collision took place off the coast of Norfolk in a dense fog between the British steamer "James Joicey," proceeding south to London, and the Austrian steamer "Kostrena," proceeding north to Methil. In cross actions of damages the following facts were held to be proved:—The vessels were proceeding on nearly parallel courses. The "Kostrena" heard a fog-signal from the "James Joicey" but did not stop as required by Art. 16 of the Regulations. Believing that she had the "James Joicey" on her port bow, whereas in point of fact the "James Joicey" was on her starboard bow, the "Kostrena" on approaching the "James Joicey," ported her helm with the result that she went to starboard and collided with the "James Joicey." Austria had adopted the Regula-

Nov. 27, 1907.

The "James
Joicey" v.
The "Kos-
trena."

tions for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, but had not adopted the collision sections of the Merchant Shipping Act; and the "Kostrena" therefore maintained that the statutory presumption of fault enacted by sec. 419, subsec. (4), of the Act did not apply to her.

Held (1) that whether sec. 419, subsec. (4), applied to the "Kostrena" or not, it was essentially bad seamanship for a steam vessel on hearing the fog-signal of another vessel not to stop in order to ascertain the position of the signalling vessel when she next sounded; and (2) that the collision was due to the fault of the "Kostrena," she not having stopped, and having in consequence failed to ascertain the position of the "James Joicey," with the result that the "Kostrena" executed the manœuvre which brought about the collision.

Ship—Collision—Fog—Vessel "not under command"—"Moderate speed"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, Arts. 15 and 16.—The Regulations of 1897 for Preventing Collisions at Sea, inter alia, provide—Art. 15—"In fog . . . (e) . . . A vessel under way which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel through being not under command, or unable to manœuvre as required by these rules, shall . . . at intervals of not more than two minutes, sound three blasts in succession, viz., one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts. . . ." Art. 16—"Every vessel shall, in a fog . . . go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions."

The steamer "James Joicey" through a collision with the steamer "Syria," in a dense fog, had her stem cut away from a little above the water line upwards with the result that her forward compartment soon filled, but her engines and steering-gear were uninjured, and she was able to proceed and to manœuvre slowly, but she could not go at full speed. She hoisted the signals for a vessel "not under command," but she sounded the ordinary fog-signals and not those required by Art. 15 of the Regulations for a vessel not under command. Some hours afterwards, the fog still continuing, she came into collision with the steamer "Kostrena." In cross actions of damages the "Kostrena" pleaded that the "James Joicey" being a vessel not under command, was in fault in not sounding the signals required by Art. 15. It appeared that the "Kostrena" did not stop on hearing an ordinary fog-signal from the "James Joicey" in order to ascertain the position of the "James Joicey" when she sounded again, and that this failure to stop was the cause of the collision.

Held that as the "James Joicey" was not going at other than a "moderate" speed, in terms of Art. 16, and as when going at a moderate speed she was under command, she could not in the circumstances be described as a vessel not under command, and therefore that she was not in fault in not giving the signals required by Art. 15; and further, that in any view her failure to give these signals did not contribute to the collision, which was due to the "Kostrena" not having stopped on hearing the ordinary fog-signal from the "James Joicey."

The "Kostrena" was going at a speed through the water of about 3 knots an hour, but as the tide, which was with her, was running at about $2\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour, her speed over the ground was about $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour.

Held by Lord Salvesen, Ordinary, that her progress over the ground was to be taken as the measure of her speed, and that $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots was not a "moderate" rate within the meaning of Art. 16 of the Regulations.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Salvesen.

ABOUT mid-day on Sunday, 10th February 1907, during a dense fog, a collision took place between the s.s. "James Joicey" of London and the s.s. "Kostrena" of Fiume, Austria, at a point (outside the three-mile limit) some distance north of the Middle Cross Sand Lightship, which was situated off the coast of Norfolk in a north-easterly direction from Yarmouth. At the time of the collision the

"James Joicey" was proceeding south from Blyth in Northumberland to London, and the "Kostrena" was proceeding north from Dunkirk to Methil. Nov. 27, 1907.
The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

Thereafter cross actions were brought by William Cory & Son, Limited, the owners of the "James Joicey," and Andrea Kopajtic, the master of the "Kostrena," and as such in this country representing her owners, for damages on account of the injuries sustained by the vessels respectively through the collision.

In the action at their instance the owners of the "James Joicey" averred:—(Cond. 2) "The steamship 'James Joicey,' on the morning of Sunday, the 10th February 1907, encountered a dense fog near the Cross Sands off Yarmouth. She had previously been in collision with the s.s. 'Syria' on the evening of Saturday, the 9th February, and was proceeding at the time dead slow in a damaged condition, with two black balls on her masthead. The whistle of the 'James Joicey' was being sounded at intervals in terms of the regulations. A fog-signal was heard by her forward of her beam and on the starboard bow, and her engines were at once stopped and the fog-signal answered. A second blast was heard forward of the beam and still on the starboard bow, and this was again answered. Immediately thereafter the 'Kostrena' loomed up out of the fog close on the 'James Joicey's' starboard bow, heading about N.-E., and going at an excessive rate of speed. The 'James Joicey' at once gave two short blasts, put her engines full speed astern, and gave three short blasts, but before any alteration could be made on the helm the 'Kostrena,' coming on very fast across the bows of the 'James Joicey,' struck with the bluff of her port bow the 'James Joicey' on the starboard bow. The 'Kostrena' had some time before the collision ported her helm. The 'James Joicey's' course at the time was about S.½W." (Cond. 3) "The collision was caused entirely through the careless navigation of those in charge of the 'Kostrena,' for whom the defender is responsible. In particular, they failed to go at a moderate rate of speed in the fog, and when the fog-signal from the 'James Joicey' was heard, apparently forward of their beam, to stop their engines and navigate with caution. They also failed to go full speed astern before the collision, and improperly altered their course before the collision by porting their helm; they also failed to keep a proper lookout, and regularly to give the appropriate fog-signals, all in contravention of the Regulations for Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and particularly Arts. 15, 16, 19, 21, and 29 thereof, and of the ordinary rules of good seamanship." *

* The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), enacts:—

Sec. 419, subsec. (4),—"Where in a case of collision it is proved to the Court before whom the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary."

The Regulations of 1897 for Preventing Collisions at Sea, provide:—

"Art. 15. In fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorms, whether by day or night, the signals described in this article shall be used as follows, viz.:— . . .

"(e) A vessel under way which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel through being not under command, or unable to manœuvre as required by these rules, shall . . . at intervals of not

Nov. 27, 1907.

The "James
Joicey" v.
The "Kos-
trena."

In the action at his instance the master of the "Kostrena" averred:—(Cond. 2) " . . . About 11.56 A.M., while the 'Kostrena' was steering N. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. and was about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the Middle Cross Sand Lightship, the fog-signal of a steamer, which ultimately proved to be the 'James Joicey,' was heard on the 'Kostrena's' port bow. Owing to the number of whistles which were heard in close proximity to and abaft the beam of the 'Kostrena' from steamers proceeding in the same direction, it would have been dangerous to stop the engines of the 'Kostrena,' but her speed was only such as would keep steerage way on the vessel. The whistle of the 'James Joicey' was answered. Another prolonged blast was heard from the 'James Joicey,' followed after a short interval by two short blasts. As these two short blasts appeared to be very close to the 'Kostrena,' the latter's engines were at once stopped, the helm ported, and one short blast sounded, that being in the opinion of the master the only means left to him to avert the collision. Practically at the same time as the short blast was sounded from the 'Kostrena's' whistle, the 'James Joicey' loomed out of the fog. The 'James Joicey' was then seen to be carrying two black balls on her foremast to indicate that she was not under command, owing to her having been in a collision with the s.s. 'Syria.' On sighting the 'James Joicey' the engines of the 'Kostrena' were at once reversed, and three short blasts sounded, but notwithstanding this the 'James Joicey' struck the 'Kostrena' on the bluff of the port bow with her stem, inflicting considerable damage." (Cond. 3) "The said collision was caused entirely through the fault and unskilful navigation of those in charge of the 'James Joicey,' and by their failing to observe the Regulations for Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and in particular Arts. 15, 16, 18, 19, 22, and 29. The 'James Joicey' was in fault (1) in being under way in the fog, having regard to the fact that she was not under command and that there was a large number of steamers in the immediate vicinity; (2) in proceeding at an excessive speed in the fog; (3) in failing to stop her engines on hearing forward of her beam the fog-signals of the 'Kostrena,' and thereafter to navigate with caution; (4) in failing, on approaching the 'Kostrena,' to slacken her speed or stop or reverse; (5) in failing to keep a proper lookout; (6) in failing to keep out of the way of the 'Kostrena'; and (7) in failing to give the signals provided for by Art. 15 (e) of the said Regulations. In contravening the said Regulations the 'James Joicey' is, in terms of section 419, subsection (4), of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), deemed to be in fault."

The actions were conjoined, and a proof was allowed and led. The import of the proof is given in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

On 11th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the collision was caused solely through the more than two minutes, sound three blasts in succession, viz., one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts.

"Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain-storms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions.

"A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog-signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over."

fault of those in charge of the "Kostrena," and granting leave to Nov. 27, 1907. reclaim.*

The "James
Joicey" v.
The "Kos-
trena."

* "OPINION.—These counter actions arise out of a collision which took place on the 10th of February 1907, between the Austrian steamship 'Kostrena' and the British steamship 'James Joicey.' At the time of the collision there was a dense fog. The sea was smooth, and there was a light wind from the south-west. The collision took place some distance north of the Middle Cross Sand Lightship, which is situated off the coast of Norfolk, and in a north-easterly direction from Yarmouth. Both vessels were seriously damaged, but the question of liability is the only one which I have to determine at present.

"There is a remarkable agreement as to the point of time at which the collision occurred. Roughly speaking, it may be taken that the moment of impact was about twelve o'clock noon on the 10th, which was a Sunday. At that time the fog was so dense that, according to the evidence of those on board the 'Kostrena,' a vessel could not be seen at a greater distance than 400 or 500 yards; while, according to the evidence of the master of the 'James Joicey,' a vessel could only be seen 100 yards away. The second officer of the 'Kostrena' says that the 'James Joicey' only became visible at 200 to 300 metres from the 'Kostrena'; and probably the truth lies somewhere between his figure and that of the master of the 'James Joicey.' The fog was therefore of such a character that it was incumbent on both vessels to proceed at a moderate rate of speed, more especially in the locality in question, which is in the direct track of all the traffic passing from Scotland and the Baltic southwards to London and through the English Channel.

"The fog had commenced on the evening of the preceding day; and about 9 P.M. the 'James Joicey' was in collision with another vessel called the 'Syria.' In that collision she had her stem from the 13-foot line upwards carried away; and although the damage was somewhat above the water-line it was so near it that the forward collision compartment soon completely filled. For some time thereafter she was accompanied by the 'Syria,' but about 2 A.M., as there appeared to be no immediate danger to the 'James Joicey,' the vessels parted company, and the 'James Joicey' proceeded on her course. At 9.30 A.M. she passed the Newarp Buoy at so short a distance that the officer in charge was able to see the buoy itself, notwithstanding the continuance of the fog. According to the whole evidence the engines were from that time kept moving dead slow, except for ten minutes between 10.50 and 11, during which they were put to half speed.

"After this collision with the 'Syria' the 'James Joicey' exhibited two red lights, indicating that she was not under command; and next morning the captain had them replaced with two black balls, which constitutes the corresponding day signal. In my opinion this latter signal ought never to have been exhibited. The engines of the 'James Joicey' were uninjured, and so was her steering gear. It is true that she was not able to proceed at full speed, and could not therefore manœuvre so rapidly as if she had been uninjured; but there was nothing to prevent her proceeding dead slow or even with her engines at half speed, which according to the expert evidence would give her a movement through the water of about six knots. I was referred on this point to two cases. The 'Hawthornbank,' [1904], P., pp. 120 and 129, and the 'P. Caland,' A. C. [1893], p. 207. The former was the case of a sailing ship which had been injured by a collision, her foretopmast and head stays with sails and gear having been carried away, and her bows stove in. She had hoisted her lower maintopsail, and was moving through the water at about three knots, and she was held to be not under command although she was being steered in a definite course which she was able to alter, although very slowly. That was a very special case, and the present seems to me to be practically ruled by the decision of the Nov. 27, 1907. The master of the "Kostrena" reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division.

The "James
Joicey" v.
The "Kos-
trena."

There was a nautical assessor at the hearing on the reclaiming note. Argued for the reclaimer;—I. The Lord Ordinary had held that the "Kostrena" was in fault in three respects, namely, (1) that she was not going at "a moderate speed," and was thus in breach of the first paragraph of Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea of 1897; (2) that she failed to stop on hearing the fog-signal of the "James Joicey," contrary to the second paragraph of the same Article; and (3) that she ported her helm, with the result that she went to starboard and so caused the collision. In all these respects the Lord Ordinary had reached an erroneous conclusion. (1) The Lord Ordinary held that the "Kostrena" was going at a speed of about $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots. The Lord Ordinary reached that figure by taking, not the speed through the water, i.e., the engine speed, but Privy Council in the second case referred to. Here the vessel was able to proceed at five or six knots an hour. She could stop and reverse her engines, which were uninjured; and she could steer, although she would not answer her helm so quickly as when going at a higher speed. A vessel in such circumstances cannot, in my opinion, be described as being 'not under command'; and I think the master of the 'James Joicey' made a mistake in exhibiting a signal to that effect. Fortunately for her, however, it is not said that the signal in any way misled the 'Kostrena,' or could have done so looking to the very short period which elapsed from the time that it was seen until the collision. The sounds signal, which in a fog is prescribed with the view of warning vessels that they are in the vicinity of a ship not under command, was not sounded, and strange to say, does not appear even to have been known to the master of the 'James Joicey.'

"As neither vessel had an opportunity of observing the other until the collision was imminent, the evidence as to speeds, courses, and navigation must be derived exclusively from the witnesses on board each. There is only one matter with regard to which there is a complete conflict of evidence. According to the 'Kostrena,' the whistle of the 'James Joicey' was heard about three points on her port bow, and before the collision she was seen on the port side crossing at an angle of 45 degrees from port to starboard. The witnesses from the 'James Joicey,' on the other hand, deponed that the 'Kostrena' was on her starboard bow when her whistle was first heard, and that she was seen crossing at a broad angle on a port helm from the port to the starboard side of the 'James Joicey.' This curious conflict is difficult to explain; but the real evidence enables me to prefer the story of the 'James Joicey.' The vessels were practically approaching on parallel courses; and I am satisfied, for reasons that I shall afterwards explain, that the 'Kostrena' was going at a much higher rate of speed than the 'James Joicey.' If therefore the 'Kostrena' ported her helm, as her witnesses say, some short time before the collision, it was impossible that the collision could have occurred, unless the 'James Joicey' had previously starboarded and was proceeding at a much higher rate of speed. On the other hand, the collision is amply explained by the 'Kostrena' porting her helm when she had the 'James Joicey' on her starboard bow. The only evidence for the 'Kostrena' that tends to support her case is that given by Captain Tait, who says that, taking the courses of the two vessels described in their logs, the 'James Joicey' would pass to the westward of the 'Kostrena.' The value of that evidence, however, depends on the distance at which the 'Kostrena' passed the Middle Cross Sand Lightship, which is a mere matter of estimate, and also on the assumption that the courses of the two vessels were maintained with mathematical accuracy.

"The next question is what were the respective speeds of the two vessels the speed over the ground. That was to say about $2\frac{1}{2}$ knots, the estimated speed at which the tide, which was with the "Kostrena," was running was added to 3 knots, her estimated speed through the water. That was an erroneous method of calculation. The proper test was speed through the water only, when both vessels were in motion.¹ A speed of 3 knots was a moderate speed. To have gone slower would have involved the risk of losing steerage way. (2) Admittedly the "Kostrena" did not stop when she heard the fog-signal of the "James Joicey." She was justified in not stopping, as there were a number of vessels in the neighbourhood, which made it important that she should not lose her steerage way. Even if she was not justified, and was thus in breach of the second paragraph of Art. 16 of the Regulations, it did not follow that she was to be held to have been in fault. Had she been a British vessel, no doubt the statutory presumption of fault enacted by sec. 419, subsec. (4), of the

Nov. 27, 1907.

The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

prior to the collision? It is admitted that for an hour the 'James Joicey' had been going against the tide, while the 'Kostrena' had the tide with her. If, therefore, each vessel had her engines going dead slow, which would represent a speed through the water of 3 knots, the actual speed over the ground of the 'Kostrena' would be much greater than that of the 'James Joicey.' The only scientific calculation of the strength of the tide during the hour preceding the collision is made by Captain Cowie, who puts it at 2.64 knots per hour. On that assumption the 'Kostrena' would be moving at least 5.64 knots as against a speed of .36 knots for the 'James Joicey.' Even if the tide was only flowing a knot and a half an hour, as some of the witnesses estimate, the 'Kostrena' would still be going at $4\frac{1}{2}$ knots, or three times as fast as the 'James Joicey.' Mr Dickson asked me to hold that the 'James Joicey' must have been going at half speed. There is no evidence whatever from which I could draw that inference. The engineer's log-book, which is carefully kept, records that for nearly an hour before the collision her engines were kept moving dead slow; and the distance she covered in the previous four hours is entirely consistent with the entries in the log. The Solicitor-General in the same way asked me to hold that the 'Kostrena' had her engines moving at half speed. I think I am not at liberty to draw this inference either, and I cannot hold it proved that the 'Kostrena' was going at a greater rate of speed over the ground than $5\frac{1}{2}$ or 6 knots. Considering the fog which prevailed, I am of opinion that this was in excess of a moderate speed. It was sought to be justified on the ground that the 'Kostrena' would not have steerage way unless she were going at least 3 knots through the water. I cannot accept that evidence, because cases frequently occur of vessels moving only from 1 to 2 knots through the water, and yet having sufficient steerage way to navigate narrow channels. The 'Kostrena' was therefore to blame for infringing the first part of Article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

"The 'Kostrena' was also, in my opinion, further to blame for infringing the second paragraph of Article 16. This paragraph is in the following terms:—'A steam vessel hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog-signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.' On her own shewing, the 'Kostrena' did not observe this regulation. At 11.45 she heard the whistle of a vessel that she now believes to have been the 'James Joicey' about three points on her port bow. It was imperative that she should then stop her

¹ The "Resolution," 1889, 6 Asp. Mar. Cases, 363; The "Germanic," reported in the Times of date Feb. 22, 1896; Marsden on Collisions at Sea, 5th ed., p. 374.

Nov. 27, 1907.

The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, would have applied. But she was an Austrian vessel, and secs. 418 and 424 of the Act shewed that the collision sections of the Act did not apply to a foreign vessel outside British jurisdiction, that was to say, outside the three-mile limit, unless the country to which the vessel belonged had adopted these sections,¹ and as Austria had not adopted them, and the collision here took place outside the three-mile limit, it followed that the "Kostrena" was not to be presumed to have been in fault; on the contrary, the onus was on the "James Joicey" to prove that the breach of the Article caused, or contributed to cause, the collision. The "James Joicey" had failed to discharge that onus. (3) The "Kostrena" was not in fault in porting her helm, for the "James Joicey" was to begin with on her port bow; that was the fair result of the evidence.

II. The "James Joicey" was in fault in respect (1) that she was not going at a moderate speed, as required by the first paragraph of engines. The reason of the rule, as explained by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of The 'Warsaw,' 8 F. 1013, is 'to give opportunity of accurate observation of sound'; and it is noticeable that according to the engineer's log the 'Kostrena' had done this on previous occasions. The excuse suggested for not complying with the rule, viz., that if the 'Kostrena' lost steerage way her position might be endangered because of the number of vessels whose signals she heard on all sides, is untenable. The fact that the locality was crowded with shipping made it all the more necessary for the 'Kostrena' to observe the rule. It does not, of course, follow that the engines should remain stopped, but I think it may be assumed in this case that if the rule had been complied with, the 'Kostrena' would in all probability have correctly located the position of the 'James Joicey' as on her starboard bow, and not on her port bow; and that she would further have made the collision less likely by having had her way considerably reduced.

"It follows from what I have said, that the 'Kostrena' was still further to blame in porting her helm before she had ascertained the exact position of the approaching vessel. On the theory that that vessel was still three or four points on the 'Kostrena's' port bow the manœuvre is unintelligible; although, if the position of the 'James Joicey' had been correctly located, it would of course have been harmless. It was this manœuvre which directly led to the collision, and brought the 'Kostrena' across the 'James Joicey's' bows at an angle variously estimated at from 60 to 90 degrees. The only possible explanation seems to be that the master of the 'Kostrena' realised when he heard the second blast from the 'James Joicey' that she was not in the position he originally believed, and that for the moment he lost his head.

"It is a more difficult question whether the 'James Joicey' was also to blame, and no less than seven charges are made against her in cond. 3, some of which, however, are no longer insisted in. I have already dealt with the first two and the seventh. The fourth, fifth, and sixth are not supported by the evidence; and, as I understood from the counsel for the 'Kostrena,' were not insisted in. There remains the third charge, which is to the effect that the 'James Joicey' was to blame in failing to stop her engines on hearing forward of her port beam the fog-signals of the 'Kostrena,' and, thereafter, to navigate with caution. This charge rests on a single entry in the mate's log, which puts the time when the 'Kostrena's'

¹ Mortensen v. Peters, July 19, 1906, 8 F. (J. C.) 93; The "Hibernia," 1874, 2 Asp. Mar. Cases, 454; The "Fanny M. Carvill," 1875, L. R., 13 App. Cases, 455, note; The "Magnet," 1875, L. R., 4 Ad. & Ecc. 417; The Queen v. Keyn, 1876, L. R., 2 Exch. Div. 63; The "Saxonia," 1862, 1 Lush. 410.

Article 15 of the Regulations. (2) That she did not stop on hearing the "Kostrena's" whistle. The mate's log bore that she heard the "Kostrena's" whistle "about 11.50," and the engineer's log that she was stopped at 11.57—a delay of seven minutes. The evidence of a ship's log against herself was very strong.¹ In any view the onus was on the "James Joicey" to shew that she complied with the Article.² (3) That she went astern on a starboard helm. (4) That being a vessel not under command she did not give the signals required by Article 15 (e) of the Regulations. She was partially waterlogged and was unable to go ahead at full speed, and consequently she was unable to manœuvre as quickly as other vessels were entitled to expect, which was the test of not being under command.³ It was said that as the "Kostrena" did not stop for the signal which the "James Joicey" actually gave, she would not have stopped for the signal which the "James Joicey" ought to have given. It was needless to go into speculations of that sort; the "James Joicey" being in breach of Article 15 (e) it was for her to prove that the breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision.⁴

Nov. 27, 1907.
The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

whistle was heard at 11.50 A.M.; whereas, according to the evidence, the engines were not stopped until a few minutes before the collision. The complete entry is as follows:—'About 11.50 A.M. heard a steamer's whistle on our starboard bow, our engines were stopped, and a whistle was again heard on starboard bow, and almost at the same time a steamer loomed out of the fog.' The engineer's log records that the engines were stopped at 11.57, and were put full speed astern at 11.59. Reading these two documents together, it was powerfully argued that the 'James Joicey' must be taken to have heard the first whistle of the 'Kostrena' on her starboard bow at 11.50, that the engines were not stopped until seven minutes later, and that the collision occurred about 11.59 or 12 o'clock. In my opinion, this is not the only construction of the documents. The mate's log, which records the time of hearing the first whistle as about 11.50, may also be read as implying that the engines were thereafter immediately stopped; and that is what the captain and mate say in their evidence, the only difference being that they place the time when they heard the first blast at 11.54 or 11.55, and put the collision at 11.57, or two or three minutes earlier than the engineer. It is no doubt strange, if the 'Kostrena's' whistle was being regularly sounded, that it had not been heard by those on board the 'James Joicey.' But the onus of proving a breach of a statutory regulation, which raises a presumption of fault, is on the person who alleges it; and, in my opinion, the evidence is insufficient to justify the conclusion which the 'Kostrena's' counsel pressed upon me. Even if the 'James Joicey' heard the whistle at 11.50, and failed to stop, I do not see how that could have contributed to the collision. Moving, as she was, only from a half to one knot per hour over the ground, she could not have remained stopped for more than a fraction of a minute before she would entirely lose her way; and it is difficult to suggest how she could have been navigated with greater caution than she actually was. I accordingly pronounce the 'Kostrena' solely to blame for the collision."

¹Campbell v. Tyson, Dec. 22, 1841, 4 D. 342; Clyde Shipping Co., Limited, v. Miller, 1907, S. C. 1145; The "Eleanor," 1809, 1 Edwards, 135; The "L'Etoile," 1816, 2 Dodson, 106.

²The "John Harley" v. The "William Tell," 1865, 13 L. T. R. 413.

³The "P. Caland," L. R., [1893] A. C. 207, Lord Herschell at p. 213; The "Hawthornbank," L. R., [1904] p. 120.

⁴The "Duke of Buccleuch," L. R., [1891] A. C. 310; The "Fanny M. Carvill," L. R., 13 App. Cas. 455; The "Arratoon Apar," 1889, L. R. 15 A. C. 37.

Nov. 27, 1907.

The "James
Joicey" v.
The "Kos-
trena."

Argued for the "James Joicey";—I. (1) The Lord Ordinary had rightly held, and on the right grounds, that the "Kostrena" was not going at a moderate speed. (2) Whether the statutory presumption of fault, enacted by section 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, applied or did not apply to the "Kostrena," for a vessel in a fog not to stop on hearing a signal from another vessel was fundamentally bad seamanship. Besides, the regulations admittedly applied to the "Kostrena," and she had admittedly violated Article 16. It was said that her failure to stop did not in any way contribute to the collision, but one purpose of requiring a vessel to stop on hearing a signal from another vessel was by lessening the noise on board to enable her to locate the position of the signalling vessel when she signalled again,¹ and the reasonable inference was that the neglect of this precaution by the master of the "Kostrena" caused him to commit the blunder which was the immediate cause of the collision; for (3) the real evidence in the case pointed clearly to the conclusion that the two vessels were proceeding on nearly parallel courses, but in opposite directions, starboard to starboard. The master of the "Kostrena" however thought that he had the "James Joicey" on his port bow, and acting on that assumption he ported his helm, with the result that the "Kostrena" went to starboard and collided with the "James Joicey." In these three respects the "Kostrena" was in fault.

II. On the other hand the "James Joicey" was not in fault in any of the respects alleged against her by the "Kostrena." (1) She was going at a moderate speed. A speed over the ground, which was the correct test, of from half a knot to one knot an hour could not be described as other than a moderate speed. (2) She stopped on hearing the "Kostrena's" whistle. The mate's log, fairly read, implied that the engines of the "James Joicey" were stopped on hearing the whistle, and all that the engineer's log shewed was that he and the mate were not agreed as to the exact minute at which the engines were stopped. (3) To go astern on a starboard helm was a correct manœuvre. (4) The "James Joicey" was not a vessel "not under command." It was a question depending on the circumstances of the particular case.² The circumstances here were that there was a dense fog which made it the duty of the "James Joicey" to go at slow speed in any case, and that going at that slow speed she was perfectly under command, her engines and her steering gear being uninjured. True, she was not in a condition to go at full speed, which, had it been open weather, would have given room for the argument that if the "James Joicey" did not exhibit the signals for a vessel not under command, the "Kostrena" would have been entitled to assume that the "James Joicey" was a vessel able to manœuvre at full speed. De facto however, she had hoisted the day-signals for a vessel not under command. In any view, as the "Kostrena" did not stop for the signal which the "James Joicey" actually gave, it was not to be supposed that she would have stopped for the signal which she now said ought to have been given. Therefore, even if the "James Joicey" omitted to give the proper signal the omission did not contribute to the collision.

¹ Crawford v. Granite City Steamship, Co., Limited, July 5, 1906, 8 F. 1013, per the Lord Justice-Clerk, at p. 1021; The "Resolution," 6 Asp. Mar. Cases, 363.

² The "P. Caland," L. R., [1893] A. C. 207.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had a very able debate in this case, Nov. 27, 1907. and have had very able assistance from the Nautical Assessor. The conclusion to which I have come, and in which your Lordships concur, is ^{The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."} that the decision of the Lord Ordinary is right. As in those cases generally, so in this case, there is a considerable conflict of evidence. I have found myself quite unable to accept the estimate given by the captain of the "Kostrena" as to her distance eastward from the Middle Cross Sand Light when she passed. It is quite certain that she was a great deal nearer than the captain thought, and that if she had not been a great deal nearer this collision could not possibly have happened whatever the "James Joicey" might have done. That they were approaching one another, the "James Joicey" going southwards towards the Middle Cross Sand Light, and the "Kostrena" going northward, and that they were within narrowish limits as regards their courses, I cannot doubt. It is clear that if the "Kostrena" had kept the course her captain says she was keeping she could hardly have got into the position of being on the "James Joicey's" starboard bow. I am not satisfied that she kept that course accurately. I am not well satisfied with the accuracy of the evidence given by those on board the "Kostrena." It seems that this steamer was steered by hand, and steering in the fog the steersman may often have got off his course, and before he got on to it again he might be on a line which, while it looked quite correct, was only parallel with the course originally intended to be steered. That he came up to the eastward of the Middle Cross Sand Lightship I have not the slightest doubt. Now, when he got a certain distance up he heard the sound of a steamer, as he says, broadish upon his port bow. That was his belief, and I shall assume that it was his honest belief, but in that he may have been considerably mistaken, and unless he looked at his compass at the very time at which he heard the blast he could not be certain that at that moment the head of his vessel was exactly on the course which he intended. If so, that might make a great difference.

Now, what was his duty when he heard that sound? I think the whole question turns upon this. I think his duty under the Regulations plainly was at once to stop his engines until he had located the sound correctly. The Regulation ordering the stoppage of a vessel in such circumstances is imperative, being a Regulation based entirely upon the necessity of stopping as much as possible all sound on board the vessel in order that those in charge may more accurately locate the sound when they hear it again. The captain of the "Kostrena" did not do that, but went on, and in that I think he was distinctly at fault unless he can put forward circumstances which made it impossible for him to obey the rule. What are the circumstances that he says necessitated his disobeying that rule? They are that there were a number of other vessels there blowing horns. There was no corroboration of that, although there was a special signal given probably by a fishing boat at anchor. But even if he had heard several other horns blowing round him in different directions, then, wherever they were, there was no reason in the world why he should not stop. By stopping he would not be any the more in danger from these other vessels, and hearing several signals the duty to stop so as to locate sound correctly was all the more essential. So far as I can see, therefore, we have the "Kostrena" in direct

Nov. 27, 1907. violation of one of the most imperative regulations applicable to foggy weather. Then what happens is that the captain, without having stopped so as to locate the sound, took it for granted that he had a right to port his helm, and did port his helm; and the case against him is that he should not have altered his course until he had located the vessel, which he certainly had not done. Now, there the "Kostrena" is found committing two distinct faults. One was going on without stopping and thereby preventing the locating of the sound, and the other was porting the helm when nothing had been done to ensure correct location.

The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

Lord Justice-Clerk.

Now, let us turn to the "James Joicey." The "James Joicey" was going south upon a course S. half W., having passed close to the North Cross Sand buoy, and her case is that when the "Kostrena" loomed in sight she was on her starboard bow and was upon a port helm. That the "Kostrena" was upon a port helm is true, and that she was upon the "James Joicey's" starboard bow may be taken to be true in the whole circumstances of the case. The "James Joicey" stopped her engines and the order was given to reverse the engines and to starboard the helm. Now, the Nautical Assessor told us that when that order was given the effect of the starboarding action would not take place without some time elapsing—within the time probably that the two vessels might meet. The Assessor tells us that so far as the course of the vessel is concerned if the master of the "James Joicey" did that—reversed his engines and went astern on a starboard helm—the effect would necessarily be the same as if he had ported and gone ahead; and he would be right in reversing his engines and starboarding if the other vessel was going to starboard upon a port helm, seeing that the starboarding of the helm when the vessel was going astern would produce the same effect as porting the helm when going ahead. Up to this point I can see no fault that can be attributed to the "James Joicey." But then it is argued that the "James Joicey" was in fault in respect that she did not give the signal for a vessel not under command. I am not satisfied from all that we have learned that she was a vessel not under command. The only thing that was in question as to whether she was under command or not was the effect of the injuries to her in a previous collision, resulting in water coming in at the bows and setting her down forward so that she could not steer. But the fact is that she could steer, and did steer. But then it is said, further, that she was giving signals in daylight and at night which indicated that she was a vessel not under command. That, of course, would be prudent on the part of the master of a vessel not under command, even in a degree. But we must hold on the advice we have received that she was a vessel under command—that is to say, she was under command at the speed at which she could move, and in the circumstances was quite capable of doing what another vessel could do in the case of an emergency. No doubt it was not a high speed; a high speed could never have been attained in her state, and would have been wrong even if possible, as she was in fog, but going at this slow speed she was under command. In the case of *The "P. Caland,"*¹ the vessel in question was a great deal more out of command than the vessel in this case. There it was held that it could not be said reasonably that the vessel was out of command. Even if it were otherwise, and the question was whether the "James Joicey" might have misled the "Kostrena" by not giving the signal that she was not under command, that question would resolve itself into this: Did that in any way contribute to what happened? In my opinion it did not, because what the "Kostrena" had to do according to the Regulations, and knowing that a steamer was there, was to stop and wait until she could locate the position. The purpose of the stopping is for location, and she should have stopped and located the other vessel, and that was an absolute duty on the part of the master whether the other vessel was a vessel under command or a vessel not under command. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the "James Joicey" was not to blame for what occurred. There is another point to which I need to refer, and that is the question whether the Regulations in the circumstances apply to a foreign vessel. I can only say this, I never heard of that question being raised before. We had a case of exactly the same kind as this in this Division and the point was not raised, and there was also a case in England in which it was not raised. In these circumstances I do not think that we are called upon to decide any such question, nor do I think it would affect the decision in this case, because I am clearly of opinion that the "Kostrena" was to blame by taking the wrong course. What she did was essentially bad seamanship.

¹ L. R., [1893] A. C. 207.

Nov. 27, 1907.
The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."

Lord Justice-Clerk.

I would therefore move your Lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur.

LORD LOW.—I also concur.

LORD ARDWALL.—I am of the same opinion. The "Kostrena" was undoubtedly in fault. The first and very serious fault on her part was that she did not comply with article 16 of the Regulations as soon as she heard the fog-signal of the other vessel in a position which she had not ascertained. The imperative requisition in article 16 is that "a steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog-signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." It is unquestionable, according to the evidence of those on board of the "Kostrena" herself, that she did not stop. Of course, the object of stopping in such a case is to locate the sound so as to find the position of the other vessel. She cannot locate the sound well until her engines are stopped. As was pointed out in the passage read from the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion in the case of *The "Warsaw,"*¹ the object of a vessel stopping in these circumstances is that those on board should be freed from the noise of her own engines and of rushing through the water, so as to be able to distinguish by the sounds made by the other vessel the direction and distance from which they come. Now, the "Kostrena" failed to stop her engines. The only excuse given for that failure is that there were a great

¹ 8 F. 1013, at p. 1021.

Nov. 27, 1907. number of steamers about, but the evidence shews that that really was no excuse at all. The second mistake which the "Kostrena" made was that she improperly ported her helm. That raises the question of the position in which these two ships approached each other. We have had the advantage of a consultation with the Nautical Assessor, and he is of opinion that taking the courses that the vessels were on, the "Kostrena" must have had the "James Joicey" not on her port bow but upon her starboard bow. Of course the "Kostrena" must have been very much further to the west than we are led to suppose from the evidence, but in the circumstances the "Kostrena" might easily have got inshore of the course of the "James Joicey" owing to her shifting her course to avoid vessels, and owing perhaps to the tidal currents. It is absolutely certain that if she had not been inshore of the course of the "James Joicey" just before the collision, the two courses never could or would have crossed each other. I must hold that somehow or other the "Kostrena" must have got inshore of the course of the "James Joicey," and therefore when she approached the point where the courses were to cross each other she must have had the "James Joicey" on her starboard bow. Now, in that state of matters it was a wrong manœuvre on the part of the "Kostrena" to port her helm and thereby run straight across the bows of the "James Joicey." With regard to her excessive speed, which is the third fault charged against the "Kostrena," that is shewn by the nature and direction of the injuries inflicted on the two ships by the collision, and I am satisfied that although the speed may not have been very great, yet it was a speed greater than she should have been proceeding at through fog. With regard to the "James Joicey," the first point made against her is that she did not stop when she heard the whistle of the "Kostrena," and that is founded upon the entries of the time in the mate's log. I agree with what was said by your Lordship in the chair in the course of the discussion that the mate's log must not be read too literally or strictly in a case of this sort. At that moment when the whistle sounded those in command of the "James Joicey" were all concerned with trying to escape from a collision, and I have no doubt that the log was written afterwards, for the simple reason that it could not be written up at the time when the mate was on the bridge. On the other hand, the engineer's log is in a totally different position. The engineer is in the engine room, and when he gets a signal from the bridge he looks at the clock, and after he has carried out the order he marks down the very moment that the telegraph rang, so that it is a record which, unless it can be clearly shewn that it was written up afterwards, is a record of the highest importance, and is most reliable. I am therefore of opinion on the best evidence we have, and comparing it with the other evidence in the case, that the "James Joicey" did stop when she heard the fog-signal of the other vessel. It is said that she manœuvred improperly by starboarding her helm and reversing her engines. The order to starboard and the order to reverse are two distinct orders given at the same time, one to the man at the wheel by word of mouth, and the other to the engineer by the telegraph. These orders were proper in the circumstances, and did not contribute to the collision; on the contrary, they tended to lessen the risk of collision, and mitigated, so far as was possible, the force with which the vessels collided. The evidence as to speed shews that the "James Joicey" was not being navigated at too great a speed in the fog. There is a fourth point of blame brought against the "James Joicey," and that is that she failed to comply with Article 15 (e) of the Regulations in not giving one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts. The first thing to be said about that is that it is really irrelevant to the present case, because it cannot be said that those on board the "Kostrena," who did not stop under Article 16 when they heard the ordinary fog-signal, would have stopped if they had heard this other signal. But apart from that altogether I consider that this ship the "James Joicey" could not well be regarded as a ship not under command. It is true that it is a duty to put up or give by sound a signal appropriate to a ship not under command, but whatever may be said about that in ordinary circumstances it is clear that it did not matter here, because the ship was going at a low speed, and that at that low speed she was quite under command. In short, the fact of the matter was that the "James Joicey" was practically reduced from an 8 or a 9-knot vessel to a 4-knot vessel by reason of the fact that it would be dangerous to force her through the water at great speed. At the slower speed she was quite under command, and as that speed was the proper speed in going through fog the master was not required to sound the number of whistle signals prescribed by Article 15 (e). Accordingly, I think that the charges put forward against the "James Joicey" have broken down, and that, for the reasons I have already mentioned, the "Kostrena" was alone to blame.

The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena."
Lord Ardwall.

THE COURT adhered.

BOYD, JAMESON, & YOUNG, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—
Agents.

JAMES MAXTONE GRAHAM (Liquidator of James Donaldson & Company, Limited), Petitioner.—D.-F. Campbell—Constable.
THOMAS WHITE & PARK, Respondents.—Graham Stewart, K.C.—Sandeman.

No. 44.

Dec. 4, 1907.

Company — Winding-up—Production of Documents—Lien—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 115.—On the motion of the official liquidator of a company which was being wound up by the Court, the law-agents of the company were ordained to produce all books, title-deeds, papers, and other deeds or documents in their custody relating to the company "without prejudice to the lien claimed by them."

Liquidator of Donaldson & Co., Limited, v. White & Park.

In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., L. R., 4 Ch. App. 215, followed.

ON 1st June 1907 an order was pronounced by the Second Division of the Court for the compulsory winding-up of James Donaldson & Company, Limited, 157 Great Junction Street, Leith. James Maxtone Graham, C.A., Edinburgh, was appointed liquidator, and all subsequent proceedings in the winding-up were directed to be taken before Lord Dundas.

In September 1907 the liquidator presented a note to the Lord Ordinary under sections 115 and 117 of the Companies Act, 1862,*

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), enacts:—

Sec. 115. "The Court may, after it has made an order for winding-up the

Dec. 4, 1907.

Liquidator of Donaldson &
Co., Limited,
v. White &
Park.

setting forth, inter alia, as follows:—"Messrs Thomas White & Park, W.S., Edinburgh, acted as the law-agents of the said . . . James Donaldson & Company, Limited. The said Thomas White & Park are in possession of documents belonging to the Limited Company, or to which the liquidator is entitled to access. The liquidator has made application to the said Thomas White & Park to produce these documents, but (although they have in connection with the liquidator's said application prepared an inventory thereof) they refuse either to produce the documents or to exhibit the inventory, on the ground that they have a lien over the documents."

The liquidator prayed the Lord Ordinary "to ordain Hope Park, Thomas William Saidler, and Alexander White, being the only known partners of the said Thomas White & Park, to appear before your Lordship on a day to be fixed by your Lordship, for the purpose of being examined upon oath concerning the affairs, dealings, estate, and effects of the said James Donaldson & Company, Limited, and to produce all books, title-deeds, papers, writings, or other deeds or documents in their custody or power relating to the said James Donaldson & Company, Limited."

Thomas White & Park lodged answers in which they stated:—"The respondents claim a lien over the said papers in respect of work done and sums paid by them on the instructions of the said Company. The respondents have all along been willing, and have informed the liquidator of their willingness, to hand him over the papers relating to the Limited Company, under reservation of all questions of security and preference, so as to preserve to them their rights of lien. The liquidator has declined to take delivery of the papers on these terms."

On 22d November the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor reporting the cause to the Second Division.* The case was heard on 4th December 1907.

company, summon before it any officer of the company or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company, or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company; and the Court may require any such officer or person to produce any books, papers, deeds, writings, or other documents in his custody or power relating to the company; and if any person so summoned, after being tendered a reasonable sum for his expenses, refuses to come before the Court at the time appointed, having no lawful impediment (made known to the Court at the time of its sitting, and allowed by it), the Court may cause such person to be apprehended, and brought before the Court for examination; nevertheless, in cases where any person claims any lien on papers, deeds, or writings, or documents produced by him, such production shall be without prejudice to such lien, and the Court shall have jurisdiction in the winding-up to determine all questions relating to such lien."

Sec. 117. "The Court may examine upon oath, either by word of mouth or upon written interrogatories, any person appearing or brought before them in manner aforesaid concerning the affairs, dealings, estate, or effects of the Company, and may reduce into writing the answers of every such person, and require him to subscribe the same."

* "OPINION.—The liquidator presents this note under sections 115 and 117 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89). The prayer of the note, so far as the present question is concerned, craves the Court to ordain certain law-agents to appear before the Court 'for the purpose of being examined upon oath concerning the affairs, dealings, estate, and effects

Argued for the liquidator;—The liquidator was entitled to have the documents produced in order that he might determine whether to make use of them or not, and that without becoming liable for payment in full of the respondents' account.¹ The mere fact that he examined the documents would not make him liable, and a finding to that effect ought to be included in the interlocutor to be pronounced. At all events, he was entitled to an order under section 115 in the terms of the prayer of the note. He had no objection to the insertion of the words "without prejudice to any lien which the respondents might have or claim," provided it was understood that mere inspection of the documents did not constitute prejudice. *Renny & Webster*² was a case under the Bankruptcy Act, and had no application here. If the Court should be of opinion that the mere inspection of the documents constituted prejudice, he desired to confine the prayer of the note to an order under section 117.

Dec. 4, 1907.

Liquidator of Donaldson &
Co., Limited,
v. White &
Park.

of the said James Donaldson & Company, Limited; and to produce all books, title-deeds, papers, writings, or other deeds or documents in their custody or power relating to the said James Donaldson & Company, Limited.' The first branch of this prayer echoes the language of section 117; while the second is based upon section 115; but omits, oddly enough, any reference to its proviso in regard to lien, which raises the point here at issue. Any order which is made would require to be expressly 'without prejudice to such lien.' The liquidator's counsel proposed to restrict his crave at this stage to the first branch above quoted; with the frankly professed object of endeavouring, if possible, to obtain sufficient information, in the course of the examination, as to the nature and contents of the various documents, without incurring any liability for the law-agents' account, which he apprehended might possibly arise if an order to produce was executed. A precedent for this course was said to exist in the Outer-House case of Fergusson (Barr & Company's Liquidator), 10 S. L. T. 456. But that case is not, in my opinion, in point as a precedent; for I observe from the report that 'counsel having agreed that the examination should not be used to obtain a précis of the titles, the respondents did not oppose the motion.' I think the proposal to restrict the crave is inexpedient and unnecessary. It was explained during the discussion that the apprehensions entertained by the liquidator were based upon an analogy derived from the law of bankruptcy. It may, I think, be taken as settled that if a trustee in a sequestration obtains possession, upon his own demand, of documents under reservation of a lien, he will be liable for payment of the amount secured by the lien, even though he should find upon investigation that they are of no value whatever to the estate or the creditors (Renny & Webster, 1847, 9 D. 619). I see that in the recognised text-book on bankruptcy (Goudy, 3d ed., p. 600) the learned author, after referring to Renny & Webster's case, thinks 'it is doubtful if the same results would arise were the trustee simply to inspect the titles in the agent's office, exercising his right to examine all the bankrupt's deeds and securities so as to judge if it will benefit the estate to take up the property to which they relate. It is thought that the agent would have no claim for a preference in such a case, if the trustee declined to take up the property.' I am disposed, as at present advised, to agree with the opinion embodied in the sentence last quoted. But it is, in my judgment, unnecessary to pursue the topic; for we are here dealing not with a sequestration, but with a statutory liquidation. It has been decided in England, with

¹ In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., Limited, 1869, L. R., 4 Ch. App. 215, per Lord Hatherley, at 217.

² Renny & Webster v. Myles Murray, Feb. 8, 1847, 9 D. 619.

Dec. 4, 1907.

Liquidator of Donaldson &
Co., Limited,
v. White &
Park.

Argued for the respondents ;—They had no objection to an order in the precise terms of section 115, that was to say, an order with the qualification “without prejudice to such lien,” provided it was understood that the mere inspection of the documents constituted prejudice. Otherwise their lien might prove to be worthless, for a mere inspection of the documents might give the liquidator all he wanted. Lord Hatherley’s opinion in the *South Essex Estuary*¹ case was wrong.

The opinion of the Court (The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD STORMONTH-DARLING, LORD LOW, and LORD ARDWALL) was delivered by—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court will follow the judgment of Lord Hatherley in the case of the South Essex Estuary Company,¹ and will direct the Lord Ordinary accordingly.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the report by Lord Dundas to them of date 22d November 1907, direct the said Lord Ordinary to proceed in the liquidation by granting the crave of both branches of the prayer of the note without prejudice to the lien claimed by the respondents, in accordance with the opinion expressed by him in the said report: Find no expenses due by or to either party since the date of the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor reporting the cause.”

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—THOMAS WHITE & PARK, W.S.—Agents.

reference to section 115 of the Act of 1862, that where the solicitors of the company have a lien for costs on documents relating to the company in their possession, the official liquidator may nevertheless compel their production, without prejudice to the lien, though in many instances this would render the lien valueless—In re South Essex Estuary Co., 1869, 4 Chan. 215. I should be prepared to follow this case, which I think is directly in point, and to grant the crave of both branches of the prayer of the note, already referred to, adding the words ‘without prejudice to any lien which the respondents or any of them may have or claim over the same.’ I may add that I think the examination and production would, in this case, be competently and most conveniently conducted by a commissioner, and not by the Court itself. The liquidator is, in my judgment, entitled to the production craved, in order to see whether the documents or any of them are such as he desires to acquire in the interests of those whom he represents; and, in my opinion, that production and inspection of them by him will not, per se, impose any liability upon him for payment of the law-agents’ account. The validity of the lien and the ultimate effect of it in relation to what the liquidator may see fit to do after production has been made, are matters which do not appear to arise at this stage. The question raised is one of general importance, and has not, so far as I know, been decided in Scotland. I have therefore reported it to the Court, to obtain their instruction and guidance, and in doing so I have thought it right to state my own opinion upon the matter.”

¹ In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., Limited, L. R., 4 Ch. App. 215.

JAMES TURNBULL, Pursuer (Appellant).—Crurie Steuart.

JOHN BRIEN, Defender (Respondent).—Morton.

No. 45.

Dec. 5, 1907.

Aliment—Pupil—Donation or Debt.—In 1906 a labourer raised an action against his wife's brother for decree for payment of £26, as being the amount expended by the pursuer on the defender's aliment. The pursuer averred that in 1897 he took the defender, then a destitute orphan eleven years old, into his own house, and alimanted him for two years, after which the defender was able to earn enough for his own support. Turnbull v. Brien.

Held that the action was irrelevant, the pursuer's averments shewing that the aliment had been given as a donation, and without any intention that it should form a debt against the defender.

In September 1906 James Turnbull, labourer, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against John Brien, mason, praying for decree for payment of £26. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a labourer, and resides at 22 Albert Street, Edinburgh. The defender, who is a brother of the pursuer's wife, being bereft of a home by the death of his father, the pursuer agreed with the defender to take him into his home as a boarder, and accordingly the defender went to reside there on 13th May 1897. . . ." (Cond. 2) "For two years after the said 13th May 1897, the defender, who was then between eleven and twelve years of age, continued to reside with the pursuer, and contributed nothing towards his own maintenance. He attended school during said period, and the pursuer, at his own expense, maintained the defender. The pursuer estimates said maintenance at 5s. per week, which he considers fair and reasonable, and for 104 weeks at said rate amounts to £26, being the amount sued for." (Cond. 3) "The defender thereafter in due course served an apprenticeship as a mason, and continued to reside with defender, and contributed towards his maintenance until 30th June 1906, when he left the pursuer's house and went to reside elsewhere. During his residence with pursuer the defender repeatedly promised to pay the pursuer for said maintenance, but he has failed to implement said promise. He has been repeatedly requested to make payment thereof to the pursuer, but he has refused or delayed to do so, and the present action has therefore been rendered necessary."

The pursuer pleaded ;—The defender being resting owing to the pursuer in the sum sued for, decree should be pronounced as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The action is irrelevant.

On 21st February 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—The present action was not laid upon contract. The question was this—Was the amount expended by the pursuer upon the aliment and education of the defender to be presumed to be a donation by the pursuer to the defender, or was it to be presumed to be a debt due by the defender to the pursuer? When the person alimanted was in majority, or was a pupil or minor who had guardians, the presumption was that aliment was given as a donation, if no contract was made, because there being in these cases a person with whom a contract might be made, the reasonable inference was that the person giving the aliment would have contracted for repayment if he intended the expenditure to be a debt, but where the person alimanted was a pupil or minor without guardians, the presumption was that the aliment was given with the intention of constituting a debt, there not being a person with whom to contract. The only exceptions to this last rule were cases where the pupil or minor had estate of his own, and cases where the person giving the aliment was under a natural or legal obligation to support the pupil or minor.¹ The present was a case of a pupil, without guardians, who had no estate of his own at the time he was being alimented, and towards whom the pursuer was not under any obligation of support, for it could not be said that a brother-in-law was under any such obligation. The presumption, therefore, was that the amount expended by the pursuer on the defender's aliment constituted a debt against the defender, and there was nothing in the pursuer's averments to rebut that presumption.

Dec. 5, 1907.

Turnbull v.
Brien.

The defender founded on the undernoted authorities.²

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The Sheriff-substitute has sustained the first plea in law for the defender, which is that the action is irrelevant, and has dismissed the action. I think that the Sheriff is right. The pursuer is a labourer, and the husband of the defender's sister, and he says that in May 1897 he took the defender, who was then an orphan of eleven, into his house, and continued to support him until he began to serve his apprenticeship as a mason. The pursuer now sues the defender for the amount of the aliment furnished up to May 1899. After that date, as I understand, no claim is made, because the boy contributed enough to cover his maintenance until 1906, when he left the pursuer's house. The claim is thus obviously made in respect of aliment afforded to a pupil. I am of opinion that aliment allowed to a pupil by a person who is not under a natural obligation to support him must be considered to have been afforded ex pietate, and that there is no relevant claim against the pupil, even if he succeeds to a small sum of money in after life. If it be said that the defender is under a moral duty under these circumstances to reimburse the pursuer for his expenditure, I am afraid that the answer is that we have nothing to do with moral duties, and that a legal obligation cannot be incurred by a person who is not a legal persona. The pursuer further avers that the defender promised to pay for his maintenance, but I think that that averment is irrelevant, because there is no statement as to the terms of the promise or as to the time at which it was made. I propose therefore that the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute affirmed.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. It has always been recognised that cases of this description must be treated each according to its own special circumstances. The special circumstances of this case as averred by Dec. 5, 1907. the pursuer, are as follows:—In 1897 the pursuer's brother-in-law, aged Turnbull v. Brien. between eleven and twelve years, was left an orphan and destitute owing Lord Low. to his father's death. The pursuer took him into his own home and maintained him there for two years, until he obtained an apprenticeship and was able to pay for his board and lodging. Now, the plain inference from these facts seems to me to be that the pursuer acted from a very natural and proper sense of duty without any ulterior motive, and without any idea of making a subsequent claim. The circumstances of the case seem to me to preclude the idea that the pursuer thought at the time that the boy was incurring a debt which he might afterwards be called on to pay. I am convinced that the idea of claiming repayment is an afterthought, suggested by the fact that the young man has now come into a little money. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has rightly decided this case.

¹ Steven v. Simpson, 1791, M. 11,458; Wilson v. Archibald, 1701, M. 11,427; Montgreenan v. Blair, 1624, M. 11,432, and 8918; Gourlay v. Urquhart, 1697, M. 11,438; Stirling v. Ottar, 1663, M. 11,432; Lady Lugton v. Hepburn, 1672, M. 11,435; Forbes v. Forbes, Nov. 4, 1869, 8 Macph. 85, per Lord Cowan, at p. 91; Elchies' Notes on Stair, p. 48; Ersk. iii. 3, 92; Bell's Prin. sec. 533; Fraser, Parent and Child, 3d ed. pp. 116-120.

² Cunningham v. MacGathen, Feb. 17, 1831, 9 S. 472; Drummond v. Swayne, Jan. 28, 1834, 12 S. 342; M'Gaws v. Galloway, Nov. 10, 1882, 10 R. 157, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, at p. 162; Ligertwood v. Brown, June 25, 1872, 10 Macph. 832.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur. The question is whether the aliment afforded by the pursuer to the defender was supplied animo donandi, or with the intention that a debt should be created against the defender. We had a careful and interesting citation of old authorities from Mr Steuart in support of the latter alternative, and there are dicta which to a certain extent support his contention. But I think that the tendency of the more recent authorities is to consider the question whether in cases such as the present the aliment supplied was intended to be a donation or a debt as one depending on the circumstances of each case, and not on any fixed rules or presumptions of law. And in the present case a consideration of the facts disclosed on the record leads me to the conclusion that the aliment, repetition of which is now sued for, was given ex pietate as a donation, and with no intention that it should form a debt against the defender. I therefore agree with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

MACKAY & YOUNG, W.S.—R. J. CALVER, S.S.C.—Agents.

DIONITIUS STEWART, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Morison, K.C.—A. A. Fraser.

No. 46.

JOHN M'DOUGALL, Defender (Respondent).—Dickson, K.C.—Kemp. Dec. 13, 1907.

Sheriff—Small-Debt Procedure—Decree ad factum præstandum—Decree for delivery—Diligence—Imprisonment—Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26), secs. 1 and 2, and Sched. B.—The Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1889, enacts, sec. 1, that the Act shall be construed as one with the Small-Debt Act, 1837, and sec. 2, that the Sheriff, in the Small-Debt Court, may grant an order, in the form of Schedule B attached to the Act, for delivery of any corporeal moveables not exceeding £12 in value. The form of order in Schedule B concludes with the words "and grants warrant for all lawful execution hereon."

Held that these words necessarily refer back to Schedule A of the principal Act, which authorises imprisonment without further procedure or application to the Sheriff (in cases where imprisonment is competent), and that, as imprisonment was the only mode of enforcing a decree ad factum præ-

Dec. 13, 1907. standum, they authorised a pursuer in a Small-Debt action, who held an order in that form for delivery of a moveable, to proceed, on the expiry of the days of charge, to enforce the order by imprisonment without further application to the Sheriff; and action of damages for wrongous imprisonment, at the instance of the defender who had been imprisoned, held to be irrelevant.

Stewart v.
M'Dougall.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Dundas. ON 1st September 1906 Dionitius Stewart, commercial traveller, Aberdeen, brought an action against John M'Dougall, grain merchant there, concluding for £500 as damages for wrongous imprisonment.

The pursuer averred that he had been in the employment of the defender as a traveller for more than two years prior to 26th April 1906. That at that date he held, as he was entitled, under the terms of his employment, a season ticket in his favour of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, taken out on 15th March 1906, and current for a year from that date. That on 1st June 1906 the defender raised an action against him in the Small-Debt Court at Aberdeen, concluding for delivery of the said ticket. That on 21st June the defender obtained decree against him in that action, and that an extract of the decree was issued in the following terms:—"At Aberdeen, the 21st day of June 1906 years, the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff decerns and ordains the within designed D. Stewart, defender, to deliver to the pursuer a railway ticket of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, numbered 5315, and issued," &c. . . . "and finds the within designed defender liable to the pursuer in the sum of 10s. 1d. sterling, and grants warrant for all lawful execution hereon. Robert Fiddes, Sheriff-Clerk Depute." That on 2d July 1906 he was charged under that decree, this charge being in the following terms:—"D. Stewart, before designed, you are hereby charged to implement the decree, of which, and of the complaint whereon the same proceeded, the within is a copy, within ten days from this date, under pain of imprisonment, so far as regards the delivery, and poinding and sale for the expenses, without further notice. . . ."

The pursuer further averred:—"The pursuer, who disregarded the said irregular and incompetent proceedings before mentioned, was, on 17th July 1906, at the instance of and in terms of instructions by the defender, forcibly, illegally, and without lawful warrant, apprehended by D. R. Hendry, sheriff-officer, Aberdeen, and conveyed to the prison of Aberdeen . . . The said apprehension and incarceration of the pursuer by the defender, or on his instructions, were illegal and without any warrant. The Sheriff-substitute had not authorised said illegal proceedings, which were initiated solely by the defender and those employed by him and put into force brevis manu. . . . Explained that it is not competent for a warrant of imprisonment or for execution by imprisonment to follow on a decree obtained under the Small-Debt Acts."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender, having, without any warrant, caused the pursuer to be apprehended and imprisoned, is liable in reparation to the pursuer.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The action is incompetent, being excluded by the provisions of the Small-Debt Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 41).

On 16th March 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed relevantly to aver that the defender, without any warrant, caused him to be apprehended and imprisoned: Therefore sustains the defender's first plea in Dec. 13, 1907. law, assoilzies him from the conclusions of the summons,"

The pursuer reclaimed and argued;—The action was relevant, for the imprisonment here had been unwarranted. The Small-Debt Act of 1889† did not authorise imprisonment to follow on such a decree as this; at any rate it did not authorise it at the discretion of the holder of the decree without further application to the Sheriff. If imprisonment were competent at all it could only be legally carried out in the usual way, viz., by following the provisions of sec. 11 of

Stewart v.
M'Dougall.

* " OPINION.—The pursuer seeks by this action to recover £500 in name of damages, upon the ground that the defender, 'without any warrant, caused the pursuer to be apprehended and imprisoned.' On referring to the condescendence, one finds a somewhat involved history of a Small-Debt action at Aberdeen, in which the defender sued the pursuer for delivery of a railway ticket, and obtained decree, with expenses, on 21st June 1906. The pursuer's counsel admitted that he could not now reopen, or ask review of, the proceedings in the Small-Debt case; but he maintained that the manner in which the decree therein obtained was put into execution was injurious to him and illegal. What actually happened was as follows:—[His Lordship narrated the averments]. The question raised upon these averments seems to be whether or not the defender's actings were 'lawful execution' of the decree of 21st June 1906. It becomes necessary, therefore, to investigate the terms of the Small-Debt Acts, by which the diligence following upon such actions is regulated. The leading Act is 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 41 (1837). That Act provides by section 13 that the Sheriff's decree, stating the amount of expenses (if any) found due to any party, and containing warrant for arrestment, and for poinding and imprisonment when competent, shall be annexed to the summons or complaint, and on the same paper with it, agreeably to the form in Schedule (A) annexed to the Act, or to the like effect, 'which decree and warrant, being signed by the clerk, shall be a sufficient authority for instant arrestment, and also for poinding and sale

† The Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26), enacts, sec. 1, that that Act shall be construed as one with the Small-Debt Act, 1837, and the Sheriff Courts Act, 1853, so far as consistent with the tenor of these Acts respectively, and these Acts together may be cited as the Small-Debt (Scotland) Acts, 1837 to 1889.

Sec. 2. "Where a party claims to be owner, or to be entitled to the possession, of any corporeal moveables, the value of which shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff not to exceed £12, and which are wrongfully withheld from him, he may apply in the Small-Debt Court for an order for delivery thereof, and the Sheriff may grant such order accordingly; and the application therefor and the extract of the decree, if granted, to follow thereon shall be as nearly as may be in the form of Schedules A and B respectively; but in other respects the procedure shall be conform, as nearly as may be, to the provisions of the said first recited Act" (the Act of 1837) "so far as agreeable hereto: Provided always, that if delivery of any of the subjects sued for shall have become impossible, or if their value be alternatively concluded for, the Sheriff may give decree for their value to an amount not exceeding £12."

Schedule B. "At the day of one thousand eight hundred and the Sheriff of the shire of decerns and ordains the within designed, defender, to deliver to the pursuer [the subjects within referred to, or state to what extent the order for delivery is granted]; and finds the said defender liable to the pursuer in [the sum of, any sum decerned for in lieu of others of the subjects that cannot be delivered, with] of expenses; and grants warrant for all lawful execution hereon. G. H., Sheriff-clerk."

Dec. 13, 1907.

Stewart v.
M'Dougall.

the Personal Diligence Act, 1838,* and making application to the Sheriff for a warrant. It was otherwise in the Small-Debt Act of 1837,† and the alteration in the phraseology of the 1889 Act¹ was deliberate, and the only inference that could be drawn from it was that the practice was intended to be different. Further, the Act of 1837 † could not be appealed to as regulating the practice with regard and imprisonment, where competent, after the elapse of ten free days from the date of the decree. . . . The form in Schedule A (No. 7) inter alia, 'decerns and ordains instant execution by arrestment, and also execution to pass hereon by poinding and sale and imprisonment, if the same be competent, after . . . free days.' It appears, therefore, that under the principal Act of 1837 a defender who had failed to pay a civil debt (not less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d.—see 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70), might, after the expiry of the prescribed charge, be imprisoned without further procedure. The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), abolished imprisonment for debt, but section 4 provided, inter alia, that nothing contained in the Act should affect or prevent the apprehension or imprisonment of any person under any decree or obligation ad factum præstandum. The reason for this provision is, in the words of Lord President Inglis in Mackenzie, 1883, 10 R. 1147, at p. 1151, 'very clear, and it is simply this, that if the right to imprison were abolished in such circumstances, no other method of enforcing such decrees would remain.' Then in 1889 the Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act (52 and 53 Vict. c. 26) became law.

* The Personal Diligence (Scotland) Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), enacts, that where a charge has been given on an extract decree in the Sheriff Court, and the days of charge have expired, the execution of the charge may be recorded, and, sec. 11, " . . . if warrant to imprison be desired, the creditor or a procurator of Court shall endorse and subscribe on the said extract a minute in the terms of the Schedule (No. 8) hereunto annexed (or as near to that form as circumstances will permit); and the said clerk shall, if there be no lawful cause to the contrary, write on the extract this deliverance, 'Fiat ut petitur,' and shall date and subscribe the same; and it shall be lawful by virtue of the said extract and deliverance to search for, take, apprehend, imprison, and, if necessary for that purpose, to open shut and lockfast places as aforesaid."

† The Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41), enacts,—Sec. 13. " . . . And the decree stating the amount of the expenses (if any) found due to any party (which may include personal charges, if the Sheriff think fit), and containing warrant for arrestment, and for poinding and imprisonment when competent, shall be annexed to the summons or complaint, and on the same paper with it, agreeably to the form in Schedule (A) annexed to this Act, or to the like effect, which decree and warrant, being signed by the clerk, shall be a sufficient authority for instant arrestment, and also for poinding and sale and imprisonment, where competent, after the elapse of ten free days from the date of the decree, if the party against whom it shall have been given was personally present when it was pronounced; but if he was not so present poinding and sale and imprisonment shall only proceed after a charge of ten free days. . . ."

Schedule (A), No. 7. "Decree for Pursuer in a Civil Cause.—At the . . . day of . . . one thousand eight hundred and . . . the Sheriff of the shire of . . . finds the within designed . . . defender liable to the pursuer in the sum of . . . with . . . of expenses, and decerns and ordains instant execution by arrestment, and also execution to pass hereon by poinding and sale and imprisonment, if the same be competent after . . . free days. . . . J. P., Sheriff-clerk."

¹ 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26.

to decrees ad factum præstandum, for such decrees were only introduced by the 1889 Act,¹ and that Act contained the code, and the only code, for them. The provisions as to imprisonment of the 1837 Act² that were appealed to applied only to imprisonment for civil debt, and as that imprisonment was now abolished, they were clearly inapplicable to the present case.

Dec. 13, 1907.

Stewart v.
M'Dougall.

Argued for the respondent;—The imprisonment here had been duly warranted, and all the statutory requirements had been followed both in the letter and the spirit. The pursuer in the Small-Debt action held a warrant for “all lawful execution,” and the lawful execution for the enforcement of a decree ad factum præstandum was by imprisonment, which had been specially preserved for such decrees in sec. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1880,³ when imprisonment generally for civil debt was abolished. Not only was it a lawful form of execution, but it was the only form of execution for the enforcement of Section 1 provided that the Act should be construed as one with the recited Acts, viz., the principal Act of 1837, and the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1853, so far as consistent with the tenor of these Acts respectively. By section 2 a new jurisdiction was conferred upon the Small-Debt Court. Provision was thereby made for an action for delivery of corporeal moveables up to the value of £12; ‘and the application therefor, and the extract of the decree, if granted, to follow thereon, shall be as nearly as may be in the form of Schedules A and B respectively; but in other respects the procedure shall be conform, as nearly as may be, to the provisions of the said first recited Act, so far as agreeable hereto.’ The form of Schedule B, ordaining delivery, concludes with the words, ‘and grants warrant for all lawful execution hereon.’ The Small-Debt action between the present parties was, as already explained, one for delivery of a railway ticket, in virtue of section 2 of the Act of 1889, and the extract decree admittedly followed the form prescribed by Schedule B. The pursuer’s counsel founded upon the difference of the language as to execution contained in Schedule A (No. 7) of the Act of 1837, and Schedule B of the Act of 1889. They strenuously urged that (as is the case) the earlier schedule was applicable only to decrees for civil debt, and not ad facta præstanda; that (as is also the case) imprisonment for civil debt was abolished in 1880, though the Debtors Act of that year made exception in the case, inter alia, of decrees ad facta præstanda; that the alteration in the language of Schedule B of the Act of 1889 was intentional; and that the intention of the Legislature, in passing that Act, was to prevent imprisonment following upon a decree for delivery under section 2 thereof, at all events without application being made to the Sheriff for a special warrant to imprison. The defender’s counsel, on the other hand, contended that the words in Schedule B of the Act of 1889—‘and grants warrant for all lawful execution hereon’—necessarily refer back to the language of Schedule A of the principal Act of 1837, which authorises imprisonment, without further procedure or application to the Sheriff, ‘where competent’; and that, as imprisonment is the appropriate, and indeed the only, method of execution in the case of failure to implement a decree ad factum præstandum, it is competent under the Act of 1889 to proceed to such execution without further procedure than that contained in and authorised by a warrant under Schedule B. I think that the defender’s contention upon this summary of the matter is right, and that the pursuer’s argument is wrong. The pursuer’s case is, in my judgment, in no way assisted—but is indeed weakened—by a reference to the procedure, under analogous circumstances, which is authorised by the Personal Diligence Act, ¹ 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26.² 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41.³ 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34.

Dec. 13, 1907. such decrees, whether Small-Debt or not. Nor was a further application for a warrant to imprison necessary, for by sec. 1 of the Small-Debt Act of 1889¹ it was provided that the Small-Debt Act of 1837² should, so far as consistent, be construed along with it; and on referring back to that Act there was a clear provision that imprisonment on Small-Debt decrees should follow without further application to the Sheriff. The provisions of the Personal Diligence Act³ had no application, for the code provided by the Small-Debt Acts for Small-Debt proceedings was a separate branch of process, and was complete in itself.

Stewart v.
M'Dougall.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has given a very careful judgment, with which I entirely agree. I have very little to add except this, that it is quite clear that the provisions of the Personal Diligence Act 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), because I do not think that that Act has any application to the Small-Debt Court, the rules and regulations of which are, I apprehend, codified in the legislation specially applicable to it alone. I do not know, and may not conjecture, the reasons which led Parliament to alter the phraseology of Schedule A of the 1837 Act, when Schedule B of the 1889 Act became law. But, as matter of construction and of inference from the language used, I should suppose that the Legislature in 1889 had in view the proviso at the end of section 2 of the Act of that year, to the effect that 'if delivery of any of the subjects sued for shall have become impossible, or if their value be alternatively concluded for, the Sheriff may give decree for their value to an amount not exceeding twelve pounds.' For it seems plain enough that, on the one hand, a decree ad factum præstandum for delivery could not be executed by way of poinding; and, on the other hand, that a decree for a sum of money could not be executed by way of imprisonment. The pursuer's counsel further contended that imprisonment was not a valid or legal execution of the warrant 'for all lawful execution hereon,' because neither the decree nor the charge indicate sufficiently or at all the duration of the intended imprisonment. They referred to the case of Muir, 1849, 11 D. 487, as an exposition of the common law of the land upon this matter. That case had a good many specialties, and I do not think that, upon the point in question, it really helps the pursuer at all. I accept the words of Lord Jeffrey that it is not 'either a safe or a tolerable practice to give the body of any subject of this realm into the hands of a jailer, without any specification of the terms or conditions of the imprisonment.' But I read his Lordship's words in conjunction with those of the Lord President (Boyle) in the same case, where he says that 'the warrant of incarceration should be clear and explicit, and should contain a distinct statement of the acts on performance of which the prisoner is entitled to liberation.' Now, in the present case, I think that the jailer could have no reasonable room for doubt, upon presentation to him of the decree and charge, that the act on performance of which the prisoner was entitled to liberation was the delivery by him of the railway ticket which the Sheriff had ordained him to give up. I should here point out that the summons in this Small-Debt action contained no alternative crave for the value of the railway ticket, and it is nowhere suggested that delivery of it had, or has, become impossible. In these circumstances the argument for the pursuer appears to me to fail entirely, because he has not, in my judgment, shewn that he was apprehended and imprisoned without warrant, or that the defender's execution of his Small-Debt decree was in

¹ 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26.

² 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41.

³ 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114.

have nothing to do with the Small-Debt Acts. The Small-Debt Acts form Dec. 13, 1907. a code by themselves. When you come to consider what took place in this case it is clear that the pursuer was not left in any doubt as to the diligence to be used against him or put to any hardship, and accordingly, for the reasons which the Lord Ordinary has given, I think it is out of the question that he should be allowed to proceed in an action of damages.

Stewart v.
M'Dougall.
Ld. President.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the words "all lawful execution" in a case of this kind do include imprisonment, for it has been laid down by an eminent Judge in expounding the Debtors Act that unless imprisonment were retained to enforce a decree ad factum præstandum there would be no other method of enforcing such a decree. I am therefore of opinion that the present proceedings have been quite in accordance with the Small-Debt Act and the amending statutes.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD PEARSON concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ARTHUR F. FRAZER, S.S.C.—GUILD & GUILD, W.S.—Agents.

MRS JEANNIE PETERS OR BURGOYNE, Pursuer (Respondent).—

Kennedy, K.C.—A. M. Mackay.

ANDREW WALKER, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Campbell—

C. D. Murray.

No. 47.

Dec. 11, 1907.

Burgoyne v.
Walker.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Liability of master for negligence of servant—Whether servant of A, pro hac vice, servant of B.—In pursuance of their scientific investigations, the Fishery Board for Scotland from time to time arranged with the owners of trawl boats to carry on board their boats an employee of the Fishery Board, who was allowed to collect from the catches, and retain for the use of the Board, specimens of different kinds of fish. In return for this service, trawl boats carrying a Fishery Board employee were allowed to fish within restricted waters, and to retain the catches, without rendering themselves liable to a charge of illegal trawling.

any way illegal. I confess I do not consider the pursuer entitled to much sympathy as regards his incarceration. I apprehend that he might, if he considered the defender's actings to be illegal, have suspended the charge. But he preferred to 'disregard' it, hoping, I suppose, to be able to recover a handsome amount of damages if the defender should proceed to execute the decree in the manner which he clearly intimated that he intended to do.

"An alternative argument was submitted on behalf of the pursuer to the effect that, in any event, the statutory procedure had not been followed out. His points were (1) that, in the extract decree, no express mention was made of the 'seven days' noted by the Sheriff-substitute in the book, and (2) that the charge does not expressly say ten 'free' days from its date. It is admitted, as regards both points, that the time allowed was, in fact, ample. There is, I think, no substance in either of these points, and I shall not deal with them except to note that they were put before me.

"Upon the whole matter, therefore, my conclusion is that the pursuer has stated no relevant ground of damage. The defender's first plea in law falls to be sustained, and as the objection to the relevancy does not merely relate to defective pleading but goes to the essence of the case, I shall grant decree of absolvitor, and, of course, with expenses."

Dec. 11, 1907. The Fishery Board employee was entitled to point out the places where he wished the trawling to be conducted, but neither he nor the Board had any control over the navigation or management of any trawl boats so engaged.

Burgoyne v.
Walker.

A trawl boat with a Fishery Board representative on board under an arrangement of the above description was stranded through the fault of her master, and the Fishery Board representative in consequence died from exposure. His widow brought an action of damages against the owner of the trawler, who pleaded that he was not responsible for the fault of the master in respect that the master was on the occasion in question pro hac vice in the service of the Fishery Board.

Held that the master was not pro hac vice the servant of the Fishery Board, and that the defender was liable in damages to the pursuer.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

IN July 1906 Mrs Jeannie Peters or Burgoyne, widow of John Darling Burgoyne, hatchery attendant in the employment of the Fishery Board for Scotland, as an individual, and as tutor for her pupil son, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Andrew Walker, registered and managing owner of the steam-trawler "Star of Hope," of Aberdeen, praying for damages on account of the death of her husband.

The pursuer averred, inter alia:—(Cond. 2) "In pursuance of their scientific investigations, the officials of the Fishery Board for Scotland in charge of the Board's station at Nigg from time to time arrange with the owners of trawl boats fishing from the port of Aberdeen to carry on board their boats an employee of the Fishery Board, who is allowed to collect from the catches, and retain for the use of the Board's officials, specimens of different kinds of fish. In return for this service, trawl boats carrying a Fishery Board employee are allowed to fish within restricted waters, and are allowed to retain the catches got therein, without rendering themselves liable to a charge of illegal trawling. . . . Neither the Fishery Board nor its representatives on board such trawl boats, nor anyone in its employment, has, as a consequence of the arrangement referred to, any concern with the navigation or management of any trawl boats so engaged. . . ." (Cond. 4) "In or about the beginning of December 1905 the officials of the Fishery Board at Nigg arranged with the defender, or with his servant the skipper of the 'Star of Hope,' to take pursuer's husband to sea for the purpose of collecting specimens of fish, as mentioned in condescendence 2, and on the morning of the 4th of December 1905, the vessel left the port of Aberdeen and proceeded to sea with pursuer's husband on board for the purpose of fishing under the arrangement above condescended on . . ." (Cond. 5) "During the 4th of December the skipper and crew on board the vessel conducted trawling operations, and the pursuer's husband was engaged in collecting specimens for his employers, and at or about 1 A.M. on the following morning the vessel was engaged in trawling at or near a point in the North Sea near Collieston on the Aberdeenshire coast, when, owing to the negligence of the skipper of the vessel, for whom the defender is responsible, the vessel ran ashore on the rocks at that point, and as a consequence the pursuer's husband and two members of the crew were drowned or perished from exposure . . ."

The defender in answer averred, inter alia:—(Ans. 2) "Denied; and explained that, in pursuance of their scientific investigations, the Fishery Board for Scotland, through their officials in charge of the Board's station at Nigg, from time to time arrange with the owners of trawl boats fishing from the port of Aberdeen to get the use of these vessels, their crews, gear, &c., for specified periods, and for the purpose of fishing in the service or under the orders of the Fishery Board in specified areas, so as to obtain specimens of various kinds of fish. These vessels, when so engaged, carry on board a representative of the Fishery Board, under whose directions and orders the skipper acts, and who selects from the catches the fish he wishes, which are retained by him for the Board's use. The balance of the vessels' catches are allowed to be retained by the owners, and are the remuneration given to the latter for the use of their vessels. Trawl boats, when so engaged, are in the service or acting under the orders of the Fishery Board . . . and, in terms of the provisions of the statutes and relative bye-laws, are exempt from the penalties imposed thereunder for fishing in prohibited waters. They are pro tempore outwith the possession and control of the owners; and the masters and crews become pro hac vice the servants of the Fishery Board."

Dec. 11, 1907.
Burgoyne v.
Walker.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's husband having lost his life through the negligence of the defender's servant, for whom defender is responsible, she is entitled to reparation therefor from defender.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's husband having lost his life, not through the negligence of the defender or that of anyone for whom he is responsible, he is entitled to be assolvied from the conclusions of this action, with expenses. (3) The vessel in question, with her master and crew, having, on the occasion condescended upon, been outwith the control and possession of the defender, he is not responsible to the pursuer for the acts or defaults of her master or crew at that time, and is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) Separatim, the said John Darling Burgoyne and the skipper of the "Star of Hope" having, on the occasion in question, been engaged in the same work, on the same vessel, the defender is, in the circumstances founded on, under no liability to pursuer in respect of her husband's death, and is therefore entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 11th January 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson Begg), after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) that on 5th December 1905, about 1.30 A.M., the steam-trawler 'Star of Hope,' belonging to the defender, stranded on the coast near Collieston, owing to the recklessness and negligence of the skipper of the vessel; (2) that, as a consequence, the pursuer's husband, John Darling Burgoyne, a servant of the Fishery Board of Scotland, perished from exposure about six hours later; and (3) that, at and before the time of stranding, the skipper and the said John Darling Burgoyne were engaged in trawling for fish, under an arrangement whereby the skipper remained the servant of the defender, and the said John Darling Burgoyne remained the servant of the Fishery Board of Scotland: Finds in law that the defender is liable in damages to the pursuer as an individual, and also as tutor for the pupil, John Darling Burgoyne, the child of the pursuer, and of her said deceased husband: Assesses the damages," &c.*

* "NOTE.—(After reviewing the evidence and coming to the conclusion that the stranding of the 'Star of Hope' was due to the negligence of her skipper)—The arrangement between the Fishery Board and the defender was a very peculiar one. I think that it is accurately set forth in articles

Dec. 11, 1907.

Burgoyne v.
Walker.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The evidence did not establish that the stranding of the "Star of Hope" was occasioned by the fault of her master; but in any view the master, at the time of the stranding, was pro hac vice the servant of the Fishery Board, and not of the defender. The servant of A might by working towards a common end, along with the servants of B, and submitting himself to the control and orders of B, become pro hac vice B's servant in such a sense as not only to disable him from recovering from B for injuries sustained through the fault of B's proper servants, but also to exclude the liability of A for injury occasioned by the fault of the servant to B's own servants.¹ Each case depended on its own circumstances, the question being—Had the servant of A so submitted himself to the control of B as to become for the time being B's servant? and that question depended on the nature of the

2 and 4 of the pursuer's condescendence. . . . The chief question in the present case is whether that arrangement involved the doctrine of collaborateur as between Burgoyne and the skipper; and the answer to the question admittedly depends on whether the two men are to be held to have been in the service of a common master at the time of the accident—Johnson v. Lindsay & Co., L. R., [1891] A. C. 371. The defender maintains that while Burgoyne continued throughout to be in the service of the Fishery Board, the skipper had become pro hac vice the servant of the Board, the vessel, with skipper and crew, having passed from the possession and control of the defender into the possession and control of the Board. Of course, from the time of leaving port on the voyage in question the vessel was outwith the personal possession and control of the defender, just as she would have been in any ordinary trawling cruise in the North Sea. But what the defender means is that through Burgoyne being on board the vessel the Fishery Board possessed the vessel, and controlled the master and crew. When one looks into the matter, however, the control exercised by Burgoyne turns out to have been of a very limited character. He was entitled to indicate the places in Aberdeen Bay where the trawling operations were to be conducted, and to prescribe the length of the drags, so as to get live fish. But I do not see that he had any further control of the skipper and crew, and, of course, he had no right to interfere with the navigation of the vessel. The skipper was on board not merely to navigate the vessel, but also to look after the defender's interest in the fish caught, the defender's share of the fish being generally about ninety per cent of the catch. Of course, the skipper and crew were engaged and paid by the defender, and Burgoyne could not have dismissed any of them. In these circumstances I do not think that any of the authorities to which I was referred in the course of the extremely able argument to which I had the pleasure of listening, would justify me in holding that the skipper was the servant of the Fishery Board pro hac vice. Adapting the words of Lord Watson, in the case above mentioned, to the present case, I hold that the circumstances are not such as to shew conclusively that the skipper submitted himself to the control of the Fishery Board, and either expressly or impliedly consented to accept the Board as his master for the purpose of the common employment—trawling for fish.

"The other authorities to which I refer are Rourke v. White Moss Col- work and the person or persons by whom it was being carried out. Dec. 11, 1907.

¹ Johnson v. Lindsay & Co., L. R., [1891] A. C. 371, per Lord Watson, at p. 382, and Lord Herchell at p. 377; Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., 1877, L. R., 2 C. P. D. 204; Donovan v. Laing, Wharton, and Down Construction Syndicate, Limited, L. R., [1893] 1 Q. B. 629; Cairns v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, June 17, 1898, 25 R. 1021; Connelly v. Eosd., Oct. 16, 1902, 5 F. 8; M'Fall v. Adams & Co., 1907, S. C. 367.

 The work here was the work of the Fishery Board, and not the work of the defender, and it was being carried out by the Fishery Board with a hired trawler, plant, and crew. The Board had an official of their own on board, and he had the right to control the operations by pointing out where the vessel was to go. The master of the "Star of Hope," therefore, was at the time of the accident in the service of the Fishery Board, not in that of the defender, and the defender consequently was not liable for the negligence of the master. It made no difference that the defender received a large—probably by far the larger—proportion of the catch, that was merely the mode of paying for the hire of the vessel and crew. By the bye-laws framed by the Fishery Board under the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889,¹ trawling within the prohibited areas was legal only when the trawling was being carried on either by persons in the service of the Board or by persons who had the permission in writing of the Board. In the present instance there was not any permission in writing granted to the master, and therefore, unless he was in the service of the Board, he was doing an illegal act in trawling—that was to say, in trawling for the benefit of the defender and in his service. Alternatively, if the control of the trawling was not entirely in the hands of the Fishery Board, then it must either have been in the hands of the defender, in which case the pursuer's husband must be regarded as being for the time a servant of the defender, or it was a joint adventure by the Board and the defender, and in either view the defender was not liable on the principle of collaborateur.

The pursuer was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have had a very able argument from Mr Murray. Having carefully considered the case and the interlocutor and note of the Sheriff-substitute, I have come entirely to concur in everything that the Sheriff-substitute has said. In this particular case the vessel liery Co., 1877, 2 C. P. Div. 205; Donovan v. Laing, [1893] 1 Q. B. 629; Cairns v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, 1898, 25 R. 1021; and Connelly v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, 1902, 5 F. 8.

"The defender's procurator further founded on the cases mentioned in Abbott on Shipping, 14th ed., p. 65, and MacLachlan on Shipping, 4th ed. (1892), p. 354 et seq., in regard to a contract of locatio navis et operarum magistri et nauticorum. But the interest which the defender retained in the proceeds of the cruise now in question seems to me to render these cases inapplicable.

"An alternative argument put forward by the defender's procurator was that Burgoyne occupied the same legal position as a guest or licensee on board the vessel, taking the risk of negligence on the part of his host's servants. But what seems to me fatal to this argument is the fact that under the arrangement between the defender and the Fishery Board, Burgoyne was as much entitled to be on board as the skipper and crew.

"Lastly, the defender's procurator argued that the defender and the Fishery Board should be regarded as joint adventurers or partners in a trawling speculation, to which the Fishery Board contributed Burgoyne, with the right to trawl in closed waters, and the defender contributed all else. I can hardly accept this as a correct description of the arrangement between the parties; and there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that either the skipper or Burgoyne accepted the supposed joint adventurers or partners as his new masters. . . ."

¹ 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23, sec 6.

Dec. 11, 1907. undertook to fish in certain waters in which the Fishery Board were entitled to prevent anyone from fishing, although they were entitled to sanction fishing in these waters, on certain conditions, for the purposes of scientific research. These conditions were that the trawl owners were to take as their share the entire catch except a certain quantity of plaice, which were required for scientific purposes ; and in order that the fishing might be conducted in such a manner as the Fishery Board considered suitable, an official of the Board was to be on the vessel to see that the fishing took place at such spots as were proper for the scientific ends in view. The Fishery Board officer had no other function whatever. He could not interfere with the navigation in any way, and if the master of the trawler thought that any particular spot pointed out for trawling by the Fishery Board officer was not safe for navigation, the master could refuse, and in the interest of his owners was bound to refuse, to take the vessel to the spot pointed out by the Fishery Board officer. Once the Fishery Board officer had pointed out where he wished the vessel to go, the manœuvres for taking her there were entirely in the hands of the master and crew. The master in doing his work was no doubt doing it in part to fulfil the objects of the Fishery Board, but he was also doing it for the profit of his owner, who would appropriate the balance of the catch. It was plainly a speculation for profit on the part of this trawl owner—a speculation for profit in exactly the same sense as in any ordinary case of trawling. He might bring up a large catch or a small catch or nothing at all. That is just what would happen in any ordinary trawling adventure. To say in these circumstances that the vessel had been so handed over to the Fishery Board that the Board became the employers of the master and crew appears to me to be out of the question. I am very well satisfied with the excellent note of the Sheriff-substitute, and I move your Lordships to adhere.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. There are two questions in the case—(1) whether the stranding was due to the negligence of the skipper of the trawler, and (2) whether the skipper was for the purpose of the adventure in question truly the servant of the Fishery Board. On the first question I entirely agree with the Sheriff-substitute. (His Lordship considered the evidence.) With regard to the second question, I have really very little to add to what your Lordship has said. No doubt Mr Burgoyne, as representing the Fishery Board, had right to indicate in what part of Aberdeen Bay he desired trawling operations to be carried on. But the conduct of these operations and the navigation of the vessel were entirely under the control of the skipper as the servant of the owner and in the owner's interest. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was right.

LORD ARDWALL.—I also agree. The main contention put forward by Mr Murray was that the defender was not liable, because at the time of the wreck the master of the trawler "Star of Hope" was not his servant but the servant of the Fishery Board, and that accordingly (1) the defender is not answerable for him, and (2) the deceased John D. Burgoyne having lost his life through the fault of a fellow-servant, the pursuer's claim in respect of his death is excluded. Now, I think that the facts of this case do not bring it up to any of the cases in which it was held that a servant hired out to another person was so entirely under the control of that other person that the person whose general servant the servant so hired out was, was not liable for any accident which might occur through the negligence of the servant so hired out. In such cases two test questions arise—(1) For whom was the work being done at the time when the accident happened? and (2) What was the nature of the control retained over the hired-out servant by the person whose servant he generally was?

Dec. 11, 1907.
Burgoyne v.
Walker.
Lord Ardwall.

Now, in regard to the work, the work in the present case was the ordinary work of a trawler, neither more nor less. Neither the defender nor anyone else got pecuniary remuneration from the Fishery Board. The owner, master, and crew of the trawler were paid just like those of any other trawler, out of the proceeds of the adventure. The only difference was that on this particular fishing voyage the vessel had on board an official of the Fishery Board, with tubs into which he put his live fish, and that the trawl owner instead of keeping the whole catch was bound to hand over to the Fishery Board a certain quantity of fish of a certain kind, and in return for this he received the benefit of being allowed to fish in waters where it was in the ordinary case illegal to fish and where the chances of success would certainly be much increased. That was quite an intelligible arrangement, but it did not convert the trawler and its crew into a trawler and crew of the Fishery Board engaged solely or principally in their work. The leading object was trawling on behalf of the owner and others interested, and it was a mere incident of the particular voyage that the Fishery Board had a right to get a small portion of the fish.

If we compare the present case with the case of Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Company,¹ it is easy to see the broad distinction between the two cases. In *Rourke*¹ the injured man was in the service of a pit-sinker. While the pit-sinking was going on no other work in the colliery was going on. The only work which was being carried on at the time and place when the accident happened was pit-sinking, and not working coal. The pit-sinker was a contractor entirely independent of the colliery owners, and although they provided the plant and an engine and engineer, they gave over the whole control thereof to the pit-sinker, or in other words lent both engine and engineer to the pit-sinker. It was accordingly held that the colliery owners were not liable for the injuries caused to the plaintiff by the fault of the engineer.

With regard to the question as to whether at the time of the wreck the vessel was under the control of the Fishery Board or their servant the deceased John Burgoyne, the evidence is I think clear to the effect that the control exercised by the deceased or the Fishery Board was of a very limited description. It is proved that the deceased was entitled to direct, and did direct, the master as to the parts of Aberdeen Bay he should trawl over, but he had truly no control, in the real sense of that term, over the master. For instance, if the master had thought that from any cause there was risk to the vessel in going where the deceased wished him to go, he had an absolute right to refuse to go, and the whole navigation and control

¹ L. R., 2 C. P. D. 205.

Dec. 11, 1907. of the ship as to steering, speed, engines, and everything else was in the master's hands as representing the defender and responsible to him. I am therefore unable to hold that it can be said in this case, as was said in others, that the defender had parted with the control of the vessel and its master and crew to the Fishery Board or its official.

Burgoyne v.
Walker.

Lord Ardwall.

(His Lordship then considered the question of fault, coming to the same conclusion as the Sheriff.)

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, affirmed the interlocutor appealed against, and found in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in said interlocutor.

D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 48.

WILLIAM HENRY GILL, Claimant (Respondent).—

Kennedy, K.C.—Gillon.

Dec. 14, 1907.

THE ABERDEEN STEAM TRAWLING AND FISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—Dickson, K.C.—Lippe.

Gill v. Aberdeen Steam
Trawling and Fishing Co.,
Limited.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 7 (2)—Ship—Seaman—Fishing Vessel—Remuneration by share in profits or gross earnings.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, enacts :—Sec. 7 (2). "This Act shall not apply to such members of the crew of a fishing vessel as are remunerated by shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of such vessel."

The sole remuneration of the mate or first fisherman of a steam-trawler while at sea was one and one-eighth share (each share being one-fourteenth) of the net balance of the gross price of the fish caught on a trip after deducting certain specified expenses, which did not include the wages of other members of the crew, who were paid by fixed wages.

Held that such remuneration was a share in the profits or the gross earnings of the vessel, and that the fisherman so paid fell under the exception contained in sec. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and was consequently precluded from claiming compensation under that Act.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

WILLIAM HENRY GILL, trawl fisherman, Aberdeen, claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, from the Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Company, Limited, Aberdeen, in whose employment he had sustained injuries, and instituted arbitration proceedings under that Act against them in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen. The Sheriff-substitute (Young) awarded compensation. The employers appealed.

The facts as set forth in the stated case were as follows :—

The respondent was a trawl fisherman in Aberdeen. The appellants were owners of the steam-trawler "Strathmartin," A 899, belonging to the port of Aberdeen, in which the respondent served as mate or first fisherman from 7th August 1907 to the date of the accident after mentioned.

The "Strathmartin" had, from 4th July to 7th August 1907, been undergoing her No. 1 Board of Trade Survey, which was completed on or about the latter date. The crew of the vessel, of which the respondent was mate, were for two days thereafter engaged preparing the fishing gear for going to sea, and were paid two days' harbour wages on the 9th of August. The said vessel then went to sea, and completed a ten days' trip on the 19th of August. She went to sea again on the 19th of August, and completed a seven days' trip on the 26th of August. The vessel again went to sea, and completed an eight days' trip on the 3d of September. The next trip was uncompleted at the date of the accident to the respondent on 9th September. These trips were the only trips on which the respondent had served as mate on the "Strathmartin."

Dec. 14, 1907.
Gill v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited.

On 9th September 1907 the steam-trawler "Strathmartin" was fishing in the North Sea, about 15 miles north-east of Fair Isle. Respondent served as mate or first fisherman on board the "Strathmartin," and it was part of his duty to make the necessary preparations to ice and put away the fish. About 10.30 P.M. on said date, while the respondent was so engaged removing some ice in the fish room the vessel rolled in the sea, with the result that a large lump of ice accidentally fell upon and fractured the respondent's right leg.

The respondent was taken to the Aberdeen Royal Infirmary, where he remained under treatment from 10th September 1907, and so was unable to earn any wages.

The remuneration of the mate or first fisherman in one of the appellants' trawlers was determined (pursuant to a scale fixed by an award of the Aberdeen Conciliation Board for the Aberdeen trawlers for two years from 25th October 1905) in the manner set forth in the following notice issued by the appellants:—

"All fish (excluding livers and roes, which shall be a perquisite of the deck crews) shall be sold. From the gross price realised there shall be deducted—Salesmen's commission, at the rate of five per cent; discount to the fish buyers at the rate of 2d. per £ on said gross price; one penny for every box used for the fish landed; the cost of all labour handling the fish till they are taken over by the buyers; all ice and coals required for the trip on which the fish were caught; all harbour, market, and water dues; the cost of watching, dan outfit, baskets, and stores. The net balance shall be divided into fourteen shares, whereof:—

"The master shall be paid one and three-eighths of such shares.

"The mate or first fisherman shall be paid one and one-eighth of such shares."

Under this notice a second fisherman got 5s. per day and 4d. or 3d. per £ on the net balance above mentioned. The two engineers got a fixed wage of 8s. 4d. and 6s. 6d. per day respectively. The other members of the crew, except the cook, received a fixed wage of 5s. per day and a bonus depending on the amount of the gross proceeds of the fishing. The cook received 3s. 9d. per day fixed wage and a bonus.

With regard to wages in port the notice provided:—"When any vessel is in port cleaning boilers or under repair, and the attendance of the crew, or any of them, is required, the scale of wages shall be as follows:— . . . First fisherman, 5s. per day. . . ."

No wages to any member of the crew were included among the deductions made from the gross earnings of the vessel before ascertaining the net balance which was divided into fourteen shares, whereof the respondent received one and one-eighth share.

On the foregoing facts the Sheriff-substitute held "that the respondent, while in the appellants' employment as mate or first fisherman on board their trawler 'Strathmartin,' sustained on 9th September 1907 personal injuries by accident arising out of and in connection with his employment; that in consequence of the personal injuries so sustained he was incapacitated for work, and unable to earn wages from 9th September 1907; that the amount of compensation payable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, had not been ascertained by agreement between parties; that under his contract of service the respondent was not remunerated by a share or shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of the said trawler, but received harbour wages at five shillings a day, and for time at sea wages on a scale of which the said net balance formed the standard; that his weekly earnings during the period when he was mate or first fisherman in the appellants' employment exceeded £2 per week; that the respondent was a workman in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and entitled to compensation under the Act, and that the appellants are liable to pay him compensation at the rate of £1 weekly as from 9th September 1907," and awarded him that weekly allowance accordingly.

Dec. 14, 1907.

Gill v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether on a sound construction of the agreement between the appellants and the respondent, as above set forth, the respondent was at the time of the accident a member of the crew of a fishing vessel, and remunerated by a share or shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of such vessel, and is thereby excluded by section 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* from claiming compensation under said Act?"

The appeal was heard before the Second Division on 14th December 1907.

Argued for the appellants;—The claimant and respondent was remunerated by a share in the profits or in the gross earnings of the vessel, and was therefore not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.¹

Argued for the claimant and respondent;—He was a servant, not a profit sharer. He was not remunerated either by a share in the profits or in the gross earnings. He got a share of the proceeds of the catch, after making certain specified deductions. The exception in section 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, was not intended to apply to such a case as this, but solely to the case of true joint adventurers in the working of a fishing vessel. A share of earnings might be wages,² and a person remunerated by a share of earnings might be a "workman" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's decision is wrong. The respondent was first fisherman or mate on board a fishing vessel. The mode in which his remuneration was fixed was as follows:—From the gross price of the fish sold after any trip the owners were entitled to deduct commission, discount, one penny for every box used for the fish, cost of ice and coals, harbour, market, and water dues, and cost of watching, dan outfit, baskets, and stores, but not the wages of any of the

* Quoted in rubric.

¹ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 7 (2).

² Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 383.

³ Ellis v. Joseph Ellis & Co., L. R., [1905] 1 K. B. 324, per Collins, M. R., at pp. 328-9, and Cozens Hardy, L. J., at p. 330.

crew. As regards the master and first fisherman they were to receive a share of the earnings of the trip after making the deductions mentioned, the master $1\frac{3}{8}$, and the mate $1\frac{1}{8}$. The result of that is plainly this, that these two men might get nothing for a trip, although they did the work. That does not look like receiving wages for their work. It was really a speculation on their part under which they were each to get a share of a fund out of which their shares were to come if there was any such fund. It is plain that the gross earnings of the trip might not be sufficient to pay the charges which the owners were entitled to deduct before calculating the shares. In that case the master and mate would get nothing. On the other hand, if it was a splendid season, and the profits earned were large, they might get a very large sum indeed. How could that be said to be wages? When stated in that simple way the case is clear. The statute provides that it "shall not apply to such members of the crew of a fishing vessel as are remunerated by shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of such vessel." How could the master and mate here be said not to be "remunerated by shares in the profits or the gross earnings"? It is said that under the award the wages of the crew are not deducted before calculating the amount payable to the master and mate. The only effect of that is that if the gross earnings are not more than sufficient to pay the deductions the owners have to pay the crew out of their own pocket, and are not entitled to set the amount so paid against any future voyage.

Gill v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong in holding that the respondent was not remunerated by a share in the profits or the gross earnings of the trawler, and that the question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD LOW and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"Sustain the appeal :
Answer the question of law . . . in the affirmative :
Therefore recall the award of the Sheriff, and remit to him to dismiss the claim, and decern."

HENDERSON & MACKENZIE, S.S.C.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—
Agents.

THE TUDOR ACCUMULATOR COMPANY, LIMITED, Applicants.—

No. 49.

Dickson, K.C.—Macmillan.

SCOTT STIRLING & COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Sandeman.

Dec. 18, 1907.

Company—Winding-up—Petition by creditors for compulsory winding-up—Withdrawal of petitioning creditors—Sist of other creditors in their place—Competency.—Creditors, who had presented a petition for the compulsory winding-up of a limited company, after intimation and service had been effected, but before the prayer of the petition had been granted, compromised their claim against the company, and did not insist in the petition.

The Tudor Accumulator Co., Limited, v. Scott Stirling & Co., Limited.

Certain other creditors of the company thereupon presented a note stating that they desired to insist in the petition, and craving the Court to sist

Dec. 18, 1907. them as petitioners in place of the original petitioners. The company lodged answers, in which they challenged the competency of the application. The Court sisted the applicants as craved.

The Tudor
Accumulator
Co., Limited,
v. Scott
Stirling & Co.,
Limited.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 1st November 1907 Hudson & Kearns, Limited, presented a petition to the Court craving that Scott Stirling & Company, Limited, should be wound up by the Court under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900. They averred that they were creditors of the company for certain sums. The Court ordered intimation, service, and advertisement of the petition.

On 20th November 1907 the company presented a petition setting forth that an extraordinary resolution for the voluntary winding-up of the company had been passed on 18th November 1907, and craving the Court to continue the voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the Court. The Court ordered intimation and advertisement of the petition.

On 26th November 1907, after the days of induciae of the service of the first-mentioned petition had expired, but before any further steps had been taken, a note was presented by the Tudor Accumulator Company, Limited, who averred that the petitioning creditors, Hudson & Kearns, had come to an arrangement with Scott Stirling & Company, whereby, for certain considerations, they had discharged the debts due to them by the company, and did not intend to proceed with the petition. They further averred that they themselves, the Tudor Accumulator Company, were also creditors of Scott Stirling & Company; that the affairs of the latter were in such an involved condition that they should be wound up by the Court and an official liquidator appointed. They therefore craved the Court "to sist the said The Tudor Accumulator Company, Limited, as petitioners along with, or in room and place of, the said Hudson & Kearns, Limited," and to order that Scott Stirling & Company be wound up by the Court.

Answers were lodged for Scott Stirling & Company in which they submitted, inter alia, that the note was not competent.

Counsel for the applicants, in moving that they should be sisted, admitted that the application was a novel one in Scotland, but pointed out the analogy from bankruptcy procedure, and also stated that such applications were frequently granted in England, and were provided for in the Rules of Court.¹

The Court sisted the Tudor Accumulator Company, Limited, as petitioners in room and place of Hudson & Kearns, Limited, to the effect of enabling them to insist in the petition.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—DEAS & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 50.

Dec. 19, 1907.

Morrisson v.
Robertson.

ROBERT MORRISSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Morton.
PETER ROBERTSON, Defender (Respondent).—Wark.

Sale—Consent—Identity of Purchaser—Essential Error—Consensus in idem—Fraud—Question with innocent third party.—Telford falsely represented to Morrisson that he was the son of Wilson, Bonnyrigg, and had authority from him to purchase two cows. Morrisson, who knew Wilson to be a dairyman and in good credit, was deceived by the representation, agreed to sell the cows on the usual credit, and delivered them to Telford, who never paid the price. Thereafter Robertson purchased the cows from Telford in good faith and without knowing that they had been improperly obtained, and paid the price demanded by Telford.

¹ General Rules, March 1893 (made pursuant to sec. 26 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 63)); Buckley on the Companies Acts, 8th ed. p. 972.

In an action by Morrisson against Robertson for delivery of the cows, held (1) that the cows were never sold to Telford, and (2) that the purchaser from him had no title to retain them.

ROBERT MORRISON, dairyman, Kirkcaldy, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Stirling, against Peter Robertson, dairyman, Cambusbarron, concluding for delivery of two cows, or, alternatively, for payment of their value.

The pursuer's averments were to the following effect:—On 31st January 1906, at the Auction Mart of Messrs Oliver & Sons, where the pursuer had brought certain cows for sale, a man who afterwards turned out to be Alexander Telford, came up to him and falsely represented that he was the son of Mr Wilson, Westrigg, Bonnyrigg, and that he wanted to purchase two cows on behalf of his father. The pursuer had on previous occasions had business dealings with a James Wilson, dairyman, Bonnyrigg, who was a person of good credit, and he believed that the Mr Wilson, Westrigg, Bonnyrigg, whom Telford falsely represented as his father, was the said James Wilson. In this belief, and thinking that he was dealing with a person who was the son of James Wilson, and authorised to treat on his behalf, the pursuer agreed to sell two cows, and delivered them to Telford on the usual trade credit. Thereafter the cows were sold and delivered by Telford to the defender.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The two cows in question having been obtained by the said Alexander Telford from the pursuer either by theft or under essential error, or both, he is entitled to delivery thereof as craved. (4) The defender having wrongously refused to deliver up said cows specified in the prayer of the petition, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

The defender averred that he had purchased the cows from Telford in good faith, and without any knowledge or suspicion of the way in which they had been obtained and that he had paid the price to Telford. This was not disputed by the pursuer.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are insufficient to support the conclusions of his action. (2) The two cows in question having been obtained by the man Wilson or Telford by a voidable title, and his title not having been voided at the time of the sale, and the defender having bought the cows in good faith, and without notice of the seller's defective title, the pursuer has no claim for delivery thereof. (6) The pursuer having by his own negligence brought about the loss to himself, is barred from insisting in the present action.

On 16th November 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) repelled the first plea in law for the defender so far as bearing upon the pursuer's case of essential error, and allowed a proof before answer,* which was taken and which established the truth of the pursuer's averments.

* "NOTE.— . . . It seems clear that error with regard to the identity of a supposed purchaser is error in substantials, prevents consent, and negatives a supposed contract (Bell's Prin., sec. 11; 1 Com., 313; Stewart v. Kennedy, 17 R. (H. L.), 25); and the precise question here appears to be

Dec. 19, 1907.

Morrisson v.
Robertson.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

Dec, 19, 1907. On 8th January 1907 the Sheriff-substitute granted decree in terms of the first alternative prayer of the petition.*

Morrisson v.
Robertson.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who recalled the interlocutor complained of, and assoilzied the defender.†

whether fraud inducing such error makes it cease to be such error and to have such effects. Recent cases in Scotland are, apparently, wanting; and no very distinct authority from the institutional writers was referred to. Prof. G. J. Bell, who was quoted on both sides, distinguishes essential error and fraud, and he does not consistently make it clear that the presence of fraud takes such error out of the category of essential error, with the results of such error as to third parties. In England there appears to be a succession of cases where essential error made void a supposed sale, induced by fraudulent misrepresentations, to the effect of declaring that there was no sale, and of giving recovery to the original seller out of the hands of an innocent purchaser (Benjamin on Sales, (5th ed.), p. 462, also p. 459), and I do not see that there is a difference in principle in this point, which makes these cases inapplicable. Most of these cases are founded on in a note in Lord M'Laren's edition of Bell's Commentaries (vol. i., p. 261); Kinsford v. Murray, 26 L. J. Ex. 83; Higsons v. Burton, 26 L. J. Ex. 342; Hardman v. Booth, 32 L. J. Ex. 105; see also Cundy v. Lindsay, 3 App. Cas. 459; and the doctrine of that note sets forth the view that in the absence of consensus in idem placitum produced by fraud, there is essential error, with no contract, no transfer, and no title to retransfer, and, specifically, there is no such title in the person of a fraudulent buyer who has induced the belief in a seller, as the inductive cause for sale, that he is selling to someone else. . . ."

* "NOTE.— . . . Essential error is a doctrine of Scots Law, applicable I think to the facts of this case, and on similar facts the English decisions seem to arrive at the same conclusion on the ground of no contract of sale, the cases cited coming apparently under the corresponding rule or principle of mutual assent.—(Benjamin on Sales (5th ed.), pp. 92, 93, and 98). The recent Scots case Bryce v. Ehrmann, 7 F. 5, referred to and distinguished in Weiner v. Gill and Smith, 1906, L. R., K. B. Div. 575, does not seem to go at all on different lines from those above referred to. I find then that pursuer has proved this part of the case which I found relevant on 16th November.

"It was argued on the proof for defender that there could be no case of essential error here with regard to identity of the purchaser, as there was a person actually present to whom the cows were actually delivered; and it was even urged that it did not matter to the pursuer to whom he sold. But identity and credit are inseparable in reality, and are in effect so treated in the cases cited; and it is admitted that Alexander Telford had no credit or means. The postponement of payment arranged for and the method of it seems to me specially to connect the identity and the credit of this purchaser. Opinions in one or two of the English cases raise other subtleties, which, however, I think, do not affect the application of the decisions to the present case.

"Defender's other argument is that pursuer is barred through his negligence in the matter. But, assuming that defender was not negligent himself, I think, on a fair estimate of the circumstances of a sale of cattle, the pursuer was not wanting in ordinary prudence in believing and acting on Telford's story. . . ."

† "NOTE.— . . . It is plain the pursuer has no case against the defender merely in respect of Telford's fraud. The pursuer was willing to sell, and possession of the cows was got by Telford with his consent. This put Telford in a position to sell over again; and the defender acquired in good faith and for a full price before the pursuer took any steps to interpel a sale. It is not doubtful on the authorities that in such circum-

The pursuer appealed.¹

At advising,—

Dec. 19, 1907.

Morrisson v.
Robertson.

LORD M'LAREN.—In this action the pursuer, Robert Morrisson, who is a dairyman, sues for the delivery of two cows which he says are his property, but which, having been obtained from him by fraud, have actually passed into the possession of the defender by what is not disputed to be a bona fide purchase. The case which the pursuer makes on record is of this nature. He says that he had taken the cows to market for sale, but there were no offerers at his price; and then he says that shortly after the cows had been withdrawn from the sale ring, a man, who afterwards turned out to be Alexander Telford of no fixed residence, came up to the pursuer and falsely represented that he wanted to purchase two cows on behalf of his stances no right arises to the pursuer against the defender in respect solely of Telford's fraud.

"But then it is said the pursuer was under essential error in selling to Telford. What was that error? Not as to Westrigg. The alleged error was in supposing that the Wilson mentioned by Telford was a dairyman with whom the pursuer occasionally dealt. But this error was not induced by Telford. It was the pursuer's own hastiness that caused the error. According to the pursuer's contention, his remedy would have been equally good even if his purchaser had been a son of a Mr Wilson of Westrigg, provided he was not a son of the dairyman.

"I have looked at the cases mentioned by the learned Sheriff-substitute, but I am not satisfied that they rule the point. Telford's misrepresentation was not the cause of the sale. The pursuer was willing to sell, and if he had got his money he could not have claimed restoration of the cows on the ground that he would sell only to the dairyman. He was in the market to sell, and it was not the sale that was induced by his rash assumption, but the willingness to give credit.

"But more than that, the case is not against Telford. If the pursuer's claim is good against the defender it is good against any subpurchaser, however remote, and all because of his causeless assumption that he was selling to the dairyman's son. The same rule would require to apply to any other sale. Take the case of the Stock Exchange. If a holder of stocks seeking a purchaser sold to a man Smith who he causelessly assumed was a partner in a certain firm, it would surely be extravagant to hold that after the stocks had changed hands, it may be a dozen times, and the value had risen, the original seller could claim return of the stocks from a remote subpurchaser merely on the ground of the mistake he had made in regard to the identity of the person who gave the name of Smith. The business of life could not be carried on subject to such a rule. And who is to know whether the mistake might not be a mere afterthought? This would leave far too much to the seller.

"Then, too, credit might have to be given for the price paid by the subpurchaser. But if the price was always a full one at the time of each sale, where would there be a difference for which to decern? The injured but credulous seller could only get decree, failing return, for the difference between the present value of the thing sold and the price paid by the subpurchaser. Here, seemingly, there would be none. It would be damnum absque injuria. . . ."

¹ The following Authorities were referred to:—Higsons v. Burton, 1857, 26 L. J. Ex. 342; Hardman v. Booth, 1863, 32 L. J. Ex. 105; Cundy v. Lindsay, 1878, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 459; Kings Norton Metal Co., Limited, v. Edridge, Merrett, & Co., Limited, 1897, 14 T. L. R. 98; Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), secs. 23, 25 (2).

Dec. 19, 1907. father, Mr Wilson, Westrigg, Bonnyrigg. The pursuer says that Morrison v. already sold cows to James Wilson, a dairyman at Bonnyrigg, and Robertson. was not very well acquainted with him. But he knew that he was Lord M'Laren. man at Bonnyrigg, as when he purchased cows through the sale at Edinburgh auction marts his name was always given as "Wilson Bonnyrigg"; and the pursuer believed that the Mr Wilson, Bonnyrigg, whom the said Alexander Telford falsely represented father, was the said James Wilson, who is a person of good credit.
 he says that he did not know Alexander Telford at all, but he was by the said false representations to believe, and did believe, that Telford was the son of the said James Wilson, and that he had the authority of the said James Wilson to purchase cows on his behalf.
 are the pursuer's averments. I do not think it necessary to go into evidence, but it may suffice to say that the pursuer's averments are completely proved. He was induced by the fraudulent representations of Telford, which I have just read, to part with two of his cows and I think that these facts were not seriously disputed, and on the whole it was not disputed that the defender had purchased the cows from which he paid without suspicion that they had been improperly

Now, in these circumstances the question arises whether the pursuer can recover the cows as his property, or whether they have by their transmission to a purchaser for value been irrevocably taken out of the pursuer's possession. This appears to me to be just one of those questions which a lawyer who is willing to think for himself could have no difficulty in solving, even if he had not precedents to guide him. If there was a contract of sale, then, although the pursuer might have had an action for damages against the person who obtained the goods by fraud, or had an action for reducing the sale, yet if in the meantime the cows had passed by lawful sub-sale to a third person, then to recover from that third person, the analogue of the defender in the present case, would be indefeasible. Having acquired the property by purchase from a person who had a lawful title, he would have had a good defence to an action of this nature. But then the case of the pursuer is that there was no contract of sale. If Telford, the man who committed the fraud, made false representations as to his own character and credit obtained credit from the pursuer on credit, then I think that would have been the nature of a sale which, although liable to reduction, would stand good until reduced. But then that was not at all the nature of the transaction.
 The pursuer never sold his cows to Telford. He believed that he was selling the cows to a man Wilson at Bonnyrigg, whom he knew to be a person of reasonably good credit, and to whom he was content to give credit for the payment of the price. This belief that he was selling cows to Wilson was induced by the fraudulent statement of Telford that he was Wilson's son. It is perfectly plain that in such circumstances there was no contract between Telford and the pursuer, because Telford proposed to buy the cows for himself, and because the pursuer never sold them on credit to a man of whom he had no knowledge. There was there any sale of the cows by the pursuer to Mr Wilson, or did Wilson know nothing about them, and never authorised the pur-whole story was an invention. There being no sale either to Wilson or to Dec. 19, 1907. Telford, and there being no other party concerned in the business in hand, it follows that there was no contract of sale at all, and there being no contract of sale the pursuer remained the undivested owner of his cows, although he had parted with their custody to Telford in consequence of these false representations. Morrison v. Robertson.

Lord M'Laren.

So much being premised, then I think it follows that as Telford had no right to the cows he could not give a good title to the defender even under a contract for an onerous consideration. He had no better title to sell the cows to any third person than he would have had if he had gone into the pursuer's byre and stolen the cows. This seems to me to be perfectly clear upon a consideration of known principles, but it is satisfactory that in the judgment which we are to give according to the law of Scotland, we are confirmed by a decision of the English Court of Exchequer, in circumstances which are in all respects parallel to those in the present case—I mean the case of Higgins v. Burton.¹ There never were at any time, as I think, such differences in the law of sale in the two parts of Great Britain as would have affected the present question, but under the Sale of Goods Act these differences have been reduced to the vanishing point, and I can have no difficulty in holding that a decision given by an English Court in a case of this kind is an authority which is entitled to the greatest weight, and which, if sound, would be directly applicable to the same state of circumstances arising in Scotland. Therefore, both on principle and on authority, I think that the pursuer has established his case, and is entitled to a decree for the vindication of his property.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I think the principle upon which the case must be decided is so well established that it requires little explanation, but since we are differing from the learned Sheriff-depute it may be well to refer shortly to the authorities which appear to me to be conclusive. Probably the most apposite is the judgment of the House of Lords in Cundy v. Lindsay,² and the first observation with which Lord Chancellor Cairns begins his opinion is certainly directly applicable, viz., that it is always a disagreeable duty “to determine as between two parties, both of whom are perfectly innocent, upon which of the two the consequences of a fraud practised upon both of them must fall,” and that discharging that duty we can “do no more than apply, rigorously, the settled and well-known rules of law.” Then his Lordship proceeds to lay down the rules which according to his judgment must determine the question whether a purchaser in good faith and for value has or has not acquired a title to property which he has purchased from a seller to whom the property did not belong. He states, in the first place, a distinction with reference to a purchase in market overt, which has never been recognised by the law of Scotland, and which we may therefore dismiss. But the other rules which he lays down are all common to the law of both countries. His Lordship says:—“By the law of our country the purchaser of a chattel”—or, as we should say, corporeal moveable—“takes the chattel as a general

¹ 1857, 26 L. J. Ex. 342.

² 1878, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 459.

Dec. 19, 1907. rule subject to what may turn out to be certain infirmities in Morrison v. . . . If it turns out that the chattel has been found by the Robertson. . . . professed to sell it, the purchaser will not obtain a title good as Lord Kinnear. . . . real owner. If it turns out that the chattel has been stolen by who has professed to sell it, the purchaser will not obtain a turns out that the chattel has come into the hands of the person fessed to sell it by a de facto contract, that is to say, a contract purported to pass the property to him from the owner of the property, the purchaser will obtain a good title, even although afterward appear that there were circumstances connected with that contract would enable the original owner of the goods to reduce it, and to because these circumstances so enabling the original owner of the of the chattel to reduce the contract and to set it aside will not to interfere with a title for valuable consideration obtained by party during the interval while the contract remained unredressed.
 last rule is one example of a general principle which has governed sion of many cases of a different kind, of which Oakes v. Turquand liquidation of Overend and Gurney is a familiar instance. The that a contract obtained by fraud is not void but voidable; and follows that it is valid until it is rescinded, the rescission may come if in the meantime third persons have acquired rights in good faith value. But then on the other hand if such third persons have their title through a person who himself did not acquire the goods of any contract with the true owner, or to whom they were not transferred by the true owner upon any title, then the purchaser gets no better title than the person from whom he acquired, who either had no title at all. The doctrine is established by a great mass of and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the case of Burton,² and other cases which were referred to in the course of ment, such as the case of Hardman v. Booth,³ decided in England, valuable authorities which we may well follow. But the truth is require to go beyond our own books for authority for a doctrine stated distinctly by our institutional writers, and which has been in the decisions of this Court from a very early date. It is great precision by Lord Stair,⁴ who takes exactly the distinction Cairns takes in Cundy v. Lindsay,⁵ between a title obtained by contract which may be set aside as fraudulent, and possession supported by no contract at all. Thus, he says,—“In moveables, are not quarrellable upon the fraud of their authors, if they do for an onerous equivalent cause. The reason is because moveables have a current course of traffic, and the buyer is not to consider seller purchased, unless it were by theft or violence, which the law as labes reales, following the subject to all successors.” There tinction quite clearly put, and it is stated with equal precision by who gives in his illustrations a series of decisions beginning so

¹ Oakes v. Turquand and Harding, 1867, L. R., 2 H. L. 325.

² 1857, 26 L. J. Ex. 342.

³ 1863, 32 L. J. Ex.

⁴ Stair, Inst. iv. 40, 21.

⁵ 3 A. C. 459.

⁶ Bell's Prin

1629 with the case of the Bishop of Caithness,¹ in which the doctrine has been applied by this Court. Dec. 19, 1907.

Therefore I think that Mr Morton in his able argument put his case on exactly the right ground when he said that there was no contract between his client and Telford, the fraudulent person. He said if Telford had obtained the cattle by fraudulent contract he should have had nothing to say, but that there was no contract at all with Telford; and upon the facts I agree with your Lordship that that is an exactly accurate statement. If a man obtains goods by pretending to be somebody else, or by pretending that he is an agent for somebody, who has in fact given him no authority, there is no contract between the owner of the goods and him; there is no consensus which can support a contract. The owner, in this case the pursuer, does not contract with the fraudulent person who obtains the goods, because he never meant to contract with him. He thinks he is contracting with an agent for a different person altogether. He does not contract with the person with whom he in fact supposes that he is making a contract, because that person knows nothing about it and never intended to make an agreement; therefore there is no agreement at all. I think the fallacy of the reasoning of the learned Sheriff-depute becomes quite apparent when one considers that in order to make a contract of sale you must have a certain seller and a certain buyer. The learned Sheriff says that the pursuer was willing to sell, and was in the market to sell; but then a general desire to sell to someone is not a contract to sell to any particular person, and it is as clear as evidence can make it that the pursuer never intended to sell to Telford. He knew nothing about him, he never thought of him, and never intended to deal with him. Therefore, there was no consensus which could lead to any agreement. For these reasons I entirely agree with your Lordship that the pursuer is entitled to recover his cattle if they are still extant. If the defender is not in a position to deliver either or both of the cattle the question will arise as to the pursuer's remedy for the value, which has not been disposed of by the Sheriff-substitute. In the meantime I agree with the decision which your Lordship proposes.

Morrison v.

Robertson.

Lord Kinnear.

LORD PEARSON.—I agree so far with the learned Sheriff that the pursuer has no case merely in respect of Telford's fraud, or merely in respect that he sold the cattle to Telford under essential error. But I think the real question here arises at a prior stage. The Sheriff's view is that there was here a contract, and if there was, then he is probably right in his view of the law. I am unable to find that the proof establishes any contract to which the pursuer was a party. Telford did not represent himself as being principal, but as an agent. The pursuer was entirely deceived, both as to the identity and also as to the intention of the person with whom he supposed he was contracting and intended to contract, and in that essential part of a contract there was no consensus in idem, and therefore no sale. I think that the case falls within the principle of the English cases of *Higgons*² and *Cundy*³; and that the delivery to Telford gave him no such ¹ Bishop of Caithness v. Fleshers of Edinburgh, 1629, M. 9112, 4145.

² 1857, 26 L. J. Ex. 342.

³ 1878, L. R., 3 A. C. 459.

Dec. 19, 1907. title of possession as would enable him in law to transfer the the cattle to another.
 Morrison v.
 Robertson.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Find in fact on January 31, 1906, Alexander Telford falsely and fraudulently represented to the pursuer and appellant that he was the agent of Mr Wilson, Bonnyrigg, and that he had authority from Mr Wilson to purchase two cows; (2) that the appellant knew Mr Wilson of Bonnyrigg to be a farmer and a man of credit, was deceived by said representation, and agreed to purchase two cows to Mr Wilson on the usual credit, and delivered the two cows to Telford; (3) that the respondent, on February 1, following, purchased the said cows from Telford in good faith and without notice of the appellant's right, and paid the price demanded by Telford: Find in law (1) that the appellant is not bound to sell the two cows to Telford or to Wilson of Bonnyrigg; (2) that the cows were not delivered to Telford upon a bona fide sale, but, notwithstanding such delivery, continued to be the appellant's property; (3) that the appellant was impleached and is not chargeable with negligence in delivering the cows to Telford as the supposed agent of Wilson; and (4) that the respondent having obtained the two cows from a person who had no title either of property or possession thereto, is under an obligation to restore the cows to their true owner, the appellant, or to account to the appellant for their value at the date when he acquired them, and remit the cause to the Sheriff-substitute to dispose thereof in conformity with the above finding, and decern."

WILLIAM BROTHERSTON, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—A

No. 51. ALEXANDER FLEMING AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Wilson, K.C.—Moncrieff.
 Dec. 20, 1907. JAMES GEMMILL, Defender (Appellant).—Hunter, K.C.—Carr.
 Fleming v. WILLIAM BARR & SONS, Defenders (Appellants).—Hunter, K.C.—Macmillan.
 Gemmill. CHARLES SURGEONER, Defender (Appellant).—Hunter, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Landlord and Tenant—River—Pollution—Interdict—Title to an action for interdict at the instance of the tenant of a farm to prevent the pollution of a stream which flowed through his lands, and at which his cattle were watered, against the proprietors of houses (let to tenants) on the upper part of the stream, held that, as the pursuer was the tenant under the landlord's title, in so far as it was necessary for his own purposes the subjects let, he had the same right as the landlord to maintain the purity of the stream, and accordingly that he had a good title to pursue the action.

Landlord and Tenant—River—Pollution—Responsibility of Landlord—Pollution by Tenant.—The proprietors of a block of workmen's houses erected for the use of their tenants earth closets, and made drains which were only intended to receive water from wash-houses and sinks, but which were used by the occupants of the houses as a receptacle for sewage, with the result that a stream which flowed through an adjoining farm, into which the drains discharged, was polluted, and injury was caused to the cattle which watered at the stream.

In defence to an action of interdict and damages directed against the proprietors of the houses, the defenders pleaded that they had provided an effective drainage system, and were not responsible for pollution due to an improper use thereof by their tenants. Dec. 20, 1907.
Fleming v.
Gemmill.

The Court held that the improper use of the drains might have been anticipated, and that as the proprietors had made the drains in such a way that pollution was a probable result, they were responsible therefor,—but continued the cause that the defenders might submit a scheme to avoid pollution.

Reparation—Damages—River—Pollution—Plurality of Defenders—Joint and Several Liability.—In an action of damages against several defenders for loss caused by the pollution of a stream, held that, as each of the defenders had contributed materially to the pollution, they were liable jointly and severally for the whole amount of the damage which ensued.

Process—Summons—Decree—Joint and Several Liability.—In an action of payment against six defenders “jointly and severally,” three of the defenders were assoilzied. Held that a decree against the remaining defenders conjunctly and severally was competent.

ALEXANDER FLEMING and others, tenants of the farm of South Netherburn, in the parish of Dalsersf and county of Lanark, raised this Sheriff of action in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, against six defenders, viz., James Gemmill, James Nimmo & Company, Limited, William Barr & Sons, The United Collieries, Limited, William Cooper, and Charles Surgeoner. 1ST DIVISION.
Lanarkshire.

The pursuers prayed (first) for decree against each of the defenders, interdicting them from permitting polluting liquids to flow from houses belonging to them into the Netherburn Burn at any point in the course of said burn on the pursuers’ farm of South Netherburn, or at any portion of its course prior to entering on the lands of said farm; and (second) for decree against the defenders “jointly and severally” for payment of certain sums amounting in cumulo to £314.

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 3) “Through said farm of South Netherburn, which extends to 130 acres or thereby, there flows a burn or watercourse known as Netherburn Burn or Dalsersf Burn, which is the only natural source for obtaining water for the supply of the cattle on said farm. The dairy stock on said farm amounts to 30 cows or thereby and 13 heifers.” (Cond. 4) “The defenders, the said James Gemmill and James Nimmo & Company, Limited, William Barr & Sons, and The United Collieries, Limited, are coalmasters occupying certain collieries in the vicinity of said burn and owners of houses in the same locality, and the said William Cooper and Charles Surgeoner are the owners of a number of houses there. For some time past defenders have permitted . . . sewage from said houses to flow into said burn, whereby the water in the burn has been rendered unfit for drinking purposes and for the watering of said cattle.” They also averred that two heifers and a cow belonging to them died, that their cattle fell off in condition, and that the milk supply of their cows was diminished, as the result of using the water so contaminated.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders, having through their operations contaminated and rendered unsuitable for the purpose of watering cattle the burn referred to, should be interdicted from continuing said pollution. (2) The pursuers having sustained loss and damage through the defenders’ illegal actings, as aforesaid, to the extent sued for, decree should be granted therefor, with interest and expenses.

All the defenders lodged defences.

Dec. 20, 1907.

Fleming v.
Gemmill.

The defender James Gemmill pleaded;—(3) The defender Gemmill not having contaminated and rendered unsuitable for the purpose of watering cattle the burn referred to, he is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) The pursuers not having suffered any loss or damage through the fault of the defender James Gemmill, he is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Similar pleas were stated on behalf of the other defender.

A proof was taken before the Sheriff-substitute (A. S. D.) which established the following facts:—The Netherburn Burn flowed through the pursuers' land, and from which their cattle were watered, was polluted with sewage coming from houses in the town belonging to the defenders James Gemmill, William Barr & Son, and Charles Surgeoner, and occupied by their tenants, with the result that the milk supply of the pursuers' cows was diminished, and the condition of the cattle fell off.

The houses belonging to the defender Gemmill were tenanted by workmen, and were furnished with earth closets, and also with drains by which the water from sculleries and washhouses along the burn tended to be carried off, and to which access could be got by syvers and jawboxes in front of the cottages. The drains ran through a cesspool into a pipe which discharged into the Netherburn, and out of which the sewage which polluted the burn proved to flow. There was no fault in the construction of the drains, and it appeared that the pollution was caused by the impurity of it by the occupants of the cottages, who poured their liquors down these drains.

The drainage system in connection with the houses owned by the defenders William Barr & Son and Charles Surgeoner (which were of the same class) was substantially the same, and there was a contribution to the pollution from these houses as well as from the houses owned by Mr Gemmill.

No sewage was proved to flow into the burn from the houses owned by the other defenders.

On 26th March 1907 the Sheriff-substitute interdicted the defenders James Gemmill, William Barr & Sons, and Charles Surgeoner in terms of the first crave of the action, and ordained that they should "conjunctly and severally," to pay to the pursuers the sum of £1000, at which sum he assessed the damage suffered by the pursuers, and their expenses.

The defenders James Gemmill, William Barr & Sons, and Charles Surgeoner, appealed.

A preliminary objection taken to the competency of the Sheriff-substitute was separately argued.

The defenders argued;—The action being directed against the defenders "jointly and severally," the only decree which could competently be pronounced was one finding them all liable. If they were all assoilzied, all were free. In an action against several defenders, if some were assoilzied, decree could only be pronounced against the others when to the words "jointly and severally" the words were added as "or severally." The decree pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute was accordingly incompetent.

The pursuers argued;—There was no authority for the proposition that a joint and several conclusion meant anything different from what it said, or that, under such a conclusion, it was incompetent to pronounce decree in any form of which joint and several admitted. The addition of such words as "or severally," might be customary, but was quite unnecessary. The Sheriff was accordingly justified in pronouncing decree against those of the defenders whom he found liable, while at the same time he assolized the others.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case a farmer, the land in whose occupation bounds a certain stream, raised an action in the Sheriff Court against six persons who he alleged polluted the stream, and the prayer of the petition was to ordain each of the defenders to abstain from causing a flow from their collieries or works or offices of noxious matters of various sorts, and "(second) to grant a decree against the above-named defenders, ordaining them, jointly and severally, to pay to the pursuers" certain sums of money which the pursuer alleges were the value of cattle which he lost through their being poisoned by the deleterious ingredients of the stream which they had drunk. There was a long proof on the matter, and the Sheriff-substitute eventually found that the pollution had been caused by three of the defenders, and not by the other three, and accordingly he pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the prayer against each of the three defenders, ordaining them to abstain, and granting decree jointly and severally against them for certain sums of money, being the sums at which he assessed the damage. An appeal was taken against that by the three persons found liable, but before going into the question of the merits, the point was raised by their counsel that the decree given by the Sheriff was wrong because it was impossible for the Sheriff to grant such a decree upon the prayer of the petition, in respect that the petition having asked for a decree for payment against six defenders jointly and severally, it was impossible to grant decree jointly and severally against only three of the defenders.

Perhaps at this time of day it is curious that the point is not perfectly settled, but counsel were unable to bring to our notice any authority deciding the matter, though there are many obiter dicta on one side and on the other. In that state of matters one must take up the matter on principle, and on principle I confess I do not think there is really much in the argument for the appellants. I can quite understand that for precaution's sake the common form of prayer has been more ample than the form in this case—that is to say, I think the common form of prayer or conclusion in a summons has been to find the defenders liable "jointly and severally, or severally," or in some cases where special caution is taken such words may be added as these—"or as their several liability may be determined in the course of the process to follow hereon." But while that is so, I do not doubt that under a

¹ The following Authorities were referred to:—Leslie's Representatives v. Lumsden, Dec. 17, 1851, 14 D. 213; Liquidators of Western Bank v. Douglas, March 20, 1860, 22 D. 447; Braidwoods v. Bonnington Co., June 23, 1866, 2 S. L. R. 152; Mackersy v. Davis & Sons, Limited, Feb. 16, 1895, 22 R. 368, per Lord McLaren, at p. 370; Caughie v. Robertson & Co., Oct. 15, 1897, 25 R. 1; Wallace v. Braid and Others, July 19, 1898, 6 S. L. T. 118; Robinson v. Reid's Trustees, May 31, 1900, 2 F. 928, per Lord Moncreiff, at p. 931; Cook v. Barnton Hotel Co., Limited, June 12, 1900, 2 F. 1011; Douglas v. Hogarth, Nov. 19, 1901, 4 F. 148, per Lord Trayner, at p. 150; Baird's Trustees v. Leechman, Dec. 20, 1902, 10 S. L. T. 515; Ball's Prin. sec. 56.

Dec. 20, 1907. prayer or a conclusion asking for a joint and several decree, it is possible to give decree in any form that joint and several liability means. As to what joint and several liability really means there can be no doubt. Mr Bell in his Principles, for instance, in section 56 says quite clearly that joint and several obligation means that "each is liable for the whole or a share," and there is a passage to the same effect in the Commercial Code. It would seem to me an absurd result that if in a prayer or conclusion using the words of obligation, you could not get all that the law says the conclusion truly means, and upon that very short ground I put my objection. But I have also discovered an old case which, without settling the point, seems to me to shew that that is the same view as was held in the present case. The case is that of Hay.¹ What happened, as narrated in the case, is this:—"James Hay brought an action against Charles Elphinstone, John Gray, and also against James Hamilton of Hutchison, for damages and expenses on account of their having wrongfully adjured him not to serve as a soldier during the subsistence of the Press Acts in 1757 and 1758.

"The Court, by interlocutor of the 6th of August 1762, found the whole defenders conjunctly and severally liable in £200 of damages and expenses.

"The defenders having reclaimed by joint petition, which was presented upon the last day of the session, it was refused as to Mr Elphinstone and Mr Gray, but as some of the Judges seemed to be of opinion that Mr Hamilton was not equally guilty, the pursuer, in order to be enabled to carry on further litigation, agreed at the bar to pass from that gentleman, and he was assoilzied.

"The pursuer having extracted the decret, and charged Mr Elphinstone and Mr Gray with horning, a bill of suspension was offered in that behalf, in which besides repeating the argument pleaded for them in the first instance, they further insisted that, in respect of the pursuer's passion against the other defender Mr Hamilton, they could only be liable in two-thirds of the sum charged for."

In that they were found to be wrong, and the inference to be drawn from the procedure in the action seems to me to be this: At that time reclamation petitions were dealt with upon their own merits, and it was not until 1840, as it is now according to our practice, to recall the interlocutor pronounced against—at least in part—before proceeding to vary it. An order was used to be pronounced which gave effect to the alteration desired by the Court without disturbing the original judgment, and that was what happened here; the reclaiming petition was refused as to Mr Elphinstone and Mr Gray, and upon counsel at the bar passing from Mr Hamilton, the other man was assoilzied. But the old decree was left alone, and I think it is quite clear that the decree which the pursuer extracted was the old decree in which the three defenders were found jointly and severally liable—that is to say, he went upon the old decree, and he charged Mr Elphinstone and Gray alone. That does not settle the point in the present case, but it shews, I think, that if the doctrine urged on the other side had there would have been open a defence which obviously was not considered Dec. 20, 1907. open—namely, that a decree against three defenders, jointly and severally, could never be a good basis for a charge against two defenders jointly and severally, where the third defender had in the meantime been assoilzied. Accordingly I have no doubt that the Sheriff here is right in so far as regards the question of the competency of the decree.

¹ Hay v. Elphinstone, Jan. 11, 1763; M. 14,658.

Fleming v. Gemmill.

Ld. President.

LORD M'LAREN.—When an action is brought against several persons without the addition of words descriptive of the nature of their liability, then I take it that even if one of them should be assoilzied, or if the pursuer should pass from his action against him, the instance would still be good against the defenders who remained, the only question being whether they were liable jointly or severally. In the case I am putting I think the better opinion is that they would only be liable jointly unless words denoting several liability were added. But then in order to avoid such a result, under which the pursuer would lose a part of his claim, the law authorises the use of the words "jointly and severally." These seem to me to cover the whole ground. The word "severally" implies that against whatever number of defenders a man proceeds, each is liable for the whole sum sued for, and the word "jointly" or "conjunctly" secures to those against whom the decree is made operative the right of rateable relief against the persons who have not paid. This, as I have said, seems to me to cover the whole ground. I am unable to see that the addition of the words "and severally," or the words "or severally," to the description in which "severally" is already contained, can have any meaning at all, and it seems to me that the suggested addition is mere surplusage. I think that the conclusion as it stands is rightly framed, and that under such a conclusion it is perfectly competent to pronounce a decree in the terms pronounced by the Sheriff.

LORD PEARSON.—The defenders here, six in number, were sued for payment of three separate sums of money, which they were to be ordained jointly and severally to pay to the pursuers to make good certain damages sustained by them. Three of the defenders have been assoilzied, and the remaining defenders now take the objection that no decree can pass against them for want of the words "or severally, or one or more of them," or some similar words, in the conclusion of the summons. The expression "jointly and severally" was originally part of the language of obligations, and imported a reserved right on the part of the creditor of two or more persons in a divisible obligation, to hold them bound either each for his own share or each for the whole. The question as to the effect of using the expression in the pecuniary conclusion of a summons, seems not to have been definitely settled in practice. Perhaps it would be more apt to use the expression "jointly or severally" in a summons. But I see no reason why the expression here used should not be regarded as sufficient to warrant the Court in pronouncing decree against all, or against each, or against one or more even in different shares, according to the view which the Court takes of the liabilities of the various defenders on the merits; and this, even although one or more of the defenders may be assoilzied.

Dec. 20, 1907.

Fleming v.
Gemmell.

The Lord President intimated that LORD KINNEAR, who was the hearing, but absent at the advising, concurred in the judgment.

The case was then heard upon the merits.

The defenders argued ;—(1) The pursuers being merely tenants of the lands through which the stream flowed had no title unless they could shew that the defenders were committing a nuisance. The right of a tenant to insist on the purity of a stream through his lands was less extensive than that of a proprietor. The pursuers could not give him a title to sue on the ground of pollution merely. The pollution complained of was caused by sewage coming from the houses of which the defenders were the landlords, and was attributable to the act, not of the defenders, but of their tenants. A landlord is not responsible ex dominio for the act of his tenant, but only if the lease authorised the act complained of,² or where it was incumbent on the landlord to provide against the act, and he negligently failed to do so.³ In the present case the defenders had provided a means of disposing of the sewage, viz., earth closets, and having done this their responsibility was at an end. The pollution was a nuisance, the result of improper use of the open drain on the part of the tenants, which the defenders could not be expected to anticipate for which they could not be held liable. [The LORD PRESIDENT referred to the cases of Rich v. Basterfield,⁴ and Harris v. Jarvis,⁵ and the case of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co.,⁶ relating to the pursuers, the question of the landlord's liability for the nuisance of a tenant was not raised on the pleadings. Further, it was an action for interdict only, whereas in the present case there was a claim for damages as well. A landlord might be liable to interdict, but it did not follow that he would be liable in a claim of damages.⁷ The pursuers were not entitled to a decree against the defenders jointly and severally for the whole amount of the damage suffered, as there were other persons who had contributed to the pollution, and their names had not been made parties to the action. Although in an action for interdict it might be competent to select certain of the wrongdoers and sue them separately, damages could not be obtained unless the whole of the persons responsible therefor were convened in the action. Further, the pursuers were not entitled to recover from each defendant more than the share of the damage caused by the pollution for which he was responsible.⁸ The case of *Smith v. O'Reilly*⁹ cited by the pursuers was distinguishable in respect that it was an action for damages for a delict committed by a number of persons acting in concert, and each of the delinquents was properly held liable for the whole.

¹ Armitstead v. Bowerman, July 3, 1888, 15 R. 814.

² Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, Dec. 21, 1866, 5 Macph. 214, 15 S. 853, at p. 871, aff. July 3, 1867, 15 S. 853, at p. 871, aff. July 3, 1867, 15 S. 853, at p. 871, aff. July 3, 1867, 15 S. 853, at p. 871.

³ Weston v. Incorporation of Tailors of Potterrow, July 10, 1876, 1218; Devlin v. Jeffray's Trustees, Nov. 19, 1902, 5 F. 180.

⁴ 1847, 16 L. J., C. P. 273, 4 C. B. 783.

⁵ 1876, 45 L. J., Q. B. 545.

⁶ June 14, 1876, 3 R. 839.

⁷ Hamilton v. Dunn, 15 S. at p. 872.

⁸ Duke of Atholl v. Dalgleish, June 20, 1822, 1 S. 511; Bell v. Bell, 550; Stair, i. 9, 5.

⁹ Feb. 13, 1800, Hume's Dec. 605.

damage done.¹ (4) In any event, interdict should not be pronounced de plano. The defenders should have an opportunity of submitting a scheme.

Dec. 20, 1907.
Fleming v.
Gemmill.

The pursuers argued;—(1) The rights of a tenant were determined by the terms of his lease, and included an assignation in his favour of all the rights of the proprietor in so far as these were necessary for the proper enjoyment of the subjects. In a case, such as the present, of a lease of lands for agricultural purposes, the tenant had every interest to maintain the purity of the stream where his cattle were watered, and had the same title as the proprietor to raise an action on the ground of pollution. The actings of the defenders were directly prejudicial to the object for which the pursuers had entered into the lease, and they were entitled, as in right of the proprietor, to take every measure which would have been competent to him for the protection of their interests. The position of a tenant was explained in the case of Collins v. Hamilton.² (2) The present case was not distinguishable from Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co.,³ where in almost identical circumstances the landlord had been held responsible for acts of pollution committed by his tenants. It was to be expected that tenants of the class which occupied these cottages would make an improper use of the open drain, and the defenders were to blame for not anticipating this and providing against it. It was not suggested that the defenders were liable ex dominio, but, on the other hand, it was not seriously disputed that a landlord was liable for the act of his tenant, if it was his duty to prevent it, and he negligently failed to do so. It was the duty of a landlord to provide an efficient system of drainage, and it was not enough for him to provide a system which would be efficient if properly used, where improper use might reasonably be expected. (3) The pursuers were within their rights in selecting such of the persons causing the pollution as they desired to sue, and, in any event, the plea of "All parties not called" had not been stated. It was impossible for the pursuers to prove the amount of damage done by each individual defender. Each of the defenders was responsible for a material contribution to the pollution, and the pursuers were accordingly entitled to a joint and several decree against all the defenders for the whole amount of the damage.⁴

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case questions have been raised both of fact and law. The case is a long one, and there is a great deal of evidence which I do not propose to analyse, because upon the result of it I come to the same conclusion as the Judge of first instance. I think it is proved that this stream is polluted, and that there is a material contribution from each of the three defenders Gemmill, Barr, and Surgeoner. But I propose to say a word or two upon the questions of law that were raised in a very anxious and good argument at the bar. First, the defenders raised the question of the title of the pursuers. They said that even admitting that there was pollution which rendered the stream less pure than it was before,

¹ Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co., Limited, June 5, 1894, 21 R. (H. L.) 39, per Lord Watson, at p. 44.

² April 19, 1837, 15 S. 895.

³ 3 R. 839.

⁴ Smith v. O'Reilly, Hume's Dec. 605.

Dec. 20, 1907. and of which a proprietor could have complained, the right of a Fleming v. somewhat less; that a tenant could not complain of the mere Gemmill. of the quality of the water, but must raise the question to Ld. President. equivalent to nuisance; and that the pursuers' case has fallen proof which was necessary for that. I do not think there is any in the quality of the title, if I may use such an expression, of the and of the tenant in this matter. It seems to me that the tenant assignee of the landlord's title, by the mere force of the lease extent that it is necessary to give it to him for his protection in and inasmuch as the subjects let include a stream, one of the of which is to water cattle at it, it seems to me that the tenant right which the landlord had to maintain the purity of the other words, he is the assignee of the landlord's title in so far as sary for his own protection in the subjects let.

The second point is this: Those persons who are attacked—the the defenders—are landlords but not occupiers. They are pro-different blocks of houses from which the pollution comes; and strenuously argued that they were not liable because the wrong there was, had been done by the action of their tenants and not by action. In other words, that the filth which found its way into was not anything for which they were directly responsible. In it was pointed out that they had taken proper precautions in out of their houses to arrange that filthy matter should not stream, by the establishment of dry closets which, of course, have communicating with the stream. The state of facts, however, is there were these dry closets, there was also a liquid system which access was got by open syvers and jawboxes in front of cottages. This liquid system was run through a sort of cesspool was irrigated upon the land which was upon the banks of Now, upon this matter also there is a good deal of authority, a culty in each case, I think, is to settle into which of the two cases case is to fall. I take cases as representing the extremity, so one side and on the other. As the one extreme I take the position Melville in the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan.¹ At extreme I take the case of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & in Lord Melville's case the species facti was this: Lord Melville, of Melville Castle, joined along with the Duke of Buccleuch, was proprietor of Dalkeith Palace, and Sir James Drummond, the p Hawthornden, in order to object to the pollution of the Esk by manufacturers. Lord Melville himself had a property which mill. Against Lord Melville it was urged that he could not ob he himself—if there was pollution from the mill—was the author respect that he was the proprietor. Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis that that depended on the terms of the lease, and that if Lord not by the terms of his lease in any way shewn that he gave right to pollute, then the pollution was their act, and not his case, on the other hand, of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. B

¹ Feb. 23, 1866, 4 Macph. 475.

was a case where the Caledonian Railway Company, who had private rights in a canal, objected to the pollution of the water by the inhabitants of a mining village which belonged to Messrs Baird. The Messrs Baird had, as here, made provision for a system of dry closets, but none the less the pollution found its way into the canal, and the Court held that the Messrs Baird could be interdicted because they were responsible for what was happening. It is true that in that case the Messrs Baird seemed to have assumed responsibility for what their tenants were doing, and further, that these miners were tenants at will—that is to say, their tenancy depended upon their being employed, and they were all on terms of contract which permitted of their being turned out on the shortest notice. But none the less in that case the law was pretty clearly laid down that if a landlord erects his premises in such a way that what may be called the natural result will be pollution, he will be liable, although in one sense he is not the person who personally contributes to the pollution. The truth is, it would be a very unfortunate result if it were otherwise, because if you had, in one sense, to catch the actual offenders, you would have to proceed to interdict every man, woman, and child living in the place. On the other hand, it is quite clear that where the pollution is due to the ultraneous act of the tenant and is not a thing which the landlord could foresee, then the landlord cannot be liable. In the case of *Baird*¹ that very point was put by Lord Gifford, who observed that the landlord could not have been held answerable if the miner had run out of his cottage at night with refuse and thrown it into the stream.

When I come to apply the law to the facts in this case, the view I take of it is this: Although no doubt there was this provision of earth closets, there still was an opus manufactum, namely, the drain, by which impurities put in at the syvers and jawboxes would sooner or later find their way to the stream; and it would be childish not to suppose, from the known habits of such persons as the tenants of these cottages, that pollution would ensue. It is clear that, apart from the grosser form of sewage, there are many forms of sewage which certainly cause pollution, and which may find their way into the stream by means of a drain which is open as a receptacle for any slops that may be put into it. Therefore, as this opus manufactum exists, I think the landlord must be responsible for what happens in consequence of it.

Then there comes the question of what is to be done. The tenant, I think, is entitled to interdict, but, on the other hand, it has been your Lordships' invariable custom in cases of this sort never to grant interdict de plano as has been done in this case. Therefore, I think the defenders here ought to have an opportunity themselves of submitting some scheme which may remedy the pollution complained of.

But there is another question in this case—the question of damage. The tenants here sue for damage to their cows, which ensued in respect of the effect on their health of the pollution, and that damage is divided into three heads. Three cows, that is, two heifers and a cow, died; there was a deficiency in milk in the whole herd; and there was a deterioration in the

¹ 3 R. 839.

Dec. 20, 1907. value of the herd of cattle themselves. The learned Sheriff-sub-Fleming v. granted for these three matters sums of £35, £30, and £50.
 Gemmill. also a legal question was raised—namely, as to whether there was Ld. President, and several liability in respect of the pollution for such damage to me that there is. As soon as you find that there is a materition, then, I think, each person is, so to speak, versans in illi acts at the risk of being found jointly and severally liable along persons for the damage that may ensue.

But there remains the question of damage. (After review-evidence)—Upon the whole matter, I am for disallowing the decerning for the other two sums, and recalling the Sheriff's inter-far as it interdicts, in order that the defenders may have an of submitting a scheme to somebody to be named by the Court usual in these cases, before interdict should be pronounced against

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON concurred.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact the pursuers, who are tenants of the farm of South Netherburn, keep a stock of cattle on said farm and water their cattle from the Netherburn and from the Broomfield Burn, which flows into the Netherburn; (2) that all the defenders except James Gemmill, & Company, The United Collieries, Limited, and James Cooper, contributed to the pollution of the Netherburn with sewage;
 sewage; (3) that as the result of the pollution of the Netherburn, burn, which was the natural water supply of the pursuers' cattle, cattle, the milk supply of the pursuers' cows from May to August May was diminished and eight or ten of pursuers' cows were off in condition: Find in law in these circumstances that the defenders (other than the three above excepted) are liable for damages to the pursuers for the loss thus resulting from the pollution of the said burn: Assess the damages at £80: Decern and decern and ordain these defenders James Gemmill, James Barr Barr & Sons, and Charles Surgeoner, all conjunctively and severally to make payment to the pursuers of £80: Decern and and decern: Further, continue the cause that the defenders last ders last above mentioned may submit to the Court for the for the avoidance of pollution of said Netherburn: Decern the pursuers entitled to additional expenses since the pronouncing of said interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, modified in the quarters of the amount thereof as taxed: Remit," &c.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & M'LEAN, W.S.—

No. 52. ALEXANDER DAVIDSON AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).
 M'Lennan, K.C.—Murray—Hamilton.
 Nov. 29, 1907. ABRAHAM LOGAN, Defender (Reclaimant).—Sol.-Gen. Usher.
 Davidson v. Lord Kinross.
 Logan.

Lease—Construction—"Tenantable condition and repair"— Submission—Construction—Decree Arbitral—Reduction.—An on the part of a landlord to put buildings, fences, drains, &c., in mendment of a lease "in tenantable condition and repair" onerous than the obligation which lies upon a tenant at the end of a lease Nov. 29, 1907.

to leave these subjects in tenantable condition and repair.

The proprietor of a farm in his own occupation let the farm for a period of nineteen years, the tenant binding himself in the lease "to accept of the whole houses, buildings, drains, ditches, dykes, fences," &c., on the farm "when the same shall have been put into good order . . . as being in tenantable order and condition." The parties thereafter entered into a submission, which, on the narrative that the tenant had in the lease become "bound to accept the buildings and others . . . as in good tenantable condition and repair when the same had been put into good order," referred to arbitration, inter alia, the sum payable by the landlord to the tenant in respect of any of the drains, ditches, dykes, and fences not being "in tenantable condition and repair" as at the entry of the tenant. The arbiters awarded a sum which they reached on the principle of giving the amount which an outgoing tenant would have had to expend in putting the subjects into tenantable condition and repair.

Davidson v.
Logan.

In an action of reduction at the instance of the tenant against the landlord, held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall) (1) that the question referred to arbitration was the amount of the defender's obligation qua landlord, and not the amount for which an outgoing tenant would have been liable, and therefore (2) that the arbiters not having determined the question submitted to them, their award fell to be reduced.

Arbitration—Decree-Arbitral—Reduction—Award by arbiters and oversman conjointly.—The landlord of a farm and the incoming tenant entered into a submission by which they referred certain questions "to A and B, arbiters mutually chosen, and in the case of their differing in opinion, to an oversman to be named by the said arbiters before entering on the business of the submission."

An award was issued which bore to be the award of, and was signed by, the two arbiters and the oversman.

In an action of reduction by the tenant against the landlord, held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall, diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) (1) that ex facie the award was invalid in respect that it bore to be the award of a tribunal to which the parties had not agreed to submit their disputes; and (2) that it was incompetent by parole evidence to prove that the oversman had never acted, and that the award was the award of the arbiters only.

Hope v. Crookston Brothers, 17 R. 868, distinguished.

Process—Record—Ground of action not averred on record and disclosed to pursuer by the evidence for the defender at the proof.—The proprietor of a farm in his own occupation having let it on lease, the landlord and the tenant entered into a submission as to the amount payable by the landlord under an obligation to put the buildings in "tenantable condition and repair." The arbiters having issued an award, the tenant, being dissatisfied with the amount awarded, brought a reduction, setting forth various grounds of reduction. At the proof it appeared from the evidence of the arbiters that they had fixed the sum awarded on the principle of taking the landlord's obligation as the obligation of an outgoing tenant, and not as the obligation of a landlord. This was not averred either by the pursuer or by the defender, and was not, until the proof, known to the pursuer.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall) that the absence of any averment by the pursuer did not bar him from taking the objection that the arbiters had not determined the question submitted to them.

By lease, dated 1st and 5th February 1904, Abraham Logan, of Whitton, Roxburghshire, first party, let the lands and farm of Whitton to Alexander Davidson senior and Alexander Davidson junior, second parties, for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1904, with breaks in favour of either party at Whitsunday 1914 and Whitsunday 1919.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Ardwall.

Prior to the entry of Messrs Davidson Mr Logan had farmed

Nov. 29, 1907. Whitton himself. He consequently was in the position of going tenant as well as landlord.

Davidson v.
Logan.

The lease contained, inter alia, the following clauses:—“The second parties hereby bind and oblige themselves and their heirs and assigns to take over at a valuation to be made by two neutral persons, an oversman chosen and appointed as aftermentioned, the whole of the lands upon the said lands at their entry thereto, as also the waygoes, and the waygoes of the year 1904; the second parties also bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to take over at a valuation” a number of acres specified. “The second parties hereby agree to accept of the buildings, houses and buildings, with the water supply thereto, and the water connections thereof, roads, drains, ditches, dykes, and fences, and the said farm when the same have been put into good order, and the alterations and additions upon the steading made as arranged, and being in tenantable order and condition, and they bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to keep and maintain the same in the same tenantable order and condition during the currency of this lease, and at its expiry to leave them in the like order and condition.”

The clause of arbitration was in the following terms:—“The parties further provided that when any question shall arise under this lease, whether hereinbefore referred to arbitration or not, they shall submit the same into a submission to two neutral men of skill, mutually chosen by the parties, after having named an oversman, shall proceed to act upon the submission, and the award of the said arbiters upon any question embraced in such submission shall, if they agree, be final and binding on the parties; and in the event of said arbiters not agreeing, the matter, they shall have power to devolve such question upon the oversman for his award, and power is hereby conferred upon the said arbiters or oversman to pronounce interim or final award, as they or he shall see fit.”

In April 1904 the parties entered into a submission, which was, inter alia, as follows:—“Considering that by lease of the lands of Whitton entered into between us, dated 1st and 5th April 1904, we, the said second parties, become bound to take over the buildings, subjects and others therein mentioned at a valuation to be made by two neutral men of skill mutually chosen, who, before acting upon the submission to them, are thereby directed to appoint an oversman, to whom to devolve any such submission in the event of the said arbiters disagreeing in regard thereto, all as the said lease more fully bears: Further, considering that by said lease we, the said second parties, also became bound to accept the buildings and the water connections as therein mentioned on the farm as in good tenantable order, and repair when the same had been put into good order, and the alterations and additions upon the steading made by me, Abraham Logan as arranged, and that I am in course of making these alterations and additions, and that I have agreed to pay a sum (if any) as shall be fixed by said arbiters or oversman upon the said in respect of any buildings and others not being in good order, which sum we, the said second parties, have agreed to accept, and be full of all that we could ask in that respect. . . . Then the whole parties hereto, have submitted and referred, and do hereby submit and refer, to the amicable decision, final sentence, and award, as arbitral to be pronounced by John Watson, residing at Grangehall, in the county of Roxburgh, and John Brown, residing at Hundalee, in the county of Roxburgh, arbiters mutually chosen by the parties.”

in the case of their differing in opinion to an oversman to be named ^{Nov. 29, 1907.} by the said arbiters before entering on the business of this submission, to ascertain, fix, and determine, in the first place, the sums payable by us, the said Alexander Davidson senior and Alexander Davidson junior, to me, the said Abraham Logan for (First) the value of " a number of subjects, including the waygoing corn crop. " And, in the second place, the sums payable by me the said Abraham Logan to us the said Alexander Davidson senior and Alexander Davidson junior in respect of any of the houses and buildings with the water supply thereto, pipes, and connections thereof, roads, drains, ditches, dykes, and fences on the said farm not being in tenantable condition and repair all as at the entry thereto (Whitsunday 1904), of us the said second parties. With power to the said arbiters and oversman to take all manner of probation, and to make such remits to men of skill as they and he may find necessary in duly preparing themselves and himself for the performance of their and his duty as arbiters and oversman. . . . "

John Elliot, farmer, Meigle, was appointed oversman.

On 24th August 1904 there were issued two documents in the following terms :—

" Whitton Reference, 1904.—(No. 16 of process.)

" INTERIM AWARD.

" The arbiters and oversman in the reference between A. Logan, Esq., of Whitton, and Messrs Davidson, hereby request Messrs Davidson to pay to Mr Logan on or before the 31st day of August curt. the sum of £682, 17s. stg.

" This payment is intended to cover all claims between the parties, the one against the other, in respect of the matters stated below ; but the arbiters reserve power to rectify any error or omission which may be brought to their notice before the issuing of their final award.

" JOHN WATSON.

" Kelso, 24th August 1904.

" JOHN BROWN.

" All matters mentioned in the deed of submission except the corn crop."

" Amended Award.

" Whitton Reference, 1904.—(No. 17 of process.)

" INTERIM AWARD.

" The arbiters and oversman in the reference between A. Logan, Esq., of Whitton, and Messrs Davidson, hereby request Messrs Davidson to pay to Mr Logan on or before the 31st day of August curt. the sum of £674, 2s. 8d. stg.

" This payment is intended to cover all claims between the parties, the one against the other, in respect of the matters stated below ; but the arbiters reserve power to rectify any error or omission which may be brought to their notice before the issuing of their final award.

" JOHN WATSON.

" JOHN BROWN.

" Kelso, 24th August 1904.

" JOHN ELLIOT.

" All matters mentioned in the deed of submission except the corn crop."

On 10th February 1905 a further document in the following terms was issued :—

" Whitton Waygoing, 1904.—(No. 18 of process.)

" The arbiters and oversman in the reference relative to the above hereby direct Messrs Davidson to pay to Mr Logan on or before the

Nov. 29, 1907. 17th day of February curt. the sum of £450 stg. to account of corn crop of JOHN BROWN, Arb
 Davidson v. " Kelso, 10th February 1905. JOHN ELLIOT, Over
 Logan.

On 24th February 1905 Messrs Davidson raised an action ing for reduction of the three documents above quoted as Logan, the two arbiters, the oversman, and Robert Dodds merchant, Kelso, to whom (according to the pursuer's averment) arbiters had illegally delegated their duties.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia (certain of the pleas being by amendment on 25th October 1906);—1. The whole proceedings in the said arbitration, and separatim, the said pretended awards, are null and void, and the pursuers are entitled to reduction as craved, with expenses, in respect that—(1) The in issuing said awards, acted ultra vires and in an improper manner; (2) the said arbiters incompetently delegated their to the defender Robert Dodds; (3) the said arbiters and Robert Dodds, for whom they are responsible, have been guilty of corruption in the sense of the Act of Regulations, 1695; (4) the awards complained of are not the awards of the tribunal constituted by the parties submitters (i.e., the two arbiters, and, in addition, only of their devolving the reference, the oversman), but are awards of the arbiters, or one of them, incompetently acting with the alleged oversman; (5) the arbiters did not accept the writing; (6) the alleged oversman was not appointed in writing separatim, was not appointed before the arbiters entered on the business of the reference; (7) the alleged oversman did not accept in writing; (8) there was no devolution to the alleged oversman;
 (9) the awards complained of are neither holograph nor testamentary.
 The acceptance of office by the defenders nominated as arbiters, appointment of the alleged oversman, the acceptance of office by him, and the devolution of the reference on him, can be constituted by probative writs, or, in any view, only by writings subscribed by the said parties respectively.

The defender Logan lodged defences, in which he pleaded, inter alia alia (certain of his pleas being also added by way of amendment);—
 2. The action should be dismissed in respect that—(1) The proceedings having been conducted informally in accordance with a recognised practice in the district, of which the pursuers were well aware, it was unnecessary to observe the formalities founded on by the pursuers the grounds of reduction; (2) the arbiters have not acted improperly or incompetently, nor have they been guilty of corruption; (3) the arbiters did not delegate their functions to the said Robert Dodds, and, in any event, the said Robert Dodds did not act improperly;
 (4) the said awards are not invalidated by being signed by John Elliot along with the arbiters, or one of them; (5) the said awards are not invalid, although neither holograph nor testamentary.
 The pursuers are barred by their actings from challenging the validity of the appointment and acceptance of the arbiters and oversman.
 The acceptance of office of the arbiters, and the appointment of acceptance of the oversman, can be constituted otherwise than by probative writ, or by writings of the parties themselves.

On 11th May 1905 the following further document was introduced:

" Whitton Reference, 1904.—(No. 21 of process.)

" AWARD No. 3.

" The arbiters and oversman in the reference between Mr and Messrs Davidson hereby find that the value of the corn crop Nov. 29, 1907. (exclusive of the straw), after deducting allowance for manufacturing, &c., is £736, 18s. 3d. stg., said sum, less £450 paid to account in Davidson v. Logan. February last under an interim award, being due and payable on 15th May current.

"The arbiters and oversman further find that the expenses of the reference to this date, including tradesmen's and measurers' fees, &c., amount to the sum of £65 stg., whereof one-half, £32, 10s., to be paid by each party, to Mr C. Dodds, Kelso, for distribution.

"JOHN WATSON.

"JOHN BROWN.

"JOHN ELLIOT."

"St Boswells, 11th May 1905.

The pursuers did not seek for reduction of this document.

On 5th September 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) granted decree of reduction.*

* "OPINION.—There are various grounds of reduction set forth in this action. One is that the oversman interposed in the reference, consulted with the arbiters, and in some cases signed the awards without there ever having been a difference of opinion between the arbiters and a devolution following thereon, and it is admitted that this was the case. I am of opinion that this is fatal to the awards under reduction. Undoubtedly, in mere cases of ordinary agricultural valuations such procedure is common, and might not invalidate an ordinary valuation under a lease. I may refer to a case of Nivison v. Howat, 11 R. 191, and I was also referred to a case decided upon similar principles, Hope v. Crookston Brothers, 17 R. 868. There, however, the matter turned upon the terms of the contract between the parties which stated that 'any dispute under this contract was to be settled by arbitration here in the usual way,' and it was held that this entitled the arbiters and oversman to follow the custom of Liverpool in valuing the goods in question. But I cannot regard the present as a mere valuation. It is a submission constituted by a formal deed outwith the lease altogether, although arising out of it, and therefore the terms of that submission must be looked to. Now, that submission bears that the reference is to John Watson and John Brown, 'arbiters mutually chosen, and in the case of their differing in opinion to an oversman to be named by the said arbiters before entering on the business of this submission,' and the subjects of the submission involve a very wide range, including the sums necessary to put the houses, fences, drains, and everything else on the farm in tenantable condition and repair. It was accordingly a very different affair from a valuation concerned only with a corn crop and dung, and I think it must be presumed to have been the intention of the parties that matters should be gone about regularly and solemnly; that the arbiters should endeavour to come to an agreement, and that only in the event of their differing should there be a devolution on the oversman. I accordingly think that the law laid down in Lang v. Brown, 2 Macq. 93, applies, and that the procedure in this submission and the issuing of the awards thereunder is inept, because the procedure was not in accordance with the contract of the parties, in respect that the arbiters did not apply their minds to the matter in the first place, and that the oversman interfered without any difference of opinion between the arbiters, or any proper devolution. I consider this case is practically on all-fours with the case of Frederick v. Mailland & Cunningham, 3 Macph. 1069. I notice Mr Elliot, the oversman, signs the interim amended award, dated 24th August 1904, No. 17 of process, and also the award entitled No. 3, No. 21 of process. It is, in my opinion, clear that these awards are bad, and as it is apparently admitted by the defenders that Mr Elliot intervened all through the reference, I think the other awards must be reduced also. . . ."

Nov. 29, 1907. The defender reclaimed.

Davidson v.
Logan.

On 25th May 1906 the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary locutor, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a pro answer.

A proof was thereafter allowed and led. The import of the proof sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary pronounced on 27th January 1907, when his Lordship pronounced an interlocutor granting decree of reduction.*

* "OPINION.—The following facts are, in my opinion, established by the proof which has been taken :—

"The pursuers are the incoming tenants of the farm of Whitton under the lease No. 7 of process. The defender Logan is landlord of the farm, but for several years back it has been in his own occupation. He is accordingly the outgoing tenant as well as the landlord at the pursuers' entry.

"The arbiters, after they had received the deed of submission in April 1904, to inspect and value the dung and fallow ground of Whitton. In this inspection they were accompanied by the oversman. They also made a very general inspection of the fences and drains, which apparently convinced them that both fences and drains were in need of repairs. At or before this inspection both the arbiters and the oversman had made up their minds that what they had to value was the houses and buildings, drains, ditches, dykes, and fences, and the amount which would be required to put them in such tenantable order and repair as an outgoing tenant would have been required to do in connection with the landlord or incoming tenant. Having taken this into consideration, they remitted to a Mr Dodds as a man of skill, and who, it is accustomed to act in such matters between outgoing and incoming tenants, to estimate what sum would be required to put the fences, drains, ditches, and dykes in order. I shall not further allude to the other subjects which were put in order, as the present dispute really arises as to fences, drains, ditches. The arbiters and oversman paid a second visit to the farm in April 1904, and again for the purpose of valuing the corn crop in August. By this time Mr Dodds had made his report, bringing out a sum of £100 for fences and drains which, in my opinion, is proved to be totally insufficient to put these subjects in tenantable order and repair in the sense in which a landlord is bound to put farm subjects at the commencement of a lease, which possibly was sufficient to put them in such tenantable order and repair as would have satisfied the obligations of an outgoing tenant at the end of a lease, and would, as Mr Dodds himself said, have kept the farm in order for a year.

"The senior pursuer on the occasion of the visit of the arbiters and oversman in the autumn of 1904 made a complaint about the sum, and on that occasion said, as he subsequently said in his evidence, to Mr Dodds, that he would give £100 in addition to the sum found by Mr Dodds if they or Mr Dodds would put the subjects in tenantable order and repair for that, and he asked them to look over the fences and drains again. Mr Brown, who was the arbiter nominated by the pursuers, put the matter up at a meeting that he and the other arbiter and the oversman had subsequently to this date, and suggested that the matter might be put into again. It appears, however, that he did not press the matter strongly, and did not support it by very sufficient reasons, and the other arbiter, declining to reopen the matter, he did not press the proposal to the extent of asking a devolution on the oversman, and no further was done. This was not surprising, on the footing that the pursuers all agreed, as they frankly admit, that all that was to be awarded was such as would have satisfied the obligation of an outgoing tenant.

The defender Logan reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The first question was Nov. 29, 1907.
 —Had the arbiters considered and determined the matter submitted to them in relation to the repair of the fences, drains, and ditches. The defender did not dispute that the authorities cited by the Lord Ordinary¹ bore out the proposition that that question was a question for the Court to determine. The question depended on the construction of the second operative clause in the submission—that was to say, on the meaning of the words “tenantable condition and repair.” These words had a well-recognised meaning, namely, the condition of repair in which an outgoing tenant was bound to leave such subjects. Probably the words in the narrative of the submission, and in the lease, “good order” imported a higher obligation of repair—namely, the obligation of a landlord to an incoming tenant, but it was incompetent to construe the operative clause of a deed by reference to the narrative or to another deed, unless the operative clause was ambiguous,²

Davidson v.
Logan.

Dodds himself says that he made the valuation upon that footing. The only notice that I can find given on record to the effect that the defender Logan and the arbiters and oversman and Mr Dodds treated this matter as a question between an outgoing and an incoming tenant occurs in Answer 8 to the defender's statement, where it is said that it is a recognised practice in a submission between ‘outgoing and incoming tenants’ to dispense with acceptances. Now, the submission under consideration was undoubtedly, so far as regards dung, fallow, and corn crop, one between outgoing and incoming tenants, but, in my opinion, it was also one between landlord and incoming tenant. With regard to the actings of the oversman in the submission, it is proved by Mr Elliot's own evidence that while, in accordance with the custom in such matters, he accompanied the arbiters on their various inspections, there was never any devolution of any kind whatever upon him, and he never applied his mind to the amount awarded, because the arbiters had agreed upon that amount, and he states that he signed the interim awards, Nos. 17 and 21 of process, in accordance with the general practice that an oversman signs such interim awards, to shew that he had taken part in the inspections, had acted in the reference, and was thus entitled to the ordinary remuneration. He only justifies his signing the award No. 18 of process along with one of the arbiters by saying that it was the unusual case of one of the arbiters being absent in South Africa, and that he signed it just as he would have done if both arbiters had signed it.

“With regard to the alleged custom in the counties of Roxburgh and Berwick set forth for the defenders, it is not, in my opinion, proved that it is a recognised practice to dispense with written acceptances by the arbiters and oversman, though it has been proved that in frequent instances that has been done without objection being taken afterwards; nor is it proved that there is a practice of dispensing with a written appointment of the oversman. This, however, is not, in my opinion, of much importance, as I think that the parties, by acquiescing in the arbiters acting without written acceptances, are barred from reducing the submission on the ground that such acceptances did not exist, while with regard to the oversman, as it now appears that he never gave any decision as oversman or applied his mind to the subject, the manner of his appointment does not necessarily enter into the decision of the case. It ought, however, to be

¹ Mackay & Son v. Leven Police Commissioners, July 20, 1893, 20 R. 1093; Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Nov. 27, 1890, 18 R. (H. L.) 1; Alexander v. Bridge of Allan Water Co., Feb. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 492.

² Orr v. Mitchell, March 20, 1893, 20 R. (H. L.) 27.

Nov. 29, 1907. which here it was not. That being the meaning of the operative Davidson v. Logan. the arbiters had determined the matter submitted to them, and not a good objection to their determination that it was wrong awarding too little.¹ Even if the submission meant that the were to be such as a landlord would be obliged to make at law as in a question with an incoming tenant, that did not the Lord Ordinary appeared to think, such repairs as would subjects last to the end of the lease, but merely such repairs put them in a reasonable condition of repair,² and the arbiters the final judges on a question as to what was reasonable. The pursuers' case really came to this, that the arbiters had awarded too little. Further, this whole question was not properly before the Court, because the pursuers did not raise it upon record. The circumstance that the awards bore to be the awards of the court as well as of the arbiters did not make them invalid. This was observed at this stage that it is amply proved by the witnesses on both sides that the arbiters and oversman acted perfectly rightly in proceeding together to make the inspections. This practice is universal. The valuation of such things as dung, fallow land, and corn crop must be made when these subjects are in existence, and therefore the oversman's valuation of them cannot be put off till the close of the reference. When fallow land would have been broken up, the dung used up, and the crop ingathered, thrashed, and possibly sold, and it seems to be that there should be two inspections, one by the oversman and one by the arbiters; further, the system of inspecting the subjects provides for a convenient devolution on any point to the oversman that become necessary. This practice is similar to the familiar practice of arbiters under the Lands Clauses Act, under which practice the arbiters agree, before there has been any devolution, to the oversman to value the subjects to be valued, and being present at the proof along with the arbiters, thus saving the parties the needless expense of a double inspection and proof.

"The first ground on which at the close of the proof counsel for the pursuers maintained that they were entitled to reduction, was that the arbiters had acted ultra vires and in an incompetent manner, in that they never applied their minds to the valuation of the subjects, the valuation of which was submitted to them. He maintained that in their submission the sum that they were to fix and determine was the sum which would be sufficient to put the houses, buildings, drains, fences, and others on the farm 'in good tenantable condition and repair,' as required by the condition between a landlord and an incoming tenant on a nineteen years' lease, whereas the sum which the arbiters had fixed was only the sum which would have satisfied the obligation of an outgoing tenant at the close of the nineteen years' lease to leave the subjects in 'tenantable condition and repair.' I have felt some difficulty in entering on a consideration of this ground of reduction, because while there is on record a plea which is sufficient to cover it, yet the averments in the condescendence exactly meet the case now made upon the proof. But I do not think

¹ Holmes Oil Co., Limited, v. Pumpherston Oil Co., Limited, 1891, 18 R. (H. L.) 52; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Turcan, Feb. 25 R. (H. L.) 7; Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co. v. Glasgow City and District Railway Co., July 16, 1895, 22 R. 912; Glasgow City and District Railway Co. v. George, Cowan, & Galloway, Jan. 25, 1886, 13 R. 609.

² Haining & Douglas v. Grierson, Feb. 18, 1807, Hume's Dec. 850; Moesman v. Brocket, May 19, 1810, Hume's Dec. 850; Ersk. Inst. 39; Bankt. ii., 9, 21.

formal arbitration, but a mere valuation, to which the rules of formal arbitration did not apply.¹ The parties had got the decision of the tribunal they stipulated for, namely, that of the two arbiters, for it was clear on the proof that the awards were the awards of the arbiters only, as it was immaterial that the oversman, in accordance with the custom of the locality, adhibited his signature to shew that he was present.

Davidson v.
Logan.

Argued for the pursuers;—1. An obligation to put subjects into "tenantable condition and repair" meant one or other of two quite different things, namely, either (1) such an obligation as in a question between a landlord and an incoming tenant, or (2) such an obligation as in a question between an outgoing tenant and a landlord. The former was very much the more onerous. That was settled law;² and besides it was proved to be in accordance with the custom of the locality, which it was legitimate to take into account.³ The operative clause this objection should be stringently enforced against the pursuers, for they had no proper notice on record or otherwise that the arbiters and the reporter, Mr Dodds, in arriving at the sum they did were proceeding on the footing that the defender Logan was, as regards the whole submission, merely to be treated as an outgoing tenant. The pursuers all along thought, as, in my opinion, they were entitled to think, that what the arbiters endeavoured to do, and ought to have done, was to ascertain the sum that would have been payable by a landlord to an incoming tenant, and in this belief their record is framed on the footing that the inspections and valuations made were insufficient and inadequate to enable the reporter or arbiters to arrive at a proper conclusion on the subject, and this, I think, they have succeeded in establishing. But when they were met at the proof, for the first time as far as I can see, with the answer to their complaint that this was merely a valuation of repairs as between an outgoing and incoming tenant, I think they are entitled to take up the ground in law which they might have taken up without a proof at all had they known of it, that the arbiters had not valued the subject submitted to them. I shall therefore proceed to consider the question.

"It is, I think, established by the proof that the words 'tenantable condition and repair,' according to the custom of the country and the understanding both of landlords and tenants, represent two totally different things, according as they are used with reference to the obligations of a landlord to an incoming tenant at the commencement of a nineteen years' lease, and the obligations of an outgoing tenant to the landlord or an incoming tenant at the close of a lease. It is, I think, obvious in point of fact that this must be so. An outgoing tenant is not liable for tear and wear. The houses and fences may have been old when he entered the farm, and with the effects of tear and wear during the years of his tenancy may have got into such a state as to need renewal in whole or in part instead of mere repair in order to render them in tenantable order and condition as at the commencement of a new lease, but it would be manifestly unfair to an outgoing tenant to require him either to rebuild houses in whole or in part, or, for instance, to put new sarking on offices where the wood had become so old that slates could not be securely nailed on to it, or that he should be bound to renew stob and wire fences where

¹ Nivison v. Howat, Nov. 22, 1883, 11 R. 182; Hope v. Crookston Brothers, June 6, 1890, 17 R. 868.

² Johnston v. Hughan, May 22, 1894, 21 R. 777; Bell's Prin. secs. 1253, 1254; Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 238; Rankine on Leases, p. 232.

³ Wigglesworth v. Dallison, Smith's Leading Cases, p. 545; Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, vol. ii. p. 239.

Nov. 29, 1907.

Davidson v.
Logan.

of the submission, therefore, in using the expression "condition and repair" was ambiguous, and consequently was construed by reference to the narrative clause and to the submission. So construed the expression "tenantable condition and repair" plainly meant tenantable condition and repair as in a question between landlord and incoming tenant. The arbiters, however, had construed it as meaning tenantable condition and repair as in a question between outgoing tenant and landlord. That was proved by the evidence before the arbiters, which was competent evidence.¹ The arbiters' award, not having decided the question submitted to them, their award was invalid. The pursuers had not any means of knowing of the existence of this ground of objection to the awards until it was brought out at the proof; they were entitled therefore to take the awards notwithstanding although it was not set forth on record.² 2. The awards were valid on the further ground that they were not merely signed by these were in such a state that no amount of patching would make good tenantable fences; and accordingly all that an outgoing tenant is bound to do is to put the houses and fences in such order as to last as long as time they can serve their purposes, as Mr Dodds, the valuator, said, for, say, a year. The obligation on a landlord at the beginning of a nineteen years' lease is in fact and according to custom of a very different character. He must put the farm into such a condition as to be serviceable without serious repairs till the end of the lease, and in some descriptions of fences cannot be expected to last nineteen years; the fences must be such as to last well into the lease, and not require a new tenant making extensive repairs on them from the day he enters the farm. All this, I think, is established by the evidence, but it is a matter of fact, but by reason of inveterate custom has become law. Mr Bell in his Principles (paragraph 1253) says:—"From the nature of the contract, warrandice is implied on the landlord's part to put the subject effectual to the tenant or fit for its purpose, and so to put the houses and fences in due repair," and this is supported by a number of decisions, whereas, with regard to the tenant's obligations (see Principles, 1254), it does not extend to natural decay which results from the lapse of time and is known under the common expression 'tear and wear,' nor yet essential defect of structure necessitating such thorough renewal as to amount to extraordinary expenditure. The distinction is in fact and in law between these two obligations is increased in the case of old buildings or old fences, because when either buildings or fences are very old, nothing but extraordinary expenditure, often amounting to the cost of replacement, would put them in the proper order and condition, and applying this to the present case, it is clear that the fences other than the stone dykes were for the most part dilapidated, so as in some cases practically to require renewal. The distinction, accordingly, between the sum which would have enabled a tenant to fulfil his obligation and the sum that would be required for renewal, is an express or implied condition on the landlord to put the fences in proper order and condition is proved in the present case to be very different. According to Mr Dodds' valuation, No. 42 of process, which has been adopted by the arbiters, the amount allowed for putting the fences and dykes in tenantable order is £37, 0s. 7d., and for drains is £21, 16s. 2d., whereas according to the report of the witnesses man—per se perhaps that might not have been fatal—but were in terminis the awards of the oversman as well as of the arbiters. Such an award was entirely incompetent. What the parties agreed to was an award either by the arbiters or, if they differed, by the oversman, but they did not agree to an award by the arbiters and the oversman combined. It was said that the oversman had never acted, and that the award was the award of the arbiters only. De facto that might be so, but it was incompetent by parole evidence to contradict the terms of the award.¹

¹ In re Dare Valley Railway Co., 1868, L. R., 6 Eq. 429; Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1872, L. R., 5 App. 418.

² Bile Beans Manufacturing Co., July 20, 1906, 8 F. 1181.

Davidson v.
Logan.

At advising.—

LORD LOW.—The Lord Ordinary has reduced the awards of the arbiters which are challenged in this case upon two grounds—first, that they did not determine the question which was submitted to them, but dealt with

Johnston and John Rutherford, No. 50 of process, the amount that would be necessary to fulfil the landlord's obligation to put the fences and drains in tenantable order and repair is, for fences and dykes, £311, 12s., and for drains and ditches, £123, 9s. 1d. This report and estimate was carefully prepared by these witnesses, and it is approved of as moderate by so skilled and reliable a witness as Mr James Inglis Davidson of Saughton Mains, and by other witnesses. It was strongly argued for the defenders that all that the arbiters were directed to do was 'to ascertain, fix, and determine the sums payable by the defender Logan to the pursuers in respect of the houses, buildings, with the water supply thereto, pipes and connections thereof, roads, drains, ditches, dykes, and fences on the said farm not being in tenantable condition and repair,' and that they were entitled to follow what method they pleased in ascertaining and determining that amount. If they made a mistake and took a wrong method, that would not, it was argued, invalidate the award, provided they did not act corruptly. I am unable to accede to this argument, because, for the reasons above stated, I think that what the arbiters were bound to do was to ascertain the sum sufficient to fulfil the landlord's obligation to put the subjects in 'good tenantable condition and repair' as at the commencement of a nineteen years' lease, whereas, it is admitted that what the arbiters did fix and determine was the sum which would have been sufficient for an outgoing tenant to pay at the end of his lease in order to put the subjects into such condition as that they would stand for a year or less. The arbiters and oversman admitted that they did not consider they were concerned with any part of the submission except the passage I have just quoted, but in my opinion they were bound to read the whole submission in a case where there were words in the operative clause which were capable of two different meanings, and if they had done so and applied the narrative to the construction of the operative clause in the same deed, they would not have fallen into the mistake which I consider they have. The narrative clause is in these terms :—'Further, considering that by said lease we, the said second parties, also became bound to accept the buildings and others as therein mentioned on the farm as in good tenantable condition and repair when the same had been put into good order, and the alterations and additions upon the steading made by me the said Abraham Logan as arranged, and that I am in course of executing these alterations and additions, and that I have agreed to pay such sum (if any) as shall be fixed by said arbiters or oversman as aforesaid in respect of any buildings and others not being in good order, which sum we, the said second parties, have agreed to accept as in full of all that we could ask in that respect.' It is noticeable from this ¹ Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R., 5 Eng. & Ir. App. 418; Millar & Son v. Oliver & Boyd, Nov. 10, 1903, 6 F. 77.

Nov. 29, 1907. another question ; and secondly, that the awards bear to be the Davidson v. the arbiters and oversman, and are signed by the oversman as Logan. arbiters, although the arbiters were agreed upon their award and Lord Low. was never devolved upon the oversman.

In regard to the first of these grounds of reduction I am of opinion as the Lord Ordinary. The submission arose in this lease executed in February 1904 the defender, Mr Logan, let Whitton in Roxburghshire, of which he is proprietor, to the pursuers period of nineteen years from Whitsunday 1904, with breaks in either party at Whitsunday 1914 and Whitsunday 1919. Mr Logan prior to the pursuers' entry, farmed Whitton himself, and he was both outgoing tenant and landlord. By the lease the pursuers bound selves to take over the dung upon the farm, the waygoing crop and certain plant, machinery, and house fittings, at a valuation, and narrative in the first place, that the phrase 'good tenantable condition repair' appears as being used in the new lease of nineteen years.

 said that the tenants were only to accept the buildings and contents in good tenantable condition and repair when the same had been put in order,' and it further proceeds to say that the defender Logan had to pay such sum as should be fixed by the arbiters or oversman in respect of any buildings or others not being in 'good order,' and it is that sum which the pursuers, it is stated, have agreed to accept in full, inasmuch they could ask in that respect. I think it plainly follows from this the pursuers did not agree to accept a sum such as would have been obligation on an outgoing tenant to put the drains and fences in condition and repair,' and that the arbiters, in awarding such sum, have fixed and determined the value of a totally different thing from which it was referred to them to value. They have valued the obligation on an outgoing tenant to a landlord, and not the obligation of a an incoming tenant on a nineteen years' lease in reference to the subjects in question in tenantable condition and repair. It is plain plain from the narrative clause that the tenantable condition mentioned mentioned in the operative clause was the same state of repair as was to and called by the name of 'good order' in the narrative clause.
 subject of a tenant's obligation to keep houses tenantable, I would refer the case of Mossman, 1810, Hume's Decisions, 850, where some of the remarks by the Lord President are reported. I am accordingly of opinion that the arbiters acted ultra vires and incompetently in respect to the not apply their minds to value the obligation which they were to value, but an obligation totally different not only in extent but in I accordingly think on these grounds that the award falls to be set aside.

"The case of Mackay, 20 R. 1093, was referred to as an authority for the proposition that it was for the Court, and not the arbiters, to the construction of a contract of submission unless that was reserved to the arbiters. The case of Alexander v. Bridge of Forth Company, 7 Macph. 492, was also referred to, and is, in my opinion, authority for the pursuers' contention in the present case, and that that decision was approved of by Lord Watson in the case of Great North of Scotland Railway, 18 R. (H. L.) 1, although the which the decision had been arrived at was disapproved of in the case was held not to be one of constructive corruption under the tions, although the judgment of the arbiters was bad, because it was the category laid down by Lord Watson to the effect that it was ground of reduction at the instance of either party to a submission able to shew independently of the regulations either that the agreed "to accept of the whole houses and buildings, with the water supply thereto, and pipes and connections thereof, roads, drains, ditches, dykes, and fences on the said farm, when the same have been put into good order and the alterations and additions upon the steading made as arranged, as being in tenantable order and condition."

In April 1904 a submission was prepared, apparently upon Mr Logan's instructions, whereby he and the pursuers submitted to the determination of two arbiters mutually chosen, and in case of their differing in opinion, to an oversman to be chosen by them, in the first place, the amount to be paid by the pursuers for the dung and other things which by the lease they were bound to take over at valuation, and in the second place, "the sums payable by me the said Abraham Logan to us the said Alexander Davidson senior and Alexander Davidson junior, in respect of any houses and buildings, with the water supply thereto, pipes and connections thereof, roads, exceeded what are called in Scotland the finis compromissi, or that in the course of the arbitration he has disregarded any one of the express conditions contained in the contract of submission, or any one of those important conditions which the law implies in every submission. I am of opinion in the present case that the arbiters went beyond their jurisdiction in considering what an outgoing tenant should pay as the value of repairs, and that they disregarded altogether the matter submitted to them, and thus failed to perform their proper duty under the submission, or to comply with the conditions thereof.

"The objections to the defects in the proceedings must now be considered. The first of these is that there was no written acceptance of office by the arbiters. I am of opinion that that objection cannot be sustained as a ground of reduction. The arbiters being duly named in the submission, their acting under the same implied acceptance, and the pursuers were unable to cite any authority for the proposition that it was necessary to the validity of a submission that the arbiters should accept in writing. The authorities, indeed, seem to be the other way. (Gardner v. Ewing, M. 659, and Brysson v. Mitchell, 2 Shaw, 382.) Even had an acceptance in writing been required by law, I should have been prepared to hold that the title of the arbiters to deal with the matter being contained in the submission, and they having acted thereunder, without objection by either party, both parties are barred by acquiescence in their so acting from calling their decision in question. I ought to add, however, that in my opinion it is in accordance with the proper practice in arbitrations that arbiters should accept the submission in writing, and I am glad to notice that that is the practice followed in the Border counties in regard to such submissions.

"The next objection is that there was neither a written nomination nor acceptance by the oversman. In view of the fact which has been established at the proof, namely, that none of the awards in question are judgments of the oversman, and that he never applied his mind to the matter as a judge, it is unnecessary for the purposes of the decision of this case to enter on the subject, but I think it right to say that in my opinion where there is a formal written submission, as here, the nomination of the oversman ought to be in writing, and that such nomination should be made before the work of the submission is entered upon. Without such written nomination the oversman has no title nor authority to act at all, and any actings of his without such nomination would be inept. I am also of opinion, following on the decision in the case of Frederick v. Maitland & Cunningham, 3 Macph. 1069, that to entitle an oversman to act there must be a written devolution of the reference upon him.

"Coming now to the documents under reduction, these documents, or have cost Mr Logan as outgoing tenant to put the subjects into tenantable condition and repair as at the termination of a lease, and it was argued for Mr Logan that they were right upon a sound construction of the submission in making their estimate upon that footing.

Nov. 29, 1907.
Davidson v.
Logan.

Lord Low.

Now, it seems to me not to be open to question that the obligation undertaken by Mr Logan in the lease to put the buildings and fences into good order was undertaken by him as landlord, and not as outgoing tenant, and I think that it is equally plain that the intention of the parties to the submission was that the arbiter should determine the amount of money required to fulfil that obligation.

The difference in phraseology between the narrative of the submission and the operative clause which formulated the question which the arbiters were to determine, was founded on by Mr Logan's counsel, who argued that the words in the latter clause—"tenantable condition and repair"—were invariably used to designate, and were recognised as meaning, the condition and state of repair in which an outgoing tenant was bound to leave buildings and fences at the termination of his lease, and were therefore not open to construction, and could not be modified or controlled in any way by reference to the narrative.

I am of opinion that that argument is not well founded. It is beyond dispute that the obligation which lies upon a landlord at common law to put buildings and fences at the commencement of a lease in tenantable condition and repair involves more and is more onerous than the obligation which lies upon the tenant to leave these subjects in like condition and repair at the end of the lease. To take one example out of many which might be given—If a fence were, at the beginning of a lease, worn out, so that it was no longer capable of being repaired, the landlord would be bound to renew it, but no such obligation would rest upon a tenant at the end of a lease, because he is not responsible for the effects of inevitable wear and tear, and is not bound to renew what, from that cause, has become worn out. It was therefore essential, in the present case, that the arbiters should know whether the obligation upon which they were to put a money value was the obligation of a landlord at the beginning of a lease or of an outgoing tenant at the end of a lease. I should have thought that no one could have read the submission without seeing that it was the landlord's which on the face of it professes to be a judgment of the arbiters and oversman as the persons who issued the judgment, and I think it is incompetent by parole proof to qualify or explain away the document in question by proving that de facto the oversman never acted, and that it is a judgment of the arbiters alone. To allow such proof would be to allow a proof by parole to set aside and qualify a written document. In my opinion the document must be taken as it is, and so taken, it seems to me to embody an absolutely incompetent judgment.

"Coming next to the document No. 18 of process, the same objection applies to it, and it has this additional defect, that one of the arbiters does not sign and the oversman does. This is precisely the kind of document that was considered in the case of Frederick, already alluded to, and there the award was held to be void. On these grounds, accordingly, apart altogether from the ground of ultra vires, I should have been prepared to hold that the pursuers were entitled to reduction of the documents Nos. 16, 17, and 18 of process."

Nov. 29, 1907. obligation which was in question, because the submission itself
 Davidson v. clause in the lease in regard to the condition of the buildings
 Logan. and the landlord states that he has agreed to pay such sum as Lord Low. shall fix in respect of any buildings and fences not being in the condition.

It was said that the use of the words "good order" in the narrative of the words "tenantable condition and repair" in the opening of the submission indicated that what was actually submitted to the arbiters was different from what was referred to in the narrative, or at all events the question submitted was more accurately expressed in the opening of the submission in either of which cases the latter clause must rule. I do not think there is any real inconsistency between the narrative and the opening of the clauses. In the first place, I am inclined to think that a landlord's obligation to put buildings and fences into "tenantable condition and repair" at the beginning of a lease is substantially equivalent to an obligation to put them into good order, because I cannot imagine such subjects being submitted to arbiters "tenantable condition and repair" when intended to serve the purpose of a lease for (say) nineteen years, unless they were in good order at the beginning of the lease. Even if that may be, the clause in the lease, which is recited in the submission, shews that in the present case the expression "tenantable condition and repair" was equivalent to "good order," because the tenants undertook themselves to accept the buildings and fences "when the same were put in good order," as being in tenantable condition and repair.

It therefore seems to me to be clear that what was referred to in the submission was to estimate the amount which would be required to implement the obligation undertaken by the landlord to put the buildings and fences in the condition stipulated by the lease at the beginning of the lease. Therefore, as the arbiters have frankly admitted that what they estimated was the amount which an outgoing tenant would require to expend in order to comply with his obligation to leave the subjects in tenantable condition and repair at the end of his lease, I am of opinion that the award cannot stand, because the arbiters have not determined the question submitted to them, but have decided the question altogether.

It was, however, argued for Mr Logan that the pursuers were not entitled to a decree of reduction upon that ground, because they have not pleaded it. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that that contention cannot be sustained. I can very well understand that it never occurred to the pursuers that the arbiters had entirely misapprehended the question submitted to them, and the defences do not disclose that what the arbiters dealt with was the obligation of the outgoing tenant. But the pleadings cannot prevent justice being done between the parties. Whenever the arbiters admitted that they had not dealt with the question referred to them, there was, in my judgment, an end of the case. The alleged defect in the pleadings could even now be put right by amendment of the record, but I do not think that in the circumstances amendment is necessary.

In regard to the second ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has set aside the awards to be liable to reduction, I have felt some difficulty in assent to the view that in agricultural arbitrations, where the question value of such things as a waygoing crop or the dung upon a farm, and where Nov. 29, 1907. the arbiters are chosen because their experience in such matters enables Davidson v. them, by inspecting the subjects, to fix the value, it is desirable that there Logan. . should be as few formalities as possible. Further, I think that in such Lord Low. arbitrations mere irregularities will not vitiate an award even if they are of a kind which would be fatal in other classes of submissions where the duties of the arbiters are more of a judicial character.

In this case the submission was not one purely for valuation, because the arbiters had to fix the amount which would be required to enable the landlord to implement his obligation to put the buildings and fences into good order. No doubt the arbiters might be expected to be able to determine by their own inspection what required to be done, but I think that the probability is that they would further require to call in the aid of tradesmen to advise them as to the cost of such repairs and renewals as they might deem to be necessary.

Still the submission was substantially one for valuation, and in such a case, if it appeared that the parties had obtained the honest opinion of the gentlemen selected upon the questions submitted to them, I should not regard mere irregularities of procedure as being sufficient to nullify the award.

In the present case there is only one matter which has occasioned me difficulty, and that is the fact that the awards under reduction bear to be the awards of "the arbiters and oversman." I have great difficulty in regarding that as a mere irregularity or informality. In the case of *Lang v. Brown*¹ Lord Chancellor Cranworth laid it down very emphatically that when an award is challenged the question always is whether it is one which the parties agreed should be binding on them. Now, in this case the parties agreed to abide by the award of the two arbiters mutually chosen, or in the case of their differing in opinion, of an oversman, but they never agreed to accept a joint award of the arbiters and the oversman. It therefore seems to me that the matter is one of substance, and not merely of form.

It is true that in this case the arbiters were agreed; and apparently the oversman (who quite properly had accompanied the arbiters when they inspected the subjects) was made a party to the award and signed it, simply to indicate that he approved of the conclusion at which the arbiters had arrived. But that that was the position of matters could not be discovered from the award itself. For anything that appears to the contrary in the award the arbiters might not have agreed, but might have called in the oversman to settle their differences and then issued an award jointly with him. If that had been what actually occurred, I think that there could be no doubt that the award would have been bad, and, in any view, I have difficulty in reconciling myself to the idea that a written award which bears to be a joint award can be proved by general evidence to be an award by the arbiters only, with in addition an irregular, ineffective, and unnecessary concurrence by the oversman.

The case of *Hope v. Crookston Brothers*² was founded on. In that case a joint award by the arbiters and the oversman was sustained. The parties,

¹ 2 Macq. 93.

² 17 R. 868.

Nov. 29, 1907. however, had agreed that any disputes in regard to a contract for sale and purchase of hay should be settled by arbitration in Liverpool in the usual way," and it was proved that the course which had been followed was according to the custom in Liverpool.

Davidson v.
Logan.

Lord Low.

If in the present case it had been proved to be the recognised custom in Roxburghshire, in agricultural arbitrations, where the oversman accompanied the arbiters when inspecting the subjects, for a joint award to be issued by the arbiters and oversman, the question would have been different, but although there is evidence that that course is sometimes followed, no such general custom is established.

I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary that the awards, bearing to be joint awards of arbiters and oversman, cannot be sustained.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur with Lord Low in the merits of judgment which he proposes. I think that not only is the obligation of a landlord at the commencement of a lease to put the buildings and fences on the farm into "tenantable condition and repair" (this course could be altered by express contract) equivalent to an obligation to put these into good order, but I think the lease itself in the present case makes it clear that this was the thing submitted to arbitration, the tenants bound themselves to accept the buildings and fences as in tenantable condition and repair only "when the same had been put into good order." And as this was (confessedly) not what the arbiters decided, that their awards, so far as challenged, cannot stand.

But I do not think that we can avoid, if only as affecting the expenses, the duty of forming and expressing some opinion on the grounds of reduction to which also the Lord Ordinary has given weight. It would have been enough, no doubt, for the pursuers to rely solely on the ground that the arbiters had mistaken the nature of the thing submitted. But they did not choose to do so. On the contrary, they chose to rely on every ground, good and bad, on which the awards could be attacked. On some of these points (I think on most of them) the Lord Ordinary has rejected them. In particular, he holds that the parties, by acquiescing in the awards, acting without written acceptances, are barred from reducing the awards on the ground that there were no written acceptances. He also expresses the opinion that the arbiters and oversman acted quite rightly in coming together to make the inspection, and he gives very good reasons why any other mode of procedure would be quite unworkable. Further, in view of the fact established at the proof that there never was any devolution on the oversman, nor any necessity for such devolution, for the simple reason that the arbiters were agreed, his Lordship really comes to the conclusion that the objection founded on there being no devolution in writing to the oversman signed the awards, had no substance in it. The Lord Ordinary no doubt states his opinion that wherever there is a formal submission the nomination of both arbiters and oversman ought to be insisted on. But that seems to me to be attaching far too much weight to matters of formality and procedure, at all events in rural arbitrations. In truly partake much more of the nature of valuations, between which and regular arbitrations our Courts have always drawn broad distinctions.

the case of *M'Gregor v. Stevenson*¹). Indeed, I claim the first part of the Nov. 29, 1907. Lord Ordinary's opinion as really negating the idea that these awards ought to be reduced on any ground except the substantial one on which Davidson v. Logan.

Lord Low has proceeded. Be that as it may, my own opinion is that there is no ground for reducing these awards on any of what may be called the IdStormonth-Darling.

technical grounds. It was because the Second Division, as constituted on 25th May 1906, thought that the Lord Ordinary had erred in accepting these technical objections as sufficient to justify reduction de plano that we recalled his Lordship's interlocutor and remitted to him to allow a proof before answer. The proof thus taken has, of course, been considerably lengthened by the pursuers insisting upon these formal objections and even adding to their number. In the result it seems to me to have been shewn that there was no substance in the technical grounds, although it has also been disclosed that there was a very real and sufficient ground for reducing some of the awards, because the arbiters had not applied their minds to the sum which was necessary to put the fences, &c., into good order.

I should therefore have been in favour of limiting our judgment to what I consider the true ground, and if your Lordships had agreed with me, of marking our sense of the pursuers' failure to establish their technical objections by modifying the expenses to which they are to be found entitled.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with both your Lordships that the so-called award in this case cannot stand. But upon the technical questions as to the procedure of the arbiters and oversman, which can only affect the question of expenses, I agree with the views expressed by Lord Low. I entirely assent to the general view that submissions such as this which relate to farming matters are not to be too strictly dealt with as regards procedure. But relaxation of rules of sound procedure must not be carried too far. Where only matters of detail are concerned mere technicalities may be held not sufficient ground for setting aside an award evidently fairly arrived at. But the difficulty in this case is that the irregularities which took place make it plain that the party complaining of the procedure did not get the benefit in the arbitration of what was stipulated for, viz., that in the event of the arbiters differing he was entitled to the decision of the oversman. He was entitled to know the fact whether the arbiters differed, and whether they referred the matter on that ground, and to consider whether he should ask the oversman to hear him or bring matters before him for consideration. Now, the case as it presents itself to us, indicates, if anything, that the award was an award made both by the arbiters and the oversman in conjunction, or in the form of one of the deliverances, an award by one arbiter and the oversman. Such awards presented to a party could give him no certainty as to what had been done—whether the arbiters had considered the case and had differed, and therefore had devolved the matter upon the oversman, or whether the oversman had never had any devolution made to him, but had proceeded without any such devolution to take part in disposing of the matters in dispute. It seems to me that the objection to such procedure is substantial. I cannot hold that the party to the arbitration

¹ May 20, 1847, 9 D. 1056.

Nov. 29, 1907. who felt aggrieved by the so-called award can without injustice
 Davidson v. the position of having to accept an award as to which it does Logan. that the procedure was truly the procedure contemplated by him
 Lord Justice- ing into the arbitration as shewn by the terms of the submission Clerk. only to say further that I do not think that the case of Hop bearing on the case. It proceeded on customs of a port. There is no any ordinary law applicable to such a case. Here there is no ground for dealing with the matter on any other footing than that the law applied, there being nothing to shew any district custom which could a decision not in accordance with the legal principles applicable to the circumstances of the case.

LORD ARDWALL was not present.

THE COURT adhered.

MURRAY LAWSON & DARLING, S.S.C.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—

No. 53. DAVID GREIG, Pursuer (Appellant).—M'Lennan, K.C.—
 Dec. 20, 1907. ALEXANDER CHRISTIE, Defender (Respondent).—C. D. Munro.

Greig v.
 Christie.

Passive Title—Vicious Intromission—Onus.—A farmer, after his his uncle who lodged with him and assisted him on the farm, gave his uncle's repositories a cheque in his uncle's favour for £1000 exchange for it got from the granter a cheque in his own favour.

In an action by a creditor of the uncle against the nephew as intromitter with the uncle's estate, after a proof, the Court held (1) uncle had no interest in the stock of the farm, and that the cheque represented the price of three bulls, part of the stock sold by the management of the farm, (2) that the pursuer had failed to prove uncle had any claim against the farm which would have entitled him retain the cheque, and (3) that the defender was not liable as intromitter even to the extent of the sum in the cheque; Stormonth-Darling, who was of opinion (1) that the cheque was in favour of the uncle, even though he might have been liable for the proceeds, formed part of his estate at the time of his death, and
 (2) that the nephew in dealing with it had rendered himself a vicious intromitter.

Opinion (per Lord Low) that, even if the uncle had been joint the bulls along with the nephew, the nephew, by acting as he did regard to the cheque, would not have made himself liable as a intromitter.

2D DIVISION. DAVID GREIG, retired farmer, residing in Glasgow, brought Sheriff of Stir- action in the Sheriff Court at Stirling against Alexander ling, Dum- farmer, Bankend, near Stirling, "as vicious intromitter with barton, and gear, and effects of" his uncle, the deceased James Christie, Clackmannan. representing him under one or other of the passive titles the law." The action was originally also directed against the defender as executor-dative qua one of the next of kin of the deceased James Christie, but it appeared that although the defender was decerned executor-dative along with his sisters neither he ever took out confirmation. The action consequently came to proceed Dec. 20, 1907. against him as a vitious intromitter solely.

The pursuer craved decree for payment of three sums of £20, £12, and £25, with interest thereon from 5th February 1902, 6th January 1904, and 5th February 1904 respectively. The pursuer averred that he had lent these sums on the dates mentioned to James Christie, and that they, with interest, were due and resting owing to the pursuer at the time of James Christie's death, and were still unpaid. Greig v.
Christie.

The pursuer further averred that James Christie had for some time been joint tenant of the farm of Bankend along with his brother, Alexander Christie, the father of the defender, and that after his brother's death on 12th December 1902 he became, and was at the time of his death, on 7th March 1905, sole tenant of the said farm; that at the time of his death he had property, including cash in house, stock, crop, and implements, and household furniture, to a value much exceeding the sums sued for; and that the defender had taken possession of and intromitted with the whole of the said estate.

The defender denied these averments, and stated that the stock and furnishings of the farm of Bankend belonged entirely to the defender's mother and sisters, and that the only property belonging to the deceased was some bedroom furniture of small value, with which the defender had not intermeddled.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Separatim, the pursuer is in the circumstances narrated entitled to decree against the defender as vitious intromitter with said estate.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The deceased James Christie not having left any moveable property, there is no room for vitious intromissions, and defender ought to be assoilzied with expenses. (4) The defender not having intromitted with any property whatever which belonged to the late James Christie, he ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (5) In the event of its being found that any funds or property with which the defender has intromitted truly belonged to the deceased James Christie, said intromissions being bona fide, and in the belief that said funds and property did not belong to said deceased, defender should only be found liable to the extent of his actual intromissions.

Proof was allowed and led. The facts, as ultimately held by the majority of the Court to be proved, were as follows:—

James Christie and his brother Alexander Christie, the defender's father, down to 1879 were joint tenants of the farm of Bankend, and the stock on that farm then belonged to them jointly. In 1879 James Christie took another farm called Bandedath on the same estate, and took to that farm the whole of his share of the stock on Bankend. He was not successful at Bandedath, and the landlord ultimately in 1885 took the farm off his hands. He then returned to Bankend, and resided there till his death. In 1890 James Christie's name was entered in the estate-books as joint tenant of Bankend with his brother Alexander, and his name continued to be so entered until Alexander's death in 1902, after which he was entered as sole tenant till his own death in 1905. It was explained by the defender that James' name was inserted in the estate-books for voting purposes. There was no written lease of Bankend, and no farm books or accounts were kept. The majority of the Court held it to be proved upon the evidence as a whole, notwithstanding the entry in the estate-books, that James was not in fact at any time after 1879 either joint or sole tenant of

Dec. 20, 1907.

Greig v.
Christie.

Bankend; that Alexander was sole tenant until his death, after his death the farm was carried on for behoof of his daughters, and his son, the defender, who were now the tenants; no part of the stock of the farm belonged to James, who was in the position of a lodger with his brother Alexander, and after Alexander's death with Alexander's family; that James carried on the management of the farm in return for board and lodging, and that he carried on business as a cow-dealer on his own account. After Alexander's death James transacted the financial business of the farm. He paid the rent, wages, seed bill, and other charges. He sold and received the money for the produce and stock of the farm. Receipts in his favour for the rents payable in 1904 and at Candlemas 1905 were produced. In the opinion of the majority of the Court he acted in these transactions as the agent of his brother Alexander's family.

It was proved that the pursuer, who was James' brother, lent him the sums sued for on the dates above mentioned. The sums were borrowed by James ostensibly to enable him to pay rent and taxes due for the farm of Bankend, and the receipt for £25 borrowed on 5th February 1904 bore that the sum was "to enable" him "to pay rent and taxes, &c." The rent of Candlemas 1904 was in fact paid by him on 8th February of 1905. There was no other evidence to shew that the sums received for the stock and produce of the farm were not sufficient to meet its liabilities, or that, upon a true accounting between James, as agent for Alexander's family, and Alexander's family as tenants of the farm, there was any sum due by them to him at the date of his death. It appeared that before Alexander's death and after James' death the farm always paid its way.

After James' death there was found in his repositories two hundred pound notes and a cheque granted in his favour by Messrs. Brothers, auctioneers, for £46, 5s. 7d. The two notes and the cheque were placed by the pursuer in a cash-box, which he locked up at Bankend, taking away the key. The defender thereafter opened the cash-box with a key which he found in the house, and took out the two notes and the cheque. The two notes he applied towards payment of James' funeral expenses, amounting to £11, 13s. 6d. The cheque he took to Messrs Speedie and got from them in exchange for it another cheque in his own favour for the same sum. The sum was for the price of three shorthorn bulls which had formed part of the stock of Bankend, and which had been sold on the instructions of James. In the view of the majority of the Court it was held that it was proved that these bulls were to no extent the property of James, but were wholly the property of Alexander's family, and were lent to James as their agent.

By interlocutor dated 9th October 1906 the Sheriff (Mitchell) assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the pursuer's action.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who, on 3d November 1906, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer is a creditor of his brother-in-law, the late James Christie: Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender has confirmed as agent of the said James Christie or has vitiously intromitted with his property. Finds in these circumstances, as matter of law, that the defender is liable in payment to the pursuer under the conclusions of the Therefore refuses the appeal; of new assolizies the defender from the Dec. 20, 1907. conclusions of the action; and decerns."

The pursuer appealed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 12th and 13th November 1907. Greig v.
Christie.

Argued for the pursuer and appellant;—Any person who intromitted without title with the effects of a person deceased was a vitious intromitter even although he had acted bona fide. Bona fides might absolve from the penal consequences of universal liability, but the intromission was none the less vitious, and the intromitter was liable at least to the extent of his intromission.¹ The case of *Adam v. Campbell*² was special, and it merely decided that the persons there sued were not liable for the deceased's debts universally. They admitted liability to the extent of the estate left by the deceased. The deceased here left, and the defender vitiously intromitted with, either (a) half of the stock at Bankend, or at least (b) the cheque. Even assuming that James had no interest in the farm stock, that the bulls for the price of which the cheque was granted were the property of the defender's family, and that James was only an agent for them, the cheque was none the less the property of James. A principal was not entitled to the price of goods sold by his agent, but merely to the balance which might be found due by the agent on an accounting, and it lay upon the defender to explain the true position of affairs by accounting as James' executor. It could not be assumed that the balance was against James. The onus of proof was on the defender. The cheque in any view was liable primo loco to meet debts incurred by James on farm account, and on the defender's behalf and for his benefit. That was the position of the debts here sued for. It was proved that the money lent to James was borrowed for the purpose of paying the rent of the farm, and was, in fact, used for that purpose. If the defender's family were the tenants, they got the whole benefit of the money borrowed from the pursuer.

Argued for the defender and respondent;—The absence of dishonest purpose and concealment, and of any intention to take up the universitas of the deceased's estate, was a good defence to a charge of vitious intromission.³ At least any bona fide title of intromission relieved the intromitter from the penal consequence of universal liability.⁴ But really here there was no intromission with the estate of the deceased. He had no interest in the farm stock, and even the cheque was not his property, for it was proved that it was the price of bulls belonging to the defender's family. It was said that he would have been entitled to retain this cheque to meet debt incurred on farm account by him. But his right so to retain or to apply it in payment of the pursuer's loans would have depended upon the state of accounts between him and the defender's family. The Court had no information as to this, and could not obtain it in an action based solely on vitious intromission. But at most what the defender did was to affect prejudicially a right of retention, and all the pursuer was entitled

¹ Ball's Prin. sec. 1921; Ersk. Inst. iii. 9, 49-53; Wilson v. Taylor, 1865, 3 Macph. 1060.

² 1854, 16 D. 964.

³ Adam v. Campbell, 1854, 16 D. 964, per Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, at pp. 972-3.

⁴ Ball's Prin., sec. 1921; Wilson v. Taylor, 1865, 3 Macph. 1060, per Lord Cowan, at p. 1061.

Dec. 20, 1907.

Greig v.
Christie.

to was the proved value of that right of retention. That on its being shewn that on an accounting the balance was of James. The onus of proving this was on the pursuer, and not discharged it. There was no proof that James as does to borrow money to pay the rent. On the other hand, it was that the farm, at least before Alexander senior's death, James' death, always paid its way, and that there was money coming in to meet all its liabilities.

At advising on 20th December 1907,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the facts)—In these circumstances the question arises whether the defender in this case has fallen into the character of a vitious intromitter by his having taken a cheque in favour of the deceased and got another cheque in his own favour from the granter, and so got from the bank the amount in question. I am satisfied that the cheque, which was from stock auctioned for the price of three young bulls which did not belong to the deceased, being bulls reared on the farm, and not the deceased's property, was granted to him as managing the business of the farm.

In these circumstances the question which arises is one of some difficulty, and it is only after repeated consideration that I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer's plea in favour of vitious intromission must fail. I do not go further into the matter, as I have considered and compared the opinions prepared by Lords Low and Ardiwall. The deceased, I think, had no right or title to the money represented by the cheque, the burden of proof being on the party maintaining vitious intromission, and that the pursuer has failed to discharge the onus.

LORD LOW.—I am of opinion, in the first place, that it is established that no part of the stock, crop, or implements upon the farm of Bankend belonged to the deceased James Christie. It was impossible to get exact and precise evidence upon the question, because no farm accounts of any description appear to have been kept, and according to the evidence, if taken in detail, is somewhat vague and indefinite. As a whole, however, it leaves no doubt in my mind that after the death of Bankend in 1885 James Christie was merely in the position of a tenant with his brother, who assisted in the management of the farm in board and lodgings, and who carried on business as a cow-dealer on his own account.

There is indeed one fact which prima facie suggests that James must have had an interest in the farm, and that is that in 1896 an entry was entered in the estate-books as joint tenant with his brother. There is nothing, however, in the estate office to shew how or why this came to be made. Mr M'Laren, the present factor, only came to the farm in 1896, and his only source of information is the entry in the books. He says, however, that he always regarded Alexander as being a joint tenant, while the defender says that he understood that James was put in as joint tenant "to give him a vote for the laird." In the circumstances, I cannot regard the entry in the rental as counterbalancing great weight of evidence to the effect that James' position in regard to the Dec. 20, 1907. farm was what I have stated.

The pursuer, therefore, has no claim against the defender in respect of Christie. Greig v. the intromissions which the latter had with the stock and crop upon the farm. Lord Low.

So far the case appears to me to present no difficulty, but a delicate question arises as to whether the defender by his intromissions with the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d. granted by Speedie Brothers in favour of the deceased, has not incurred liability for the debts of the latter, as a vitious intromitter, at all events to the amount of the cheque.

The answer to that question depends upon whether the money represented by the cheque was the property of the deceased, because if it was not his property the defender cannot have incurred a passive title, however irregular and unwarranted his intromission with the cheque may have been. Mr Erskine in his Institutes (iii. 9, 51) states the law thus:—"Intromission cannot be vitious, nor consequently infer a passive title, when the subject intermeddled with was truly not in bonis defuncti, no part of the estate of the deceased, or ceased to be such before the intromission."

Now, a cheque is not a document of title, nor, in the general case, does it give any indication of the purpose for which, or the capacity in which, it is granted to the payee. Still, when a cheque is found in a dead man's repositories, drawn in his favour in ordinary form, I think that there is a certain presumption that the money represented by the cheque belonged to him. It seems to me, therefore, that the onus in the first instance lay upon the defender to shew that the money did not belong to the deceased. That onus he has, in my opinion, discharged, because it is proved that the cheque represented the price of certain cattle which formed part of the stock of Bankend, which were sold by Speedie Brothers upon James Christie's instructions, the sale of stock being a matter which was intrusted to him. If, therefore, I am right in thinking that it is established that no part of the stock of the farm belonged to James Christie, he held the cheque not in his own right but for the defender and his mother and sisters, to whom the stock upon the farm belonged. That being so, then unless circumstances existed which would have entitled James Christie to retain the money although it was the price of cattle which did not belong to him, the defender has not, by his intromission with the cheque, incurred liability for his uncle's debts.

It is argued, however, that upon the assumption that James Christie had no interest in the farm, he was entitled to retain the cheque in a question with the defender and his mother and sisters, because he had borrowed the sums now sued for from the pursuer for the purpose of paying the rent of the farm. I think that it may be taken to be proved that James Christie did in fact borrow the sums sued for for the ostensible purpose of paying rent and taxes, but it does not follow that that gave him right to retain the amount in the cheque. Whether he would have been entitled to do so or not would have depended upon the result of an accounting for his intromissions with the produce of the farm. He appears to have conducted all the sales, both of crops (such as hay, beans, and barley) and of cattle, and out of the proceeds he paid the rent and other

Dec. 20, 1907. necessary expenses. The farm seems always to have paid its way to have afforded a livelihood for Alexander Christie and his family. The reason is disclosed why James Christie should have required money to pay the rent. Perhaps the fact that he engaged in cattle apparently with little success, may have had something to do with it, however that may be, it is certainly not proved, nor do I think it can be inferred from the evidence, that James was a creditor of the farm. It is possible that he may have been so, but as no books or accounts were kept, it cannot now be ascertained how matters truly stood. It is fortunate for the pursuer, but upon this branch of the case the burden of proof is on him.

Greig v.
Christie.

Lord Low.

I am therefore of opinion (1) that it is proved that James Christie had no right to or interest in the stock, crop, or implements upon the farm; (2) that it is proved that the cheque represented the price of certain cattle or in which James Christie had no right or interest; and (3) that it is proved that there was a balance due to James Christie by the farm, in which he would have been entitled to retain the proceeds of the sale.

The result is that, in my judgment, the appeal should be dismissed, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff affirmed.

I should like, however, to add that even if I took a different view of the result of the evidence I should still think that the defender could not be held to have incurred liability as a vitious intromitter. The most reasonable view of the evidence which could be taken for the pursuer is that it shewed that James Christie had some interest in the farm, but no right to the stock thereon. It is plain, however, that even if it was established by the evidence, no data are supplied by which any conclusion whatever can be made of the extent of James Christie's right or interest. I suppose that if he had any right at all it must have been a partial right along with his brother in the stock,—a right which may have been to the extent of one-half, but which may have been to some less extent. Assuming that to have been the position of matters, I am unable to see how, by carrying on the farm, and thereby necessarily intromitting with the stock, the defender could be regarded as a vitious intromitter in dealing with stock which ex hypothesi belonged to a greater or lesser extent to him or those for whom he acted, and which it was necessary for one to intromit with if the farm was to be carried on in ordinary course.

I think that very much the same view applies to the cheque. Assuming that the cattle for the price of which the cheque was issued belonged to some unknown extent to James Christie, they also belonged to the defender and his mother and sisters, whom he represented. In the course which the defender adopted was irregular, but I do not think that it can be described by a more serious epithet. To whom the cattle belonged they were part of the stock of the farm, and the proceeds of their sale naturally fell to be applied to farm expenses, and I can understand that it would have been very inconvenient, perhaps impossible, for the conduct of the farm, if the money had been tied up in a cheque. I am indeed inclined to think that the defender had a probable excuse for his intromission with the cheque, which the institutional writers would find sufficient to exclude the consequences of vitious intromission.

Accordingly, even upon the most favourable view for the pursuer I think Dec. 20, 1907. that he has mistaken his remedy. It seems to me that the appropriate course would have been for him to confirm as executor creditor and bring an action of accounting. Greig v. Christie.

Lord Low.

I need hardly say that the fact that the contrary view is held by my brother, Lord Stormonth-Darling, whose opinion I had an opportunity of reading, has led me to consider the case with much anxiety, but after repeated consideration of the evidence and the authorities, I have been unable to come to any other conclusion than that which I have stated.

LORD ARDWALL.—The pursuer in this case seeks to recover from the defender sums of £20, £12, and £25, which he alleges were lent by him to the deceased James Christie, an uncle of the defender. The loans are proved by valid writs produced in process, and the receipt for £25 bears that that sum was received to enable the deceased James Christie to pay "rent and taxes."

The action is brought, in the first place, against the defender as executor-dative of the deceased James Christie, but although he was decerned executor he never took out confirmation, for the reason, he says, that there was no estate to confirm to; but, in the second place, he is sued as a vitious intromitter with the moveable estate of the deceased James Christie. The moveable estate with which it is said vitious intromission took place was, in the first place, the half of the stock on the farm of Bankend, and, second, in any view, a cheque drawn by Speedie Brothers, auctioneers, Stirling, in favour of the said James Christie.

With regard to the stock on Bankend, I think it is proved that no portion of it belonged to James Christie. The facts of the case shortly are these:—(His Lordship stated the facts with regard to the stock on Bankend).

There remains, however, the question as to the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d.

(His Lordship stated the facts as to the cheque and the defender's action with regard to it.)

The question comes to be, was this treatment of the cheque vitious intromission on the part of the defender with his deceased uncle's estate?

The onus is on the pursuer to shew that this cheque, or, as it may be taken to be, the money contained therein, formed part of the deceased James Christie's estate. I do not think any importance can be attached to the fact that the cheque was taken in the name of the deceased. It has been held that payment by a cheque is really payment in cash, and it perhaps simplifies matters to regard the cheque as in the same position as if instead of the cheque the deceased had received the money in bank-notes and coin, and had left it lying in a parcel in his repositories. It is proved by the sale-note No. 6/5 of process and the evidence of Andrew M'Dermont, cashier for Speedie Brothers, the granters of the cheque, that the sum of £46, 5s. 7d. was paid for three shorthorn bulls which it is clearly proved belonged not to the deceased at all but to the defender and his mother and sisters, who seem to have been interested with him in the farm stock at Bankend, and I may observe that M'Dermont's evidence also shews that the deceased's transactions in cow-dealing, on his own account were kept perfectly separate from the sale of bulls bred upon Bankend.

Dec. 20, 1907.

Greig v.
Christie.

Lord Ardwall.

This being so, it seems necessarily to follow that the cheque of money which it represented was not part of the deceased's estate inasmuch as it was the price of and a surrogatum for bulls belonging to the defender which the deceased was bound to hand over to the pursuer. Accordingly we may apply to the defender's intromission with the money what Mr Erskine says (Inst. iii. 9, 51),—"Intromission cannot create a title, nor consequently infer a passive title, where the subject intromitted with was not truly in bonis defuncti, no part of the estate of the deceased to be such before the intromission."

It is quite true that if Messrs Speedie had not been willing to cash the old cheque and grant a new one, it might have been necessary for the pursuer to take out confirmation to the cheque as to money held in trust by the deceased as agent or trustee for those to whom the bulls belonged. It would not have been necessary for the pursuer to have paid the proceeds to himself, which he had quite a right to do. Indeed, even supposing that the defender had not been decerned against as to the money, but that the pursuer had taken out confirmation to the cheque as creditor, I cannot doubt that the defender could have successfully defended the sum in question, which was never immixed with James Christie's own funds, as being money truly belonging to him, and representing the proceeds of the farm stock in which the deceased had no pecuniary interest. The same result would have followed had sequestration been taken out against James Christie's estate, the sum being distinguishable from the rest of the estate.—See Macadam v. Martin's Trustees, 1872, 11 Macph. 33.

So far, then, I think it cannot be doubted that although the defender was treated in a somewhat shorthand way by the pursuer, he has not done anything more than vindicate practically what was truly his own right, as he would have been entitled to do in a more roundabout way in the ordinary form of law. The only answer of any consequence to the pursuer's claim upon this money is that the deceased being decerned against with many of the financial transactions connected with the farm, the pursuer might have been entitled to retain the money in question against advances which he might have made on behalf of the defender and those interested in the farm. I am of opinion that this would be a sufficient answer if the pursuer could prove it, and the onus is upon him to do so, that at the time of James Christie's death the defender or those interested in the farm were entitled to the money to him on a just accounting. But so far from anything of the kind being proved, I think the evidence goes to shew that whereas the money was easily paid its way during the lifetime of Alexander Christie so that he never had frequently difficulty in meeting debts due by the farm, the proceeds of sales, and after his death it was found that many of the accounts were unpaid which ought to have been paid out of the money received from the sales of crop and stock. I think this appears from the evidence of Mrs Margaret Christie, and the impression which the whole evidence leaves on my mind is that James Christie was not successful in his business of cow-dealing, and that so far as can be conjectured the balance was against him and not in his favour with reference to the cow-dealing business which from time to time he performed for the defender and those interested in the Bankend farm, in other words, that moneys due to the Bankend farm frequently went to cover James Christie's losses.

in cows. But it is enough for the disposal of this part of the case, first, Dec. 20, 1907 that it is proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that the money in the cheque was the property of the defender and those interested with him in Bankend stock, and second, that the pursuer has failed to prove that at the time of his death James Christie had any claim of retention or otherwise over the said money in respect of sums due to him by the defender.

Greig v.

Christie.

Lord Ardwall.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to prove that there has been any vitious intromission on the part of the defender with his deceased uncle's estate, and it follows that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be affirmed and the defender found entitled to the expenses of the appeal.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The only relevant facts of this case seem to me to lie in small compass, though the proof ranged over the whole business relations for forty years of two brothers, Alexander and James Christie, who are both now dead, Alexander having died on 12th December 1902, and James on 7th March 1905. Alexander was married and had a family, one of whom is the defender. James never married. The two brothers were for some time joint tenants of a small farm of 80 acres on the Polmaise estate near Stirling, at a rent of £110 a year, where their father had been tenant before them. In 1879 James became tenant of a much larger farm on the same estate, but he does not seem to have succeeded in it, and after six years the landlord took the farm off his hands. James then returned to the family home at Bankend, and after Alexander's death James was recognised by the factor as the tenant of Bankend, and paid the rent regularly. The defender says James did so as manager for the family. What was the exact footing on which he stood towards his late brother's widow and children is left, as I think, to pure conjecture, just as there is no definite proof as to the precise financial relations of the brothers themselves. How your Lordships can say that there is anything like proof of what these relations were I do not myself profess to understand.

The only facts that can be said to be known with certainty are these: In 1902, and again in 1904, James borrowed money from the pursuer, who was his brother-in-law, to the amount in all of £57. For these sums of money (£20, £12, and £25), James granted receipts to the pursuer, the last dated 5th February 1904 (a little more than a year before James' fatal accident). It is in these terms:—"Received from Mr David Greig the sum of Twenty-five pounds further to enable me to pay rent and taxes, &c., and for which I am to grant a conveyance to him of my Upper Bridge Street property to secure repayment of this and any other advances that may be made in future." This document was signed through a stamp "James Christie, 5th February 1904." It is not said that the security there mentioned was ever granted. Nor is it said that the loans were ever repaid. But as tending to corroborate the statement in the last receipt that the loans were wanted to pay rent and taxes, it is significant to find that the loans were made a few days before the half year's rent was payable.

The pursuer, being thus undoubtedly a creditor of the late James Christie at the time of his death, applied to the defender for repayment of the loans as representing his uncle. The defender denied liability, and

Dec. 20, 1907. the present action was raised on the footing that the defender was Greig v. the late James Christie as executor-dative, or otherwise as vi-
 Christie. mitter with his goods, gear, and effects. In the course of the p LdStormonth- it appeared that on 2d May 1905 the defender, along with other Darling. of the family, was appointed executor-dative qua one of the ne but he admitted that he had not given up any inventory of the estate nor obtained confirmation. For this the defender gave as that he and his co-executors had not been able to discover any belonging to the deceased other than some bedroom furniture value, with which they had not intermeddled. The sole quest action thus resolved itself into one of vitious intromission, aye or

For the principles on which this passive title is founded one revert to the institutional writers and to decisions which do not later than Dunlop and the early volumes of Macpherson. P reason is that questions of intromission without a title genera the Sheriff Court, and are confined to subjects of small value.

Erskine in his Principles (iii. 9, 25) defines vitious intromission unwarrantable intermeddling with the moveable estate of a person without the order of law," and adds, "The bare intermeddling passive title, though the thing intermeddled with should not be any use by the intromitter." The subject is treated more at length Institutes (iii. 9, 49-56), where it is said that the passive title is when the thing intermeddled with was no part of the estate of the and also that the vitiosity may be purged if the intromitter give confirmed executor, "as it shews a willingness in the intromitter himself to account." The full penalty of vitious intromission be Erskine remarks, "extremely severe, and introduced as a check t excluded in every case where equity interposes for the intromit for instance, the value of the things intermeddled with is so inco as to remove all suspicion of fraud, unless there be direct evid least, pregnant presumptions to the contrary." Then he goes on t any probable title of intromission though imperfect in itself, such of administration in England, as saving the intromitter from t title. Mr Bell in his Principles (section 1921) begins by stating proper mode of entry, and the only effectual check on dishonest mission with the moveable funds of a person deceased, is confirm wherever one having an opportunity of intromitting does so wi firmation a universal responsibility is raised against him." The on to qualify this general statement by saying, "Any bona fide intromission, or circumstances removing the suspicion of fraud and a check on the intromission, will relieve against the penal cons (i.e., the incurring of universal liability).

Now, what were the actual intromissions founded on? They simplest description, and stand on the evidence of the pursuer defender himself. The pursuer's account of it is,—"I remember of James Christie. I was telegraphed to come and see him. I f valuables in his cash-box. They were four single pound note notes, a cheque from Speedie Brothers for young shorthorn bul them and amounting to £46, 5s. 7d. There was also a gold wat were all put into the box, and the box locked up, and I have the key in my possession. That box still remains at Bankend in the possession of defender." The defender's account of what happened is in substance the same, with an important addition. He says,—“There was a cash-box in the house. Pursuer put in it two £5 notes, a gold watch, and cheque for £46, 5s. 7d. He locked the box and took away the key. The box is still at Bankend. We opened it with a key we got in the house. I took the money out of the box to pay the funeral expenses. I produce the account for the same amounting to £11, 13s. 9d. (No. 6/7 of process). The cheque was in payment for bulls sold at Speedie's sale. The account No. 6/2 of process is the account for them. The bulls belonged to my father. I took the cheque into Speedie's, and they gave me another cheque in my name. Mr Speedie knew to whom the bulls belonged. The watch is still at Bankend.” There is some corroboration by the mother and sister of the defender, but the defender's own admission is enough. The only other witness who deals with this matter is M'Dermont, the cashier of Speedie Brothers. Speedie himself, who is referred to by the defender as “knowing to whom the bulls belonged,” was not examined, and the defender is not corroborated as to Speedie's knowledge by M'Dermont, who says,—“After Alexander's death in 1902 there would be grazing cattle sent in for sale from Bankend. They were entered in the name of Mr Christie—probably because we did not know who the owner was.” It is fair to add that this witness deposes that, while the two brothers were alive, it was James that sent in cows, and Alexander's name that was entered in connection with the sale of shorthorn cattle, but he admits that after the death of Alexander the auctioneers knew no other name but James' to put in the catalogue, and so both the account for the lot in question and the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d. were made out in James' name. I say this, as bearing on the bona fide belief of the defender when he possessed himself of the cheque, and got Speedie's cashier (most irregularly) to substitute a cheque in the defender's favour. This matter of the cheque is really the only element of importance in the case, for I agree with the Sheriff that the money taken out of the cash-box and spent in funeral expenses was in a totally different position, and must be disregarded. Indeed the pursuer's counsel ultimately presented his case on the footing that it raised no question of universal liability, but affected the defender's intromission with the sum in the cheque alone.

Now, what is a cheque? It is defined by section 73 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, as “a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand.” According to the ordinary course of mercantile dealing it is, at all events when drawn on a man's own bank, universally regarded as a cash payment. The creditor may not be legally bound to receive it, for he is not bound to be satisfied with anything but current coin of the realm; but if he takes it without objection, subject only to the condition of its being duly honoured on presentation, he is held to have been paid in cash. All this was clearly expounded by the Lord President within the last six weeks in the case of Leggat Brothers v. Gray.¹ Now, this cheque was sent to the late James Christie, the proper creditor of the

¹ 1908, S. C., at pp. 73-75.

Dec. 20, 1907. auctioneer, on 17th February 1905, and it was received and Greig v. him down to the time of his death. What right, I ask, had t
 Christie. or anyone else to abstract it from the deceased man's cash-bo LdStormonth- the connivance of the auctioneer, to substitute another cheque i Darling. a different person? The defender may have believed, and it is e that he may have been right in believing, that the cheque repr value of cattle which truly belonged to his father's representa that was a question which might require a long and complicated of accounts, and could not certainly be summarily solved by t taking the law into his own hands. Moreover, he and the oth of his family had been parties to placing the deceased man in of being the proper legal representative of the farm, responsible and other outlays, and entitled to the drawings for stock and defender was the last man, therefore, who could fairly disturb ment for which he was largely responsible. I think it would u benefits which the law endeavours to secure by the orderly administration of the estates of deceased persons if a wholly un and in some respects clandestine proceeding of this kind r encouragement.

It is said that the bona fides of the defender ought to save t from the penal consequences of his own acts, however irregular th been. Perhaps from the full penal consequences, i.e., of being held liable, but not certainly from the consequences of intromissio title, to the extent at least of that intromission. "Every p Lord Cowan in Wilson v. Taylor,¹ "who intromits without ti effects of a person deceased is a vitious intromitter, according acceptation of the term. He may have intromitted in perfect and, if so, it may be that, although he is not the less a vitious he may not suffer the penal consequences of vitious intromission.
 liability is by no means the necessary consequence of vitious i and in the present case I would be slow to sustain any claim liability against the defender. But if there has been de facto i without a title with the estate of a deceased to a certain extent, i any good ground, be contended that the good faith of the introm defence against a claim to that, or, to a less extent, by a cre deceased." The other Judges concurred, and it appears that one in which the bona fides of the intromitter was unusually cl deceased, a woman who had borne an illegitimate child, had money on deposit-receipt, and the bank where it was deposited the footing that the amount was not sufficient to warrant the confirmation, on receiving a discharge from the whole of the relatives, and yet the defender was held a vitious intromitter t of the money (about £90) which he had received from the b taking out confirmation, and responsible on that ground to a cre deceased woman in a claim within that amount.

If the principles applied in *Wilson v. Taylor*¹ were sound, me that they lead straight to the decision of this case in favour

¹ 3 Macph. 1060.

suer to the extent of £46, 5s. 7d. The amount of the cheque was undoubtedly part of the estate of the deceased James Christie at the time of his death. He alone had the right to cash it. What he was to do with the proceeds afterwards was for subsequent adjustment. The defender admittedly intromitted with the cheque, first by abstracting it from the repositories of the deceased, and then by exchanging it for another cheque in his own favour. This was, in my opinion, a vitious intromission, both because it was intromission without the shadow of a title, and also because there was a certain amount of clandestinity in it, at all events as regards the pursuer. Lastly, no amount of honest belief that the cattle were the property of himself and his family could save him from the consequences of intromission to the extent of the amount intermeddled with. I should therefore be in favour of recalling the Sheriff's interlocutor, and giving decree for £46, 5s. 7d., with expenses in both Courts.

But your Lordships are deciding otherwise. I cannot pretend to regard your decision otherwise than with regret and apprehension. It not only defeats a just claim, with which the Sheriff himself expresses "much sympathy," but it rewards with success a proceeding of the most irregular and, as I think, most reprehensible kind. If that were all, its effects might end with the case in hand. But I am apprehensive that it will encourage the belief among people who already, perhaps, have not too scrupulous a regard for regularity of procedure, and who certainly have unusual facilities for tampering with the moveable funds of deceased persons, that they are safe to disregard the check—"the only effectual check," as Mr Bell describes it (Prin. sec. 1921)—afforded by confirmation, and to act upon their own ideas of what they are pleased to consider equity.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor . . . appealed against: Therefore affirm the said interlocutor, and of new assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

GEORGE STEWART, S.S.C.—MURRAY LAWSON & DARLING, S.S.C.—Agents.

ANDREW ROBERTSON, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—J. W. Forbes.
JOHN JOHNSTON, Defender (Respondent).—Munro.

No. 54.

Process—Reponing—Failure to lodge prints—Act of Sederunt, Nov. 2, 1872, sec. 5.—Circumstances in which the Court recalled an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, dismissing an action on the ground that prints of the record had not been lodged as required by sec. 5 of the Act of Sederunt of 2d November 1872.

ON 3d October 1907, Andrew Robertson, accountant, Edinburgh, assignee of William Charles Steven, who was the judicial factor appointed on the trust-estate constituted by Mr and Mrs Scott's marriage-contract, brought an action against John Johnston, chartered accountant, Edinburgh, judicial factor on the trust-estate constituted by Mr and Mrs Lamond's marriage-contract, concluding for payment of £92, 9s. 10d. Mr Lamond and Mrs Scott, who were brother and sister, were the beneficiaries, under the trust-disposition and settlement of their grandfather, in equal shares, of certain heritable subjects

Dec. 20, 1907.

Greig v.

Christie.

LdStormonth.

Darling.

Jan. 8, 1908.

Robertson v.

Johnston.

1st

Division.

Lord

Salvesen.

Jan. 8, 1908.
 —
 Robertson v.
 Johnston.

which were burdened with heritable bonds. Their interest subjects fell to be held by their marriage-contract trustees, division of the subjects the heritable bonds remained un- and fell to be a burden to the extent of one-half each on the the two beneficiaries. It was subsequently found expedient off the bonds, and the sum sued for was a balance alleged under certain complicated transactions between the pursuer two judicial factors in connection with the paying off of the

On 20th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) record, and sent the cause to the Procedure-roll.

The parties having failed to lodge prints of the record, the Court made the following note on the interlocutor sheet December 1907.—Prints not lodged in terms of Act of Sederunt November 1872, and cause deleted from Procedure-roll," and December 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor. "The Lord Ordinary, in respect that parties have failed to comply with the provisions of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt of 2d November 1872,* dismisses the action: Finds neither of the parties liable to expenses."

The pursuer reclaimed, and produced to the Court the correspondence between the law-agents of the parties. On 20th November 1907 the pursuer's agent wrote:—"On seeing me in the end of the week for his adjustments, he told me my counsel had told him he need not trouble about adjustments as the case was to be settled. I would be pleased were this so. Is that to be done?" On 28th November he wrote:—"I have received from the printers proof prints of the closed record of the case. Please return it with any corrections you may wish to make, and say how many prints you want. We must, of course, observe the rules of Court." On 3d December he wrote:—"Is it just to print off? If you have no amendments to make I may do so. But if you have, please return the print sent to you, and attend to them thereon. Kindly attend to this, else we may be blamed."

* The Act of Sederunt, 2d November 1872, enacts, sec. 5:—"The clerk of the Court, or the pursuer, or for the party appointed to print the record, shall, within four days from the date of the interlocutor closing the record, the record, shall lodge with the clerk to the process two printed copies of the record as finally approved and closed . . . And failing the said agent lodging such copies within the prescribed period, the clerk shall record such failure by a note on the interlocutor sheet . . . and failing the two copies of the print being lodged as aforesaid, the cause shall be deleted from the Procedure-roll, as the case may be, and shall be restored to the roll on motion made to the Lord Ordinary by any party to the cause lodged with the said two printed copies as aforesaid. Provided that, if none of the parties to the cause move the Lord Ordinary to restore the same to the roll, the Lord Ordinary shall, on the day of the interlocutor dismissing the action, and finding neither party liable to expenses, which shall not be recalled by the Lord Ordinary of course, may be recalled only in the manner and on the conditions aforesaid."

The method of recall referred to is that provided by sec. 1 of the Act of Sederunt to the effect that such interlocutors "may be recalled on reclaiming note to the Inner-House, upon such conditions as to expenses and otherwise as may be imposed by the Court, or by the Lord Ordinary remitting."

Court." On 7th December he wrote:—"Why are you delaying returning the prints? I will print off on Tuesday, assuming that, unless I have the print back on Monday shewing any amendments you may have to make, you have none." The defender's agents replied on 9th December:—"Our Mr Stewart who has been out of town for some time has just returned. We trust to be in a position to return you the print with our adjustments thereon in the course of to-morrow." On 11th December the pursuer's agent wrote:—"I find I must lodge prints of the closed record on Friday. Be pleased to say if you have any amendments by return," and on 18th December he wrote:—"You are to blame for the delay. I must print off and lodge prints to-morrow." He also stated to the Court that prints had been tendered on 19th December, but were refused by the Clerk.

The reclamer moved that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled. The motion was not opposed, but the reclamer was called on to shew cause why the motion should be granted. He argued;—The failure to comply with the provisions of the Act of Sederunt was not due to contumacy, but was occasioned by the pursuer giving the defender too much time to furnish him with his adjustments. He was induced to do so by the prospects of a settlement, and by the desire, looking to the complicated nature of the case, that the record should be satisfactorily adjusted. In such circumstances the Court would recall the interlocutor and allow the cause to proceed.¹

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therein as accords, finding no expenses due to or by either party in connection with the reclaiming note.

ROBERT BROATCH, Solicitor—GALBRAITH STEWART & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

PETER BEGG AND OTHERS (Anderson's Trustees), Compearers (Reclaimers).—C. H. Brown.
JAMES DONALDSON & COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATOR, Respondents.—Constable.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1908.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

Expenses—Decree for "expenses"—Company—Winding-up by Court—Petition for leave to proceed with an action against Company—Unsuccessful opposition by Liquidator and Company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 87.—A note was presented in the compulsory winding-up of a company, praying for leave, under sec. 87 of the Companies Act 1862, to proceed with an action against the Company, and to find the Company and liquidator, if they or either should appear to oppose the prayer, liable in expenses. The note was opposed by the Company and its liquidator. The Court authorised the petitioners to proceed with their action, and found them entitled to "expenses." The Auditor having disallowed the expenses incurred by the petitioners prior to the date of lodging answers by the Company and its liquidator, the petitioners lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report.

The Court sustained the objection, holding that as the petitioners had ¹ Glen v. Thomson, Nov. 21, 1901, 4 F. 154; Donald v. Irvine, March 17, 1904, 6 F. 612; Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 16, 1888, 16 R. 104; Liquidator of the Gael Iron Co., Limited, v. Orr, Dec. 18, 1884, 12 R. 345.

Jan. 8, 1908.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

2D DIVISION.

been found entitled to "expenses" without limitation, it was too late for the Company and its liquidator to raise the question of liability for expenses incurred by the petitioners prior to the date of lodging answers.

Observed that the Company and liquidator by appearing incurred expenses of being held liable for the prior expenses.

(SEE supra, p. 38.)

On 1st June 1907 an order was pronounced for the winding-up of James Donaldson & Company, Limited, Junction Street, Leith.

On 4th June 1907 the testamentary trustees of James Donaldson, manufacturing chemist, Edinburgh, raised an action against James Donaldson & Company, Limited, praying for sequestration of James Donaldson & Company, Limited, for non-performance of feo-duty.

Anderson's trustees had not obtained leave, under sec. 87, Companies Act, 1862,¹ to commence this action, but in the liquidation they presented a note in the liquidation, under sec. 87, for leave to proceed with the action, "and to find the said Company and its liquidator, if they or either of them appear to oppose the action, hereof, liable in expenses."

The Company and its liquidator lodged answers in which they opposed the granting of the prayer of the note.

On 25th July 1907 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (M'Leod) refused the prayer of the note.

Anderson's trustees reclaimed.

On 26th October the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's decree; found the sequestration at the instance of the reclaimers competent; authorised them to proceed therewith, and decerned that the reclaimers were entitled to expenses, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and report.

The Auditor, inter alia, disallowed all expenses incurred by Anderson's trustees prior to the date of lodging answers by the Company and its liquidator.

Anderson's trustees presented a note of objections to the Auditor's report, in which they, inter alia, objected to the disallowance of expenses.

Argued for Anderson's trustees;—It was too late to raise the question as to the disallowance of the expenses incurred prior to the lodging of answers. The interlocutor of 26th October found the reclaimers entitled to "expenses"; that meant "expenses of the cause," there not being anything in the interlocutor to show that certain of the reclaimers' expenses were excluded. In an action by the Company and its liquidator, if they chose to appear and oppose the action, they were to pay the expenses now in question.

Argued for the Company and its liquidator;—Under sec. 87, Companies Act, 1862, it was necessary for the reclaimers to obtain leave to proceed with their action of sequestration, to ask the Court for leave to proceed. The expenses incurred by the Company and its liquidator prior to the date of lodging answers would thus have been incurred even if no answers had been lodged. The Company and its liquidator ought not to be found liable in expenses if they had not occasioned.² The reclaimers, in the prayer of the note, asked for expenses only in the event of opposition, wh virtual admission that they were entitled only to the expenses caused by opposition. The question was a proper question of taxation, which it was the duty of the Auditor to determine.

¹ Quoted supra, p. 39, note.

² M'Leod v. Leslie, May 27, 1865, 3 Macph. 840.

Anderson's
Trustees v.
Donaldson &
Co., Limited
(in Liquidation).

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the first objection should be sustained. Whatever may be the merits of the question as to whether expenses should be given, as between the successful and the unsuccessful parties to the case, only from the time when the opposition began, that question should have been settled at the time when the motion for expenses was made. Any other rule would be productive of the greatest inconvenience. It is out of the question that the matter should be decided by the Auditor on statements made by a party, and should then come up here on a note of objections to his report. The Court having found the petitioners entitled to expenses, it seems to me that "expenses" means "expenses in the cause" unless there is something in the interlocutor to shew that some expenses, which would otherwise be legitimate, are excluded. The liquidator does not need to appear unless he chooses. But if he chooses to appear and take up the case, he takes up the whole case, including a possible liability for expenses already incurred. Here the liquidator saw fit to appear, and I can see no ground for writing off expenses merely because they happen to have been incurred before he appeared. If he loses his case his liability is just that of an ordinary litigant.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL was absent.

THE COURT sustained the objection to the Auditor's report.

W. & T. P. MANUEL, W.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

MRS JANE CAMPBELL (with consent), Pursuer (Respondent).—

Fleming, K.C.—Maitland.

No. 56.

ESDAILE CAMPBELL MUIR, Defender (Appellant).—Johnston, K.C.—

Jan. 10, 1908.

Constable.

Fishing—Salmon-Fishing—Fishing by rod and line—Extent of right—Medium filum—Fishing in æmulationem vicini.—M., the proprietor of salmon-fishings ex adverso of one bank of a river 60 feet wide, anchored a boat about mid-stream and fished therefrom with rod and line, casting his line not only on his own side of the medium filum, but also on the other side, in such a way as to interfere with an angler fishing for salmon from the opposite bank.

Campbell v.
Muir.

In a petition for interdict at the instance of the owner of the salmon-fishings on the opposite bank, held that, even if M. had a right to cast his fly beyond the medium filum, he was not entitled to exercise that right in æmulationem vicini; that here he had acted in æmulationem vicini; and that the petitioner would have been entitled to interdict if she had insisted on it.

Lord Cowan's statement in Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, 11 Macph. 469, of the principles applicable to the regulation of fishing rights between opposite proprietors, as regards the medium filum of the river, approved; and opinion that these principles apply to fishing by rod and line as well as to fishing by net and coble.

Jan. 10, 1908.

Campbell v.
Muir.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.

ON 8th August 1906 Mrs Jane Campbell of Inverawe, sent of her husband, A. J. H. Campbell, as her curator and tutor-in-law, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Oban against Esdaile Campbell Muir, Larach Bhain, K. G., or otherwise from interfering with or annoying or Sir Robert Usher, Baronet, of 37 Drumshough Gardens, in the present tenant of said fishings under the pursuer, in the exercise of his rights as such tenant; and to grant interim interdict.

The pursuer and defender were proprietors of lands on opposite sides of the River Awe in the Pass of Brander, and possessed respectively the right of fishing for salmon by rod and line in the River Awe ex adverso of their own lands. The pursuer claimed that she had leased to Sir Robert Usher the rod-fishing rights in the River Awe, so far as situated in the Pass of Brander for the months of July, August, and September 1906. The defender claimed that while the said Sir Robert Usher was exercising his legal rights under said lease of fishing in the portion of said river to him by the pursuer, the defender approached him in a boat which he anchored almost in mid-stream, and proceeded to fish with a line in the direction of the said Sir Robert Usher, with the result that the said Sir Robert Usher was by the illegal conduct of the defender compelled to desist from the exercise of his said legal right of fishing in said river. . . . Explained that the pursuer has no knowledge of any understanding or arrangement between the parties as to fishing over the whole breadth of the river." It was subsequently proved that at the point where the incident was alleged to have occurred the river was about 100 yards broad.

In answer the defender averred that, on the occasion in question he "was fishing over the whole breadth of the river, as the pursuer and their respective tenants have been in use to do." The said Sir Robert Usher gradually fished down the right bank of the river into the water in which the defender was fishing. The defender denied. If the pursuer wished to terminate the understanding which each party was in use to fish over the whole breadth of the river, it was her duty to make formal intimation of her intention to do so to the defender. . . . In view of the defender being proprietor of the fishing rights ex adverso of his said lands, and of the said understanding the defender was acting legally and within his rights in fishing in the place libelled. He committed no trespass on the pursuer's fishing. Since the pursuer now wishes the defender restricted to the medium filum of the river, she and her tenants must accept the same limit." He further averred that, in respect of his own salmon-fishings in the Water of Awe, and of the understanding mentioned as to fishing over the whole breadth of the river, he was exercising his rights in an appropriate manner when he was interfered with by Sir Robert Usher. In these circumstances he prayed that not an appropriate remedy, and it ought to be refused."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender having encroached on the pursuer's fishing rights in said river, and by his illegal actions prevented the pursuer's tenant from exercising his legal rights therein, the pursuer is entitled to interdict as craved, with expenses. Jan. 10, 1908.
Campbell v. Muir.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (2) The defender not having trespassed or encroached on the pursuer's fishing rights in the Water of Awe, the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (3) The defender being the owner of fishings in the Water of Awe (up to the medium filum thereof) ex adverso of his lands, has a legal right to fish up to the medium filum at the place libelled, and is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 8th August 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan) granted interim interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition, and on an appeal the Sheriff (McClure) adhered. Subsequently the Sheriff-substitute repelled the defender's first plea in law, and allowed a proof; and proof having been led,* on 4th April 1907 he pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the principal pursuer is proprietrix of the estate of Inverawe, and also of, inter alia, the salmon and other fishings in the River Awe ex adverso of that portion of her estate in the Pass of Brander, known as the lands of Branrie, which she had let, inter alia, to Sir Robert Usher, Baronet, of 37 Drumsheugh Gardens, Edinburgh, for the period from 1st July to 30th September 1906, both inclusive: Finds that on 6th August 1906, while the said Sir Robert Usher was fishing from the bank at a part of said river called the Brander Pool, let to him aforesaid, the defender approached in a boat which he had moored in mid-stream, or nearly so, and allowed to float down the river by lengthening or letting out the mooring rope, and when he came opposite to the place where the said Sir Robert Usher was fishing, interfered with him in such a manner as to make it impossible for him at the time to continue fishing there: Finds that the defender is proprietor of fishings on said river on the opposite side from those belonging to the principal pursuer, but that his actings on the occasion above mentioned were illegal and unwarrantable, and an encroachment on her rights of fishing as above mentioned: Therefore continues the interim interdict formerly granted, and

* In his evidence given at the proof Sir Robert Usher described the incident complained of as follows:—"I remember on the forenoon of 6th August last, between 11 and 12 o'clock, while I was fishing at the Brander Pool, seeing Mr Muir coming down the loch in his launch. Mr Muir landed first from his launch with two friends, and the friends and he separated. Then Mr Muir got a boat, and with the assistance of his servant, launched her. The boat had been lying on the bank, I think. Having launched the boat, he pushed it out to mid-stream, or about mid-stream, above where I was fishing. You understand I had begun to fish, and was fishing at this time. I had been there probably five minutes before he came. When he got to mid-stream he anchored the boat, and proceeded to cast his line upon both sides of the river, on his own side first, and then he began casting over towards me. His line came quite close to me, and fell above me first, but as he lengthened his line out, it came down, and came practically just opposite where I was standing. Lengthening his line still further, it got below me, and fell in such a way as effectually to prevent me from fishing, unless, of course, I had risked casting over him, and hooking his line in my fly. I stopped fishing then."

Jan. 10, 1908. declares the same perpetual : Finds the defender liable in allows," &c.*
 Campbell v.
 Muir.

* "NOTE.—This action between Mrs Campbell, of Inverawe, and Campbell Muir, of Inistrynich and Larach Bhain, two proprietors of lands extend along the two opposite banks of the River Awe, and as pertinents of their lands the right of fishing in said river, and the above-mentioned incident of 6th August 1906, described in the evidence of Sir Robert Usher, and of Walter Macgregor, Mrs Campbell's tenant, was so rudely interfered with by the defender's conduct I am unable to justify on any ground. He maintains that there was an arrangement or understanding between the proprietors of fishings on the River Awe that they could fish over the whole breadth of the river but there is no proof of such an arrangement, and if he had such a right either by law or agreement, it must be limited by the condition that he must not act in emulationem vicini (Stewart on the Right of Fishing, p. 143). The Brander Pool, where the occurrence took place, is about 100 yards long and about 60 yards wide, and there was quite enough room there for more than one fisherman to enjoy the sport without interfering with one another, and when the defender saw Mrs Campbell fishing there he could easily have kept away from him, but his conduct in interfering with him in this manner was not only urgent but also characterised by the witness Macgregor, but also illegal, and his hesitation in continuing the interim interdict, in so far as it prevented the defender from interfering with or molesting the pursuer or her tenants who may be fishing from her side of the river. If they had agreed at the same time, the only course would be to have some arrangement either by mutual agreement or by some competent authority, binding them to fish on separate days—a most inconvenient course, and surely unnecessary in a river the size of the Awe. The prayer of the petition goes further, as it seeks an interdict against trespassing or encroaching on the fishing rights of the pursuer ex adverso of her lands, and thus requires my defining what these rights are—a question of heritable right which is beyond the competency in this Court, as there is no evidence of the exact nature of the subject-matter ; but I am relieved from any question of this kind by the admissions of the parties themselves. Mrs Campbell, for instance, says 'I understand I have only the right to fish to the middle of the river on my own side,' and the defender in his pleas (No. 3), says 'being the owner of fishings in the Water of Awe (up to the middle of the river) ex adverso of his lands, has a legal right to fish up to the middle of the river at the place libelled.' They have both, therefore, equal rights to fish in the River Awe, and as a general rule the rights of each are restricted only to the middle of the river, but there may be some places where the river is so narrow or the water at times so low that the restriction to the middle of the river would amount to a denial of the right of fishing altogether, and at these places it would be necessary that the right of fishing over the whole breadth be conceded, and there need not be much difficulty in making regulations that would prevent fishers on either bank from interfering with each other, but at the part in dispute, where the river is 60 yards wide there is no such necessity, and I think the law laid down in the case of Smith, 23d November 1850, 13 D. 112, cited by the Sheriff-principal as an interlocutor of 27th August last, may be applied, so that each fisher is restricted to his own half of the river. By fishing I would understand drawing the line over the water, so that one is fishing wherever his line is cast, and I am unable to agree with the defender's contention, which I gather from his pleadings, that he has a right to fish over the whole surface of the river and cast his line right to the other side provided he keeps himself on his own side, and fishes either standing on the bank or one of the piers.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session. The appeal was ^{Jan. 10, 1908.} heard before the First Division on January 9th and 10th 1908.

Argued for the defender and appellant;—(1) The interdict as granted ^{Campbell v. Muir.} could not stand, for it was couched in alternative terms. Further, neither of the alternatives was sufficiently specific to justify interdict. A person subjected to interdict was entitled to know definitely what he must refrain from doing.¹ Here it would be impossible to say whether the interdict was against fishing from a boat; or against casting across the medium flum; or only against doing both of these together. Standing the present interdict the defender was not in fact in safety to exercise his fishing rights at all. (2) If the pursuer desired to have the fishing rights on the River Awe regulated, interdict was not the appropriate method. The proper method was to apply to the Court for regulation, as had been done in Town of Perth v. Lord and Lady Gray.² Until that was done the defender, being the proprietor of fishings on the river, had a prima facie right to fish the whole river. A right of salmon-fishing was not limited by the medium flum,³ nor was a right of trout-fishing.⁴ *Milne v. Smith*⁵ was not a case in point, for it dealt with the Tweed, where the medium flum was the boundary between England and Scotland. If, then, the defender was only exercising his fishing rights, he could not be subjected to interdict, though if the exercise of his rights interfered with other rights in the same river, a case for regulation might arise. (3) Further, it was established by the proof that not only was it the custom in Scotland generally, but it had long been the custom in this river, that the proprietors of fishings on each bank should exercise their rights by fishing across the whole stream. It was, therefore, jetties placed there for the convenience of anglers, or wading in the water, or, as in the present case, from a boat. As it would be almost impossible to mark down the exact line beyond which one may not cast, it may frequently happen that a good fisher would make his cast reach beyond the middle of the stream, but in that case I must hold that it is not done by any legal right, but only permitted by sufferance and the good neighbourly feeling that ought to subsist between neighbouring proprietors, and I think there should be no reasonable objection, except that it might incommode someone fishing on the opposite side of the river, and I also think the defender is not likely ever to find himself restricted in his casting so long as he refrains from interfering with others who may have as good a right of fishing as he has himself. This right of fishing in the River Awe adds very much to the letting value of such an estate as Inverawe, but would be of little use if the owner were unable to guarantee her tenant against interference or molestation, and it is for this purpose that interdict is sought. I may observe that there is now no doubt as to the Brander Pool, the place in dispute, being part of the River Awe. This is admitted in the pleadings, and it is in evidence that the river, as distinct from the loch, begins at a place called Rudha-na-ha, about 100 or 120 yards further up than the Brander Pool.”

¹ Cairns v. Lee, Oct. 29, 1892, 20 R. 16; Cathcart v. Sloss, Nov. 22, 1864, 3 Macph. 76.

² Jan. 9, 1750, M. 12,792, 1 Pat. App. 645.

³ Lady Ashburton v. Mackenzie, July 8, 1829, 7 S. 849, Lord Craigie, at 851; Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, 11 Macph. 469, Lord Neaves, at 474.

⁴ Arthur v. Aird, 1907, S. C. 1170, Lord Low, at 1174; Question reserved in Somerville v. Smith, Dec. 22, 1859, 22 D. 279.

⁵ Nov. 23, 1850, 13 D. 112.

Jan. 10, 1908.
Campbell v.
Muir.

incompetent to subject a proprietor to summary interdict had only followed a long established custom, and had received warning that that custom was to cease.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—(1) The pursuer had been interfered with in the exercise of his undoubted fishing in the Awe, and the appropriate remedy for such an offence was a decree of interdict against the offender, who, whose own fishing rights might be, had acted in emulationem interfering with his neighbour's rights. (2) In any event the defender had no right to fish beyond the medium filum. The order was that the limit of a right of fishing ex adverso of one bank to the middle of the stream.¹ When that was extended it was only because the stream was too narrow to admit of fishing successfully within the limit of half the stream.² The river here was of such a breadth that no such necessity arose. Such an extension too was only recognised as regarded net and coble, not as regarded fishing by rod and line. No custom had any been made out for an extension of the medium filum limit here. Any casting beyond the medium filum that had been practised was by toleration only, and not of right, and at any rate had never been practised while an angler was fishing the opposite bank. Moreover, nothing whatever had been proved that could justify such an extension in this way from a boat. The Sheriff's findings, therefore, were correct and should be affirmed. [On the suggestion of the Court that the interdict as granted was incompetent, respondent's counsel pressed for a continuation of the interdict.]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The view of the situation here taken by the Sheriff-substitute seems to me to have been perfectly correct, and I have nothing to add to what he says in his note and what he expresses in his judgment where he pronounces findings as to the actual facts which happened. On that view it is perhaps unnecessary to say anything more. But as the case has been so carefully argued, and the question of the right of fishing ex adverso the medium filum has been raised, I should perhaps say something on the law of the subject. I do not think I can add anything to what was said by Lord Cowan in the case of the Earl of Zetland,⁴ taken along with the observations thereon made by Lord Neaves at a subsequent period of the judgment. Lord Cowan says:—"A good deal has been said about the medium filum in the stream. If there had been no possession at all, and we came to consider how the different competing rights of heritors on the banks of a stream, each having each a right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of their lands, were to be regulated, then indeed I think the Court have recognised clear principles which the fishings must be carried on. If the stream is broad enough to admit of a clear sweep of the nets without crossing the medium filum, each proprietor must so exercise his right as to keep within the medium filum of the stream. But then, again, a different state of matters arises when the stream is not sufficiently broad to admit of this. The Court in a

¹ Stewart, Rights of Fishing (2d ed.), p. 142-3; Moore on Fishing, p. 118.

² Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, 11 Macph. 469, Lord Cowan at p. 474.

³ Milne v. Smith, 13 D. 112, Lord Medwyn, at p. 121.

⁴ 11 Macph., at p. 474.

has found that some arrangement must be made for an alternate sweep of Jan. 10, 1908. the nets from the different sides. In the case, however, where immemorial possession has been enjoyed, I cannot think that the ascertainment of the medium filum is of any avail in determining such rights of fishing.”

Campbell v. Muir.

Ld. President.

He is dealing there with fishing by means of net and coble, but the same principles I apprehend apply equally to rod-fishing. Now, I agree with that exposition of the law. After all a right of salmon-fishing has nothing whatever to do with the medium filum, but it must be defined as to the place for its local exercise. When that is defined by immemorial practice the matter is settled thereby, but rights of fishing are not necessarily so defined, and it is by no means impossible, even at this day, to figure a case where there will be no such definition. Take for example the case of the Tummel. If the Falls of Tummel were blown up and salmon were thereby enabled to get to the upper reaches of the river, the Crown might, saving any fishing rights existing in the barony of Athole, grant rights of salmon-fishing in the upper waters of the Tummel to the ex adverso riparian proprietors. If this were so, and the question of the limits of their rights were raised, I apprehend that they would fall to be determined on the principles laid down by Lord Cowan. In the particular portion of the Tummel to which I have referred the stream is so narrow that the method of regulation would have to be by the adoption of fishing on alternate days or something of that sort.

But coming back to the facts of this case, the findings of the Sheriff shew no immemorial practice of exercising a right of fishing by means of anchoring a boat in the river and fishing from it in the way the defender here has done. I think it is also shewn that a perfectly reasonable way to exercise the rights of fishing here would be that each proprietor should remain on his own bank of the river. It may be that a good caster, such as Mr Muir seems to consider himself, might be able to cast across the river so that his fly would get beyond the medium filum. That is certainly a different thing from starting out in a boat and anchoring in the middle of the stream, and then proceeding to fish over to the opposite bank. I come to the result embodied in the findings that the defender was on the particular occasion acting in emulationem vicini against his neighbour's right, and that that was a just ground for complaint.

Now, when the parties came into Court I think the whole case might have taken a perfectly different turn if the defender had chosen to act up to the situation and had frankly said—“I agree I did what I see I ought not to have done, but this is not a case for interdict.” I think the case would not have gone on if he had said so. There might have been a matter of expenses for bringing the process up to that early stage. He does not take that position, but the case goes to proof and the defender says he is absolutely entitled to do what he did, and so sibi imputet if he finds himself cast in the expenses. The interdict, I agree, cannot stand, because it was an interim interdict made perpetual in terms of an alternative conclusion, and that is sufficient to condemn it at once. At the same time I do not think there would be any difficulty in framing an interdict appropriate to the action out of the prayer. We have been relieved from that by the concession which has been made by Mr Fleming that he does not press for the

Jan. 10, 1908. continuation of the interdict. I am for recalling the interdict
 Campbell v. ultra affirming the findings of the Sheriff, and finding the pursuer Muir. to expenses.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree both upon the general law and upon the particular question which is raised in this case.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substituted in the interdict, but repeated the Sheriff-substituted's findings and "in respect it is now stated for the pursuer to be satisfied with the foregoing findings and does not object to the circumstances, on interdict being pronounced against the defender, find the defender liable in expenses before the Court and in the Sheriff Court; and remit," &c.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.

No. 57. LEWIS DAVIS WIGAN, Pursuer (Respondent).—Dickson, Pitman.
 Jan. 10, 1908. WILLIAM HARRISON CRIPPS, Defender (Reclaimer)
 Wigan v. D.-F. Campbell—Brodie Innes.
 Cripps.

Sale—Sale of Heritage—Assignment of rents—Legal and Conventional Terms—Pastoral Farms—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 8.—The Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 8, enacts that a clause of assignment in the statutory form, viz.:—"And I assign the rents" "to be specially qualified, be held to import an assignment to the rents due for the possession following the term of entry, according to the legal and not the conventional terms, unless in the case of foreclosure, in which case it shall be held to import an assignment to the rents due on the conventional terms subsequent to the date of entry."

A disposition of an estate, with entry at 2d February 1905, contained a clause of assignment of rents in the statutory form. The farms of the estate were pastoral, and were let on leases of which the term was Whitsunday, and under which the legal terms of payment were conventionally postponed till the following term.

In an action by the seller against the purchaser, who had paid the rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 and conventionally at Martinmas 1905, the pursuer maintained that in the case of pastoral farms with entry at Whitsunday (when the first half-yearly rent became legally due) the rents legally due at each term were due for the possession during the half-year preceding the legal term, and consequently that the rents legally due at Whitsunday 1905 were for the possession during the half-year ending Whitsunday 1904, and "rents to become due for the possession following the term of entry of the defender within the meaning of sec. 8 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868.

Held that the rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 were due for the possession subsequent to Whitsunday 1905, and so were due from the defender by the clause of assignment of rents.

Mackenzie's Trustees v. Somerville, 2 F. 1278, commented on.
Sale—Sale of Heritage—Minute of Sale providing for appointment of rents—Disposition containing statutory clause of assignment

Whether disposition superseded minute.—The proprietor of an estate consisting of pastoral farms let under leases of which the term of entry was Whitsunday, and under which the legal terms of payment of rent were conventionally postponed until the following term, agreed by minute of sale to sell the estate with entry at 2d February 1905. The minute of sale contained, inter alia, this clause:—"The rents, rates, and taxes for the possession of said lands for the half-year from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905 shall be apportioned between" the seller and the purchaser.

Jan. 10, 1908.
Wigan v.
Cripps.

The disposition in favour of the purchaser following on the minute contained a clause of assignation of rents in the statutory form.

In an action by the seller against the purchaser, who had uplifted the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, the pursuer maintained that the minute of sale was superseded by the disposition, and consequently that the clause in the minute apportioning the rents was no longer effectual.

Held that the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 vested at Martinmas 1904 in the pursuer; and therefore that the clause in the minute providing for the apportionment of rents constituted a contract for payment of money by the pursuer to the defender which was not affected by the disposition of the lands.

By minute of sale, dated 30th July and 5th August 1904, between Lewis Davis Wigan, of Glendaruel, Argyllshire, first party, and William Harrison Cripps, 2 Stratford Place, Oxford Street, London, second party, Wigan agreed to sell and Cripps to purchase the estate of Glendaruel, with entry on 2d February 1905.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

The minute of sale contained, inter alia, an article in the following terms:—" (Eighth) The second party shall have right to the rents and duties of the said lands, and shall be liable in payment of the feu-duties and public burdens for the possession following the said term of entry, the first party having right to the rents and duties of the said lands, and being liable in payment of the feu-duties and public burdens for the possession prior to the said term of entry, and that notwithstanding that payment of the rent for the possession prior to the term of entry may be conventionally postponed to a date subsequent to that term. The rents, rates, and taxes for the possession of said lands for the half-year from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905 shall be apportioned between the first and second parties."

The disposition, dated 27th January 1905, by Wigan in favour of Cripps, which followed on the minute of sale, contained the usual clauses, including a clause assigning the rents in the statutory form provided by the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 8, viz., "And I assign the rents." *

In March 1906 Wigan raised an action against Cripps concluding for decree for payment of £638, 13s. 2d. The sum sued for consisted mainly of the amount of certain rents which had been paid by the tenants of Glendaruel to the defender.

The pursuer set forth article 8 of the minute of sale and the clause in the disposition assigning the rents, and averred:—(Cond. 5) "The farms on the estate of Glendaruel are pastoral. The term of entry under the leases is Whitsunday, and the term of payment of the rents is conventionally postponed for six months, and the half-year's rents payable at Whitsunday 1905 are those legally payable at Martinmas 1904, in respect of the second half of the crop and year 1904. The pursuer maintains that he is, by the terms of the contract of sale,

* See rubric.

Jan. 10, 1908.

Wigan v.
Crippa.

entitled to the rents which were legally due in respect of the possession up to the date of the defender's entry, and accordingly the half-year's rents for the second half of crop and year 1904 payable at Martinmas 1904, but conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, together with the proportion applicable to the period from Martinmas 1904 to the date of the defender's entry of the year's rent for crop and year 1905 legally due at Whitsunday 1905 but conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905."

The defender answered:—(Ans. 5) "Admitted that the lands of the estate of Glendaruel are pastoral; that the term of entry under the leases is Whitsunday; and that the rents for the first year are legally payable at Whitsunday, the term of entry, and thereafter, are conventionally payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday following. Quoad ultra denied. The defender maintains that he is entitled to retain the whole of the rents conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 (being for the first half of crop and year 1905) and that the rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 are apportioned between the pursuer and the defender."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The date of entry under said subjects being 2d February 1905, the defender is entitled to retain the whole of the rents of the pastoral farms legally payable at Whitsunday 1905, but conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905. (3) In respect of the agreement between the parties for the apportionment of the rents for the possession of said lands for the period from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905, the defender is entitled to retain a proportion of the rents of the pastoral farms, legally payable at Martinmas 1904, but conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 corresponding to the period from 2d February to Whitsunday 1905.

On 17th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defender for payment of the sum sued for.*

* "OPINION.—This case is not, in my opinion, a difficult one. It belongs to a category of law in which perplexities are apt to arise when the facts are few and simple. The pursuer sold the estate of Glendaruel to the defender, with entry at 2d February 1905. A copy of the writ, dated 27th January 1905, is No. 7 of process. It contains the following in the statutory form, 'And I assign the rents.' The import of this is defined by 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, section 8, repeating the words of 11 Vict. c. 48, section 3. The farms on the estate are all pastoral. The term of entry under the leases is Whitsunday. Payment of the rents legally due for each year at Whitsunday and Martinmas is conventionally postponed for six months, i.e., to the following terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday respectively. There can, I think, be no doubt that the rents for crop and year 1904 belong to the seller, and that the rents for the first half of crop and year 1905 must be apportioned between the pursuer and the purchaser in the proportions corresponding to the period before and the period after 2d February 1905 respectively. Nor is there, in my judgment, any difficulty in affirming that the rent for the first half of crop and year 1905, so to be apportioned, is that which was legally due at Whitsunday 1905, but conventionally payable at Martinmas thereafter. In my opinion, therefore, the pursuer's argument is entirely right, and should be given effect to. The defender maintains (answer 5) that 'he is entitled to retain the whole of the rents conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 (being for the first half of crop and year 1905), and that the rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 fall to be apportioned between the pursuer and the defender'; and in answer 6 it is 'explained' that

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) In the case of leases of Jan. 10, 1908. pastoral farms where Whitsunday was the term of entry the first half-year's rent was legally due at entry, although conventionally payable at the following Martinmas, and the rent so due and payable was for the tenant's possession from Whitsunday till Martinmas, and not for possession from the Martinmas preceding the tenant's entry until the Whitsunday of entry.¹ In short, the rent was due, legally, in advance. Therefore the rents here due legally at Whitsunday and conventionally at Martinmas 1905, being rents paid for possession from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1905, and consequently for the pos-

Wigan v.
Crippa.

payable at Whitsunday 1905 for the second half of crop and year 1904, 'were payable for the possession from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905.' In short, the defender's claim is that the rents for the second half of crop and year 1904 should be apportioned between the parties, and that all subsequent rents belong to himself. This contention is, in my judgment, in the teeth of the authorities, and appears to me to proceed upon a misconception of their import. The rents assigned to the defender are (in the words of the statute) those 'to become due for the possession following the term of entry,' viz., 2d February 1905, 'according to the legal and not the conventional terms.' It is, I think, palpably wrong to assert, as the defender does, that the rent for the second half of crop and year 1904 is, to any extent, due for possession after 2d February 1905; or that the rent conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 for the first half of crop and year 1905 is due wholly in respect of possession subsequent to that date. I was referred to some of the authorities upon this branch of the law, and have examined a number of others. Those which appear to me to be specially useful are Sir Wm. Johnston, 1727, M. 15,913; Sir Francis Elliott's Trustees, 1792, M. 15,917; Campbell's Creditors, 1800, M. App. 'Term legal and conventional' No. 1; the recent case of Mackenzie's Trustees, 1900, 2 F. 1278, particularly Lord Adam's opinion; Ersk. Inst. ii. 9, 64; and M. Bell's Conv. (3d ed.), p. 639. A question was raised and argued as to whether the terms of the minute of sale between the parties could competently be referred to. I was referred to some strong judicial opinions in the negative, e.g., Lord Glasgow's Trustees v. Clark, 1889, 16 R. 545, Lord Trayner, 547, Lord Adam, 549; Maxwell's Trustees v. Scott, 1873, 1 R. 122, Lord Benholme, p. 131; Lee, 1883, 10 R. (H. L.) 91, Lord Watson, p. 96. But it is unnecessary that I should form or express a definite opinion upon this point, because I think that the language of the minute of sale, which is quoted in condescendence 2, is quite in harmony with the view which I have expressed in regard to the rights of parties inter se. The defender founded upon the last sentence quoted in condescendence 2. But the words there used are, in my judgment, correct, and mean in effect (what I hold to be the case) that the rents for the first half of crop and year 1905, being those legally due at Whitsunday 1905, but conventionally postponed to the following Martinmas, shall be apportioned between the parties. For the above reasons, decree must, in my opinion, pass in the pursuer's favour. There are admittedly certain deductions to be made from the sum actually sued for, but counsel for the parties stated that they would adjust the proper figure when the legal principle had been decided.

"I may add that it occurred to me that the special circumstances averred in regard to the farm of Strondavain (condescendence and answer 11) might afford room for a distinction in favour of the defender. But his counsel, though invited to do so, submitted no argument upon that head."

¹ Kerr v. Turnbull, 1760, 5 Br. Supp. 876; Campbell v. Campbell, July 18, 1849, 11 D. 1426; Hunter v. Stewart, Nov. 8, 1857, 20 D. 60; Mackenzie's Trustees v. Somerville, July 20, 1900, 2 F. 1278; Kames' Elucidations, p. 67.

Jan. 10, 1908.

Wigan v.
Crippa.

session following the defender's term of entry, were carried by the defender under the clause of assignation of rents. (2) The rents legally due at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, belonged, in so far as the disposition was concerned, entirely to the pursuer; because the clause of assignation did not import an apportionment of the rents where the disposition was not at one of these terms; in order to effect an apportionment there must be a special contract, which was, namely, in the minute of sale, article 8. The pursuer contended that that article had been superseded by the disposition, and in so far as it dealt with rents becoming due for possession at the defender's term of entry, it had been superseded by the assignation of rents in the disposition, but in so far as article 8 apportioned the rents for the possession from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905, it was not superseded, for, as already pointed out, the disposition did not touch the question of apportionment. Strictly speaking, the defender was not entitled to collect the rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, but however that might be, the rents apart from special contract belonged to the pursuer, and in effect he in effect contracted to pay so much money to the defender, so that that contract remained effectual notwithstanding the execution of the disposition.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—Rent was payable for the crop at entry. In the case of pastoral farms practically the whole crop was raised during the summer months, and accordingly where a tenant entered a pastoral farm at Whitsunday the first half-year's rent was payable at entry, although conventionally payable at the following Whitsunday, because he found his crop ready for him at entry. He was regarded as having been constructively in possession during the half-year preceding his entry, when his crop was growing for him, so that the half-year's rent legally due at entry was to be regarded as due in respect of his constructive possession during the preceding half-year. In other words the rent of pastoral farms was not payable in advance; it was due in respect of the half-year preceding the term of payment. To apply that to the present case, the rents payable at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally at Whitsunday 1905 were for the possession between Whitsunday and Martinmas 1904, and belonged wholly to the pursuer, and the rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 and conventionally at Martinmas 1906 were for the possession between Martinmas 1904 and Whitsunday 1905, and fell to be apportioned, assuming that the minute of sale had been superseded by the disposition. The minute was superseded by the disposition, which gave the defender right to the rents carried by the statutory clause of assignation and to no more, and it was in effect to read into the disposition a clause of apportionment which the disposition might have contained but did not. In the case of Campbell v. Campbell, on which the defender founded, the missives contained a separate contract for the delivery of certain moveables with which the defender there did not deal, whereas here the disposition did deal with the matter of rents.

¹ Jamieson v. Welsh, Nov. 30, 1900, 3 F. 176.

² Campbell v. Campbell, 11 D. 1426, per Lord Wood, at p. 1426; Mackenzie's Trustees v. Somerville, 2 F. 1278, per Lord Kyllachy, at p. 1281, Lord Adam, at p. 1285, and Lord Kinneir, at p. 1287.

At advising,—

Jan. 10, 1908.

Wigan v.
Crippa.

LORD LOW.—The pursuer sold the estate of Glendaruel to the defender, with entry at 2d February 1905. The farms upon the estate were all pastoral, the term of entry under the leases being Whitsunday, and the first half-year's rent being payable at Martinmas thereafter and the second half at the succeeding Whitsunday.

In this action the pursuer claims that he has right to the half-year's rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 but legally payable at Martinmas 1904, and he also claims the proportion corresponding to the period from Martinmas 1904 to 2d February 1905 of the half-year's rent conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 but legally payable at Whitsunday 1905.

The defender, upon the other hand, maintains that he is entitled, under the assignation of rents in the disposition in his favour, to the half-year's rent conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 but legally payable at Whitsunday of that year, and that he is also entitled, under a special contract made between him and the pursuer, to the portion of the half-year's rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 but legally payable at Martinmas 1904, corresponding to the period from the date of his entry (2d February 1905) to Whitsunday 1905.

I am of opinion that the defender's claim to the half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 is well founded, and that the pursuer is entitled to no part of that half-year's rent.

It is settled that when a proprietor dies between Whitsunday and Martinmas his executor is entitled to the half-year's rent legally payable at the term of Whitsunday before his death, and that if he dies between Martinmas and Whitsunday the executor is entitled to the half-year's rent legally payable at Martinmas. The same rule applies in the case of seller and purchaser, and accordingly, apart from the special contract which I shall consider presently, the pursuer is entitled to the half-year's rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905. The defender does not dispute that that is the case.

The pursuer, however, also claims a proportion of the half-year's rent legally due at Whitsunday 1905, which is conventionally postponed until Martinmas 1905. That claim is founded upon the clause in the disposition assigning the rents. The clause is in the form "And I assign the rents," provided by the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, which declares that the clause shall "be held to import an assignation to the rents to become due for the possession following the term of entry, according to the legal and not the conventional terms."

In order to test the pursuer's claim I shall assume that the question arises in regard to the rent of a farm which had been let to a tenant under a lease with entry at Whitsunday 1904. The first half-year's rent would be legally payable at Whitsunday 1904, and the second half-year's rent at Martinmas 1904. The pursuer is admittedly (apart from special contract) entitled to these two half-years' rent, but his claim is that he is in addition entitled to a proportion of a third half-year's rent, which he says is payable in respect of the possession of the farm from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905.

Jan. 10, 1903. That looks very like a claim for three half-years' rent in respect possession of the farm.

Wigan v.
Cripps.

Lord Low.

The pursuer's counsel, however, explained that the claim is the ground that the first half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday (the term of entry) is truly for possession for the half-year from 1903 to Whitsunday 1904. I confess that that is to me an extraordinary idea. Plainly a tenant in a farm does not in fact pay rent in possession of the farm prior to his term of entry, because not on possession and no right to possess until the term of entry, but until that date the farm is in the possession of the outgoing tenant. For rent is properly payable for possession. I take it that rent from a legal point of view is the consideration which the tenant pays, in money or money's worth, for the possession and use of the subject of the lease, and that is as applicable to a farm as to any other subject. Again, whether rent is payable backhand or forehand, or at the legal term, a farm is not a yearly rent, and the tenant, at one time or another, pays rent for every year and half-year during which he possesses the farm.

It seems to me that the idea that, by what must be a legal fiction, a tenant entering a grass farm at Whitsunday is to be regarded as paying for a half-year's rent, which is legally due at that term, in respect of possession of the farm for the preceding half-year, arises out of the fact that, for the purpose of regulating the division of rents between the heir and the executor of a deceased proprietor, or between the fiar and the executor of a liferenter, a somewhat artificial rule has been adopted in which rent is payable not to possession but to crop.

For that purpose all farms are regarded as being either wholly or partly corn lands as they used to be called, or grass farms. In the case of corn lands the rent was always at Martinmas (or as it was sometimes expressed "the rent of the crop"), because the outgoing tenant was then presumed to have gathered his crop, and the incoming tenant required to get possession of the lands for the purpose of preparing them for the next crop. It was considered that a tenant could not be required to pay any rent until he had sown a crop, and accordingly the legal term of payment of the first half-year's rent was held to be the term of Whitsunday following the term of entry, when the incoming tenant was presumed to have completed the sowing of his crop, and the legal term of payment of the second half-year's rent was held to be the succeeding term of Martinmas, when the tenant was presumed to have reaped the crop. The rule applied even although entry to corn and grass lands was (in conformity with the almost universal custom) at the term of Whitsunday preceding the entry to the corn lands, but, as I have said, the corn lands alone were regarded. No doubt the result was that in a case was that at the beginning of the lease the tenant had paid rent in possession for six months, for which he paid no rent at the time, but that at the right at the end of the lease, and in a succession of leases the landlord was entitled to a half-year's rent for every half-year of possession.

In the case of grass farms, the entry to which is by custom at Whitsunday, Mr Bell, in his Treatise upon Leases, points out that if the principle applied to the full year's rent should not be payable until the crop has been gathered, then in grass farms the second half-year's rent should not be payable until the term of Whitsunday, twelve months after entry, "because" (I quote the Jan. 10, 1908. learned author's words) "the tenant is constantly, during the whole period, ^{Wigan v.} enjoying the benefit of the crop." The more logical course therefore would ^{Cripps.} have been to hold that the first half-year's rent in a grass farm was legally ^{Lord Low.} payable at Martinmas six months, and the second half-year's rent at Whitsunday twelve months after entry. But, says Mr Bell, the Court have held otherwise, because "the practice of the country has so fixed the point."

I may add that my impression from a study of the old cases is that the legal terms in grass farms were originally fixed at the Whitsunday of entry and the following Martinmas, because the position of the tenant at his entry and at the following term of Martinmas respectively was supposed to be analogous to the position of a tenant in a corn farm at the term of Whitsunday after his entry and at the following term of Martinmas respectively. The tenant of a grass farm at his entry finds upon the land a growing crop of grass, which was regarded as being analogous to a completely sown corn crop, and by the term of Martinmas he has obtained the benefit of the summer pasturage, from which his profit is chiefly derived, and therefore his position at that term was regarded as being analogous to the position of the tenant of a corn farm, who at the term of Martinmas had reaped his corn crop.

But however that may be, there was this advantage in the legal terms of payment adopted in the case of grass farms, that one rule was fixed for all cases, the rule being that if the landlord survived Whitsunday one-half of the rent applicable to the crop of the year in which he died belonged to his executor, and if he survived Martinmas the whole rent applicable to that crop belonged to his executor.

The rule is nowhere more clearly stated than in the report in Brown's Supplement (vol. v., p. 876), of the case of Kerr v. Turnbull.¹ In that case a tenant entered to a grass farm at Whitsunday, and by the lease the rent was payable one-half at the following Martinmas and the remaining half at the succeeding Whitsunday. The landlord died after Martinmas, and it was held that his executor was entitled to the half-year's rent payable under the lease at the following Whitsunday.

In a note to the report the reporter (Monboddo) states the ground of judgment thus—"The simple rule in this case, and which will apply equally to corn and grass farms, is the crop, without attending to the division of the year, which is arbitrary as to its commencement. According to this rule, the crop, whether of grass or corn, belongs to that year in which it grows and is reaped; and the rent of that crop is divided betwixt the heir and executor, by the legal terms, of the Whitsunday when the crop was sown, and of Martinmas when it is reaped; so that without inquiring about years at all, it is sufficient to consider whether the rent for that crop be still in the tenant's hands, or if it be uplifted by the defunct. . . ."

Now, that statement of the law shews, in the first place, that, for the purpose of apportioning rents between heir and executor, every crop is assumed to be grown and reaped within the calendar year, or, to put it more definitely,

¹ 5 Brown's Sup. 876.

Jan. 10, 1908.

Wigan v.
Cripps.

Lord Low.

the crop, whether corn or grass, is assumed to have been reaped at Martinmas in each calendar year. Therefore, for the purpose foresaid, it is necessary to consider what may be called the farm year—that is, twelve months from and after the term of entry, for possession of the first year's rent is in fact paid. Let me give a practical illustration. The tenant of a corn farm enters upon full possession of the farm at Martinmas 1904, but his first corn crop is grown and reaped entirely in 1905. Therefore, in a question between heir and executor, the possession of the farm during 1904 is disregarded, and the whole rent is due in 1905, being payable for the crop of 1905. Again, the tenant of a grass farm enters upon full possession at Whitsunday 1904, and his first crop, which is growing when he enters, is assumed to have been wholly reaped at Martinmas in 1905. Therefore, in a question between heir and executor the rent is due in 1905, being wholly payable for the crop of 1905, and the possession of the farm during 1904 is disregarded. It therefore seems to me that the rule for apportioning rents between heir and executor, and the like, is a general rule, fixed for that purpose alone, and has no application to the question of what possession of the farm is a particular payment of a year's rent made?

That, however, is the question raised under the assignment of the rents in the disposition. I have already quoted the statutory declaration of the meaning of the clause assigning the rents, and it will be observed, in the first place, that the rents assigned are only rents "to become due after the term of entry," therefore the assignment does not include the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904, because these rents had become due prior to the term of entry of the defender. In the second place, the rents assigned are rents "to become due for the possession following the term of entry," namely, 21st March 1905. The first rent answering to that description appears to me to be a half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday 1905, because, in the case which I have been supposing, of the tenant entering under a lease at Whitsunday 1904, he would have already paid one year's rent at Martinmas 1904, and would have been in actual possession of the farm for one year at Whitsunday 1905.

Certain dicta in the recent case of Mackenzie's Trustees v. Scott were quoted as supporting the view that the half-year's rent legally due at Whitsunday 1905 was truly for possession of the farm from the term of entry at Martinmas. The main question in Mackenzie's case¹ was whether the farms upon the estate of Portmore, which had been sold with effect from Martinmas 1897, were arable or pastoral? It was held that they were arable, and that accordingly rents legally due at Martinmas 1897, but actually payable at Whitsunday 1898, were not carried to the purchase price by the assignment of rents in the disposition.

The judgment, therefore—it being held that the farms were arable—was merely an application of the well-established rule upon which I have already commented, and it is to be observed that the purchasers' title was not affected at the term of Martinmas, there was no question in regard to the divided term.

The pursuer founds upon certain dicta of Lord Kyllachy, who was Lord Jan. 10, 1908. Ordinary, and of Lords Adam and Kinnear. Lord Kyllachy said ¹—"The rents in question, which were conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1898, Cripps. were legally due at Martinmas 1897, and were so due as being the second half of the rent payable for the grass crop of 1897. To put it otherwise, they were legally due for the possession from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1897—the possession during the winter and spring 1897-98 being thrown in as an unimportant accessory." Lord Low.

Now, the first of these sentences is an accurate statement of the rule that in questions between heir and executor or seller and purchaser the rent is to be regarded as payable for the year in which the crop is assumed to be reaped. In the second sentence I think that Lord Kyllachy evidently had in view the theory or hypothesis upon which the rule is founded in the case of grass farms, namely, that the whole of the grass crop has been reaped, in the sense that the tenant has received the whole benefit of it, by Martinmas. But however that may be, Lord Kyllachy does not say that the rent which is legally payable, one-half at Whitsunday and one-half at Martinmas, is not paid for possession from Martinmas to the following Whitsunday. What he says is, that the possession from Martinmas to Whitsunday is "thrown in." That is to say, possession for the latter period is thrown into and therefore is included in and forms part of the possession for which the rent is paid. If that be so, then it is obviously immaterial that the possession between Martinmas and Whitsunday is of little value to the tenant, because the rent stipulated is always the rent for the year, and it is only payable in two equal portions because it is the inveterate custom to do so.

Certain expressions used by the learned Judges in the Inner-House were also founded on. Thus Lord Adam, referring to the half-year's rents conventionally due at Whitsunday 1898, but legally due at Martinmas 1897, said,²—"These rents were the rents due for the possession of the crop of 1897." The phrase "for the possession of the crop," is unusual, but I think that his Lordship's meaning would have been the same, only more accurately expressed, if he had said "for the crop of 1897," leaving out the word "possession." That, I think, is clear from the next sentence, in which his Lordship says,—"The rent is due for the year in which the crop, whether agricultural or sheep, is raised." That is, in my opinion, a correct statement of the rule of law applicable to the kind of question which was under consideration.

In the same case Lord Kinnear said³—"The rent in question, although collected by this defender, was rent derived from possession prior to his entry as purchaser, although it was payable at a term after that entry." It humbly appears to me that that was not a correct statement of the legal situation. His Lordship was dealing with the effect of the clause assigning the rents as interpreted by the statute, and it seems to me that the true ground for holding that the rent in question was not assigned to the purchaser by the statutory clause was, in the words of the statute, that it was not rent "to become due for the possession following the time of entry." I

¹ 2 F. at p. 1281.

² 2 F. at p. 1285.

³ 2 F. at p. 1287.

Jan. 10, 1908.

Wigan v.
Crippa.

Lord Low.

think that that was what Lord Kinnear was referring to, but no question between the parties as to rent due for a divided term. The pursuer's counsel did not pay so much attention to the form of the expression used as he would otherwise have done.

I have commented on the dicta—which are no more than Mackenzie's case¹ at so great length, because they constitute the only authority in the way of authority which the pursuer's counsel was able to put forward in support of the proposition which is the foundation of his claim, namely, that a person who enters to a grass farm at Whitsunday, and then becomes liable for a half-year's rent, is to be regarded as being so liable in respect of his constructive possession for the half-year preceding his entry. I do not think that the dicta in Mackenzie's case¹ support that view, and I have given my reasons for holding that it is a proposition which is contrary to fact and principle.

I am therefore of opinion that the half-year's rent legally assigned to the pursuer at Whitsunday 1905 was assigned to the defender, and that the pursuer is entitled to no part thereof.

I now come to the defender's claim for a portion of the rents at Martinmas 1904. The defender admits that he has no right to the rents at common law or under the assignation of rents in his position, but he says that he is entitled to a share of the rents payable to the period from 2d February to Whitsunday 1905 in respect of an agreement entered into between him and the pursuer. That agreement is contained in the 8th article of a formal minute of sale executed by the parties in July and August 1904.

The article is in the following terms:—"The second party assigns to the first party the right to the rents and duties of the said lands, and shall be liable for the payment of the feu-duties and public burdens for the possession for the said term of entry, the first party having right to the rents and duties of the said lands, and being liable in payment of the feu-duties and public burdens for the possession prior to the said term of entry, notwithstanding that payment of the rent for the possession prior to the said term of entry may be conventionally postponed to a date subsequent to the said term. The rents, rates, and taxes for the possession of said lands for the half-year from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905 shall be paid by the first party between the first and second parties."

It was maintained for the pursuer that that article was a valid disposition, and cannot be founded upon or enforced. The only disposition which could be regarded as superseding the article in question is the clause assigning the rents, and if it could be shown that the agreement is inconsistent with the effect attributed by the statute to the clause assigning the rents, I should without hesitation hold that the agreement was superseded by the disposition in so far as all events are inconsistent with, or modifies the effect of, the clause assigning the rents.

Now, I would observe in the first place that the agreement deals only with rents, which alone are the subject of the assignation in question, but with public burdens. The agreement is that the p be liable for the public burdens for the possession prior to the term of Jan. 10, 1908. entry, and that the defender shall be liable for the public burdens for the possession following the term of entry. It was not contended that that ^{Wigan v. Cripps.} part of the agreement was affected by the disposition, and I understand ^{Lord Low.} that as regards public burdens the agreement has actually been carried out. If that be the case it puts the pursuer in a somewhat awkward position, because plainly the defender undertook to pay the public burdens applicable to the period subsequent to his entry only upon the condition that he should have right to the rents applicable to the same period. The two things appear to me to be inseparable, and therefore I do not see how the pursuer can insist upon the defender paying a share of the public burdens and deny him an equivalent share of the rents.

That consideration, however, appears to me not to arise, because I am of opinion that the agreement is quite consistent with the disposition; that is to say, implement of the agreement would not prevent full effect being given to the assignation of rents in the disposition.

The only question which arises under the clause assigning the rents is what rents are thereby carried to the purchaser? I have already expressed the opinion that the half-year's rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 were carried to the defender, and that the pursuer had no right to any portion of these half-year's rents. Of course the inference is that the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904 belonged wholly to the pursuer. And there is no doubt that that was the case, because if the pursuer had died at the date of the defender's entry and the competition had been between his heir and executor, plainly the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904 would have gone to the executor because they would have been in bonis of the pursuer at his death. If, therefore, the rents referred to in the agreement were the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904, the parties were bargaining about money which at the date contemplated, namely, the defender's entry to the lands, would have vested in the pursuer, and would if he had then died have been in bonis of him. If, therefore, the agreement was in regard to the Martinmas rents, it is not superseded or affected by the disposition, because it deals with moveable estate, with which the disposition had nothing to do.

The question therefore is, are the rents referred to in the agreement those legally payable at Martinmas 1904? The answer seems to me to depend upon the question which I have already so fully discussed, namely, whether the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904, and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, were or were not for possession of the farms between these two terms? As I have already answered the latter question in the affirmative, it follows that the rents referred to in the agreement are those legally payable at Martinmas 1904, and accordingly the defender is, in my judgment, entitled to have these rents divided between him and the pursuer in terms of the agreement.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the second and third pleas in law for the defender should be sustained.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

Jan. 10, 1908. LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

Wigan v.
Cripps,

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinance which sustained the second and third pleas in law for the defence.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58. JOHN PAXTON AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Morris v. Maitland.

Jan. 14, 1908.

ISABELLA ANNIE BROWN, Defender (Reclaimant).—C. D. Muir v. J. H. Henderson.

Paxton v.
Brown.

Process—Summons—Competency—Several Pursuers—Common interest—"Convenience"—Amendment of summons—A. S., March 1893, sec. 2.—A testator died leaving a deed of settlement by which he bequeathed a share of his estate to his daughter, and appointed his executors and her tutors and curators. At the time of his death his daughter was under pupillarity, and his executors acted as her tutors and curators, and a law-agent as factor for the purpose of managing the estate. When the daughter attained majority the factor continued to act as her agent and manage for her her income from the estate.

Subsequently an action was brought against the daughter at the instance of the tutors and curators and of the factor, of which the conclusion was for payment to the tutors and curators of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by them to her during the subsistence of the curatory, and for payment to the factor of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid to her after the termination of the curatory.

Held (1) (rev. judgment of Lord Johnston) that the action was incompetent, in respect that it was at the instance of unconnected persons each suing for a separate debt; but (2) that the summons could be competently amended by striking out one set of pursuers; and amendment in that effect allowed.

Cowan & Sons v. Duke of Buccleuch, Nov. 30, 1876, 4 R. (H. L.) 101, is cited and commented on.

1st Division.
Ld. Johnston.

ON 3d October 1893 James Brown of Tweedhill executed a deed of settlement whereby he bequeathed to his daughter, Isabella Brown, the sum of £2500, to be payable to her on her attainment of twenty-one years, when the said provision was to be made. He further declared that the provision was to form a real burden on his lands and estate of Tweedhill and on his salmon fishing on the River Tweed, and on any other heritable estate which he might possess, and that it was to bear interest at the rate of £4 per annum from the date of his death until payment. He appointed John Paxton, physician and surgeon, Norham, and William Crawford, Sheriff-clerk of Berwickshire, to be tutors and curators to his said daughter, and granted power to them to act as factors for managing the estate. By the same deed he appointed the said John Paxton and William Crawford to be his sole executors.

James Brown, the testator, died on 3d November 1893, leaving his daughter, the said Isabella Annie Brown, still under pupillarity. The said John Paxton and William Crawford accepted their appointment as executors and as tutors and curators for the testator's estate, and appointed James Herriot, solicitor in Duns, to be factor for managing the estate.

The testator's daughter attained majority on 19th May 1900, and the curatory came to an end, but the said James Herriot, date till 11th November 1906, acted as her law-agent, and continued Jan. 14, 1908. to intromit with the income falling to her from the provision under her father's settlement, and to make payments to her and on her behalf during that period. Paxton v. Brown.

On 23d May 1907 an action was brought against the said Isabella Annie Brown at the instance of John Paxton and William Crawford, "the tutors and curators nominated by and lately acting under deed of settlement executed by the now deceased James Brown of Tweedhill, in the parish of Hutton and county of Berwick, dated 3d October 1893, and recorded in the Books of Council and Session 3d December 1894, to his daughter, Isabella Annie Brown, presently residing at No. 173 Colinton Road, Edinburgh, with consent and concurrence of James Herriot, solicitor, Duns, for any interest he may have, and the said James Herriot as an individual." The conclusions of the summons were:—" (First) to make payment to the pursuers the said John Paxton and William Crawford of the sum of £245, 15s."; and "(second) to make payment to the pursuer the said James Herriot of the sum of £204, 4s. 7d."

With regard to the sum first concluded for, the pursuers averred that the income on the defender's provision of £2500 amounted, at the prescribed rate of 4 per cent, to £100 per annum, and that during the subsistence of the curatory the pursuers John Paxton and William Crawford made payments to and on behalf of the defender in excess of the said £100 per annum. "Said payments were, in the circumstances, necessary and proper, and were made solely to educate and maintain the defender in her position in life as the daughter of a landed proprietor. Said payments over and above the said £100 per annum amounted, as at 15th May 1904, when the curatory accounts were closed, to £245, 15s." They further explained that these advances made to the defender were so made at her urgent request. With regard to the sum second concluded for, the pursuers averred that after 15th May 1904 "the defender's income was insufficient for her needs, and the pursuer James Herriot made payments to and on behalf of the defender in excess of her income. These overpayments amounted, as at 20th April 1907, to the sum of £204, 4s. 7d."

In answer to the claim for the tutors and curators the defender averred, inter alia :—"The said pursuers had no right or authority to make payments to the defender or on her behalf either extravagant in amount or in excess of income, as many of said payments were, and any such payments were made by them in breach of their duty to the defender."

In answer to the claim for James Herriot she averred, inter alia :—"It was the duty of said pursuer to have advised the defender as to her position and as to the income arising on her capital moneys. No such information was at any time given by the said pursuer to the defender, and it was only in 1906 that the defender was, for the first time, informed that she had overdrawn her income account to a considerable extent." She also stated certain objections to the accounts produced, and reserved her right to state detailed objections thereto, and averred her willingness to pay whatever sums might be found to be due by her on a proper accounting and after audit and taxation of the accounts.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuers John Paxton and William Crawford having, as tutors and curators, and the pursuer Mr Herriot having as their factor and as an individual, made the advances to the

Jan. 14, 1908. defender and disbursements on her behalf shewn in the said accounts, they are entitled to repayment of the balance therein brought out.
Paxton v. Brown.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent, in respect that it is laid at the instance of separate and unconnected pursuers upon separate and independent claims of debt.

On 4th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the first plea in law for the defender, and appointed the defender to lodge objections to the accounts, and allowed the pursuers to lodge answers thereto. He also granted leave to reclaim.*

* “OPINION.—(After narrating the creation of the provision in favour of Miss Brown)—The history of the administration of the provision for Miss Brown is to be found in a series of accounts of charge and discharge, Nos. 9 to 17 of process, at first between the curators of Miss Brown and Mr Herriot, their factor, and afterwards between Miss Brown herself and Mr Herriot as her law-agent, Nos. 9 to 15 of process being between Miss Brown's curators and Mr Herriot, and Nos. 16 and 17 between Miss Brown and Mr Herriot. But though there is this distinction made in the heading of the accounts, owing to the young lady having attained majority at 19th May 1904, the accounts are really consecutive, and carry the balance due by Miss Brown on the curatorial account into the personal account. There were over-advances made to or on behalf of Miss Brown, both during the later period of the curatory and afterwards. These advances were out of the pocket of Mr Herriot during both periods. The curators and Mr Herriot want now to recover these advances from Miss Brown, and as their accounts and actings are disputed, it has become necessary to clear up matters in Court. Had the alleged balance been the other way, the young lady would have sued her curators and Mr Herriot for accounting and payment of the balance due to her; but, in the circumstances as they stand, the curators and Mr Herriot can only sue for the amount of the advances they allege, and the accounting arises on Miss Brown's counter claim. But the action is none the less in substance, though not in form, an action of accounting. I lay stress upon this, because it appears to me materially to affect the question with which I have at present to deal.

“The curators and Mr Herriot sue as joint pursuers in the same action. The instance is as follows:—Dr Paxton and Mr Crawford, as tutors and curators nominated by the settlement of the late James Brown of Tweedhill, to his daughter, Isabella Annie Brown, ‘with consent and concurrence of James Herriot, solicitor, Duns, for any interest he may have, and the said James Herriot as an individual,—Pursuers; against the said Isabella Annie Brown,—Defender.’ The conclusions, however, are separate. (First) to make payment to the pursuers Dr Paxton and Mr Crawford of the sum of £245, 15s., being the alleged balance in their favour on their curatorial intromissions with Miss Brown's income from her father's death in 1893 to her majority in 1904; and (second) to make payment to the pursuer Mr Herriot of the sum of £204, 4s. 7d., being the alleged balance on his intromissions as law-agent with the young lady's income from the Whitsunday when she attained majority to Whitsunday 1906, when I understand her affairs were taken out of Mr Herriot's hands.

“The defender pleads ‘(1) The action is incompetent, in respect that it is laid at the instance of separate and unconnected pursuers upon separate and independent claims of debt.’

“I asked the defender's counsel whether the defender had any interest to press a plea, which, if sustained, and assuming liability to be established, could only be the occasion of increased expense to their client. They candidly admitted, as I think must be apparent, that there was no inconvenience in taking the accounting in this form, but they indicated that the

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Jan. 14, 1908. Division on 18th December 1907.

Argued for the defender and reclamer ;—The action was incompetent. It had been laid down in the *Feuars of Orkney*¹ as long ago as 1741 that two separate and independent pursuers could not sue in the same action unless they were connected in the matter sued for or were aggrieved by the same act, and that rule had been followed ever since.² Here the pursuers were separate and independent, and it was not alleged that they had been aggrieved by the same act. The question must therefore be, were they connected in the matter sued for? The debts alleged to be due to the two sets of pursuers were entirely separate debts, and that was made all the more evident by the fact that the defences put forward to them were different. If separate actions had been raised they could not, according to the test of contingency laid down in *Duke of Athole v. Robertson*³ have been

Paxton v.
Brown.

defender had a tactical reason for stating the plea, and they pressed for a judgment. This the defender is entitled to, whatever may be her reasons for stating the plea. The defender's counsel in particular referred me to the recent cases of Killin v. Weir, 7 F. 526, and Brims & Mackay v. McNeill & Sme, 1907, S. C. 1106, and they maintained that these authorities determined that it was only competent to conjoin two or more unconnected persons as pursuers of an action where they have a joint interest in the matter libelled, or have been injured by the same act—Orkney Feuars v. Stewart of Burray, 1741, M. 11,986. The precise terms used by the Court in that case as descriptive of the two classes of cases were—'had connection with one another in the matter pursued for' and 'being aggrieved by the same act,' and the Lord President, in disposing of the case of Killin v. Weir, supra, expresses his opinion that all the cases quoted to the Court fall quite distinctly under one or other of these two categories. This may be so as a generalisation, and it was quite sufficient and appropriate for the disposal of the two cases in question, which clearly came under the above descriptions of the two classes of cases. But there are other cases to which it is not so easy to apply the above rule in its generality. In Killin v. Weir, supra, four pursuers sued in one action for separate sums of damages, on the allegation that they had each been induced to purchase shares in a mining syndicate by false and fraudulent statements, made to each of them separately, at different times and places, though admittedly of a similar nature. They had neither a joint interest in the matter libelled, nor had they been aggrieved by the same act. But I think that the reason of the decision is not so much any technical rule as practical convenience. It would clearly be extremely inconvenient, as was very fully shewn by the Lord Chancellor in Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, 4 R. (H. L.) 14, at p. 16, to try four different cases of damages, arising out of different circumstances, however much these might be related, in one action. But had the misrepresentations alleged been confined to the contents of a prospectus on which all four pursuers had relied, the inconvenience would have disappeared, and the action would, I think, have been sustained on the analogy of cases of slander, where though two persons cannot conclude jointly and severally for the same sum as damages for the same slander (Flethers of Dumfries, 10th December 1816, F. C.), they may competently do so for separate sums (Harkes v. Mowat, 24 D. 701).

"In Brims & Mackay's case, again, the pursuers, being the parties in ¹ Orkney Feuars v. Stewart of Burray, 1741, M. 11,986.

² Ersk. Inst. iv. 1, 65; Shand's Practice, 203-4; Killin v. Weir, Feb. 22, 1905, 7 F. 526.

³ Dec. 16, 1869, 8 Macph. 304.

Jan. 14, 1908.

Paxton v.
Brown.

conjoined. If that were so it was equally incompetent to conjoin them ab ante in one action. The question of "convenience" did not come in; the matter depended on principle. Convenience was not adopted as the guide in Cowan & Sons v. Duke of Buccleuch.¹ The decision in *Harkes*² really turned on the fact that both pursuers were aggrieved by the same act. Further, the action if incompetent must be dismissed, and the pursuers should not be allowed to amend their summons. An incompetent summons on which proceedings have followed could not be amended so as to make the proceedings good.³ This was not a case for the Court to grant an indulgence to the pursuers, and the Act of Sederunt of 1907 was not meant to apply to such circumstances as these.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—The action was brought in this form solely for the purpose of saving the defender expense, and every consideration of convenience pointed to it being allowed to right of a dissolved firm, and the new firm which carried on the business in succession, sued an individual and the firm which he afterwards joined for one sum, conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally. On the media concludendi, into which I need not go, it was apparent that the whole sum could neither be due to both sets of pursuers nor by both sets of defenders. It is therefore at once apparent that decree could not on such a summons be competently pronounced either in favour of the pursuers or against the defenders, nor could it be competently enforced.

"A consideration of these two cases leads me to the conclusion that the rule above stated in general terms is based upon two considerations: first, on the consideration of convenience; and second, on the consideration of whether the conclusion can be competently deduced from the media concludendi, and the decree ensuing be competently enforced. In truth, the term incompetency, strictly speaking, is hardly descriptive of all the cases in which the objection to combining pursuers or defenders may be taken. It is truly a question of convenience in some cases, and of competency only in others. If it were not so, I do not think that the case of the Duke of Buccleuch, &c., v. Cowan, &c., above referred to, could have resulted in the decision which was then pronounced. The Lord Chancellor (Cairns) and the other Lords who took part in the decision, rest particularly upon the question of convenience, and the Lord Chancellor even goes so far as to say that it is in part a question of the Court's discretion, and he makes a very pertinent reference to the provision for remits ob contingentiam. The general rule above expressed must, I think, when it comes to be applied, be read and applied in the light of the reason or principle upon which it is based.

"Now, here it is perfectly clear, and is indeed admitted, that it would be eminently convenient to make this consecutive accounting the subject of the same action, and that had two actions been raised, a remit ob contingentiam, and even a conjunction for the purpose of inquiry, would have been appropriate. In these circumstances, I should hesitate to throw out the action because it had been commenced in conjunction, unless I felt myself compelled, merely on a theoretical objection. Had Miss Brown been pursuer she could competently and conveniently have called upon her curators and her law-agent to account for their several consecutive intromissions in the same action, provided she had a several conclusion against them, and I do not see why it should be less convenient and less competent for them to bring about the same accounting by such an action as the present, in which proceed. "Connected in the matter sued for" was a general phrase, and must not be interpreted as meaning only a strictly legal connection. The matters sued for here were really closely connected. The factor had managed the estate first for the curators and then for the defender; it was all one course of administration, and the accounting that would be necessary if the case proceeded was really all one accounting. Therefore both justice and convenience pointed to the expediency of trying these matters in one action, and if there was sufficient connection to make joint action expedient, that was all that was necessary to satisfy the requirements of the law.¹ In Brims & Mackay,² if the pursuers had separated their claims, the action would have been allowed to proceed as one action. In Mitchell v. Grierson,³ where they were separated as here, the action was allowed to proceed. If this action were allowed to proceed in its present form the defender could not suffer thereby any conceivable prejudice. If, however, it were to be held that the action could not proceed in this form, amendment of the summons, by deleting one set of pursuers,

¹ Nov. 30, 1876, 4 R. (H. L.) 14.

² Harkes v. Mowat, March 4, 1862, 24 D. 701.

³ Fischer & Co. v. Andersen, Jan. 15, 1896, 23 R. 395.

Jan. 14, 1908.

Paxton v.
Brown.

they each reduce their demand to a several conclusion. The convenience and economy is manifest, and the conclusions follow competently on the media concludendi, and the ensuing decree can, I think, be competently pronounced and enforced.

"There is an incidental point which gave me at first some trouble, though from one point of view it supports the conclusion to which I have come. In this matter Mr Herriot is the real creditor, and had I been drawing the summons, I think that I should have sued in his name against (first) Miss Brown and her curators for the period of her minority; and (second) against Miss Brown herself for the period of her majority, in which case there could have been, I think, no doubt about the convenience and competency of the action. But Mr Herriot has gone on the footing that he was the factor of the curators during Miss Brown's minority, and that he is entitled to be kept indemnitas by them for advances which were made on their responsibility and on their account, and that they are therefore the proper parties to sue Miss Brown with a view to the adjustment of the curatorial accounts between them and her. Though I do not think that the mode of proceeding is so direct and simple as the one which I would have adopted, it is, I think, equally consistent with the legal situation; and as the curators sue with consent and concurrence of Mr Herriot for his interest, no question can arise. The case bears to be distinguished from Hilop v. Mac-Ritchie, 8 R. (H. L.) 95. Mr Herriot's interest throughout the whole period creates indeed such a bond between the two ostensible sets of pursuers that they cannot truly be said to be unconnected. I think that I am entitled to look at the substance of the action, and in so doing I find it one to obtain an accounting with Miss Brown for a consecutive series of intrusions which are consecutive in fact and only broken in theory by her coming of age, and the ultimate interest in which is in Mr Herriot on the one side and Miss Brown on the other. There is every convenience in trying that question of accounting in one action, and having regard to the conclusions, there is no incompetency in entertaining them, and no difficulty in giving effect to the decree which would ensue, whatever the result of the accounting may be.

"I shall therefore repel the first plea in law for the defender and appoint her to lodge objections to the accounts, No. 9 to 17 of process, which the pursuers produce and found upon."

¹ Cowan & Sons v. Duke of Buccleuch, 4 R. (H. L.) p. 14, Lord Blackburn, at p. 27.

² Brims & Mackay v. Pattullo, 1907, S. C. 1106.

³ Jan. 13, 1894, 21 R. 367.

Jan. 14, 1908. which was clearly competent under the Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907, ought to be allowed.

Paxton v.
Brown.

At the close of the argument on 18th December 1907 the following opinions were delivered:—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the defender, Miss Brown, was, under the settlement of her father, given certain tutors and curators for the period of pupillarity and minority, which ensued owing to the death of her father taking place while she was still a pupil. Her fortune consisted of heritable property only, and it became the duty of the tutors and curators to administer that property, to draw the profits therefrom, and to provide for Miss Brown's maintenance. The tutors and curators, who are the first pursuers in this action, appointed a Mr Herriot, a solicitor, to act as their factor, and they fulfilled the office of tutor and curator during the pupillarity and minority of Miss Brown, and in particular they paid over certain moneys for her maintenance, and also paid certain sums to herself. After she became major the practical management of the property remained, as it had been all along, in the hands of Mr Herriot, and from time to time he too made payments to Miss Brown.

Now, the present action is brought by the tutors and curators, and also by Mr Herriot, and it concludes for separate sums as due to these different pursuers. The ground of action on which the tutors and curators base their claim is that an accounting for the period from their assumption of office until the majority of Miss Brown would shew that Miss Brown is indebted to them in a certain sum, representing payments made to her during that period in excess of the income drawn from the property. The ground of Mr Herriot's claim is that during the period after she came of age he made certain payments to her in excess of the income from the property.

The defences to the two claims are also different. There is, of course, the general defence, which may be described as putting the pursuers to a strict accounting as regards the due vouching of all the payments stated. But there are also defences which are quite different. With regard to the claim of the tutors and curators, she says:—"You, as tutors and curators, had no right to advance to me more than the bare income amounted to. If you did so it was your own fault, and you cannot recover such advances as a debt due by me." As to the factor's claim that defence is not available, and the defence there put forward is that he ought to have informed her that he was making payments to her in excess of her income, and that having failed to do so he is not entitled to recover them. I do not express any opinion as to the relative cogency of these two defences. I merely point out that they are different.

A preliminary objection has been taken by the defender, and it is that, according to a well-settled rule of law, two separate pursuers cannot conjoin in the same action in respect of separate and independent grounds of debt. The Lord Ordinary has repelled that plea; but I must confess that I am unable to follow the reasons which he states for that decision. He first cites the old case of the Feuars of Orkney,¹ which laid down the law long ago that "different parties could not accumulate their actions in one libel, unless they had connection with one another in the matter pursued for, or Jan. 14, 1908. had been aggrieved by the same Act." Now, that is a very old authority, ^{Paxton v.} and not only so, but it has been carried down through the books to the Brown. present day. Erskine was quoted to us as an independent authority, but I ^{Ld. President.} take it he was simply following as his authority the decision in the *Feuars of Orkney*¹—his work being written some thirty years after that decision. That rule has been carried down since then through all the authorities. Ivory and Shand give it in exactly the same words, and your Lordships had an opportunity to reiterate it quite recently in the case of Killin v. Weir.² I should have thought that if anything was settled that was settled; but yet, says the Lord Ordinary, after referring to *Killin v. Weir*² and Brims & Mackay,³ "there are other cases to which it is not so easy to apply the above rule in its generality." He does not, however, quote any other cases, and the learned counsel here, who I am sure have made a careful search, have been unable to quote any to us. So, in fact, it comes to this, that there are no other cases. Therefore, when the Lord Ordinary goes on to say that "the reason of the decision is not so much any technical rule as practical convenience," he takes upon himself a function that does not belong to him. Convenience is convenience, but a rule remains a rule. I think then that the Lord Ordinary's argument is not in accordance with the long line of authority. I only add that the *Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan*⁴ leaves, to my mind, the old authority untouched. There is, it is true, much talk of "convenience" in the opinions of the learned Lords in that case, but it must be borne in mind that they were English lawyers, and they begin their opinions by stating that the conjoining of pursuers in these circumstances is unknown in English practice though it does obtain in Scotland, and they then go on to examine the Scots authorities. They held in that case that it was possible for the pursuers to conjoin, for, of course, that case fell within the exceptions as expressed in the Feuars of Orkney,¹ and when they come to use the word "convenience" is when they go forward to consider whether there was any reason arising ab inconvenienti to prevent the exceptions applying there, and they found that there was not. But I need hardly say that that case does not trench on the old authorities in any way.

¹ M. 11,986.

We then come to the question put by Mr Morison, Does this case fall within the exceptions, either (first) that the pursuers are connected with one another in the matter pursued for, or (second) that they are aggrieved by the same act? Clearly they are not aggrieved by the same act—the tutors and curators' advance was one thing, and Mr Herriot's was another. But are they "connected in the matter pursued for"? These are general words, and though they are not the same thing as joint interest in its legal sense, yet the idea of joint interest does throw some light on them. I think that the pursuers here are not connected at all, the only suggestion of connection is that, historically, they succeeded one another. In the course of the argument I put the example of a person being sued by his butcher and his baker. The goods in question there would, of course, be supplied for the same house.

¹ M. 11,986.² 7 F. 526.³ 1907, S. C. 1106.⁴ 4 R. (H. L.) 14.

Jan. 14, 1908. hold, and possibly the principal witness would be the same in each case, namely, the housekeeper or house steward who had ordered the goods. But they would clearly be unconnected accounts, and I think that that example is completely analogous to the present case. I am well aware that the whole tendency of modern times is not to turn an action out of Court on a technical plea, and my whole sympathy, if I could have any sympathy, would be against turning this action out. But where there is a rule of law which has been adhered to for so long as this one has, we must be shewn some very weighty reason for not giving effect to it, and no such reason has been advanced here. It appears to me that this is nothing but a case of the parties to two separate actions seeking to enforce their claims in one summons, and therefore I am of opinion that the defender's plea must be sustained.

Paxton v.
Brown.

Ld. President.

But the question remains, what is to be done next? I think that here the modern practice of not multiplying actions and not putting parties to unnecessary expense comes to our help. But I think the pursuers must put their pen through the name of one set of pursuers and also through one set of averments, and if that is done I think it will remain quite a good action at the instance of the remaining pursuer. The defender will not be prejudiced in any way, and the expenses of preparing and serving new actions and paying the fee fund dues will be avoided. I think, then, that Mr Morison should be given time to consider which of the pursuers he is prepared to strike out, for I think that he has that option.

LORD M'LAREN.—The rule as to combining different claims in the same action is tersely and epigrammatically stated in the case of the Orkney Fcuars v. Stewart of Burray.¹ The general rule there laid down is that parties cannot accumulate their actions in one libel, and the two exceptions stated are (1) where there is some connection between the parties in the matter pursued for—which I take to mean some title or interest in common—and (2) where the parties suing are aggrieved by the same act. Here there are two unconnected pursuers, each suing for his own separate debt, and as the law-agent's advances only commenced when those of the curators ended, it cannot be said that there were concurrent accounts. Besides, if the grounds of the action are examined, the questions at issue will be found to be different. For in the first case the question is whether the curators acted within the scope of their duty in making these advances, while the second seems to raise a simple question of debt, viz., a claim by a law-agent for advances to his client.

I agree with your Lordship that two such claims cannot be combined in the same action, and that the opinion which the Lord Ordinary has adopted would tend to relax, and indeed to render inoperative, the rule by which we have hitherto been guided. The rule is not merely formal and arbitrary, but has this substance in it, that if an action is brought by a single pursuer, a defender may more easily come to a settlement, and have the case taken out of Court, while if there are several persons suing on different claims, any one of them by holding out (it may be for a just claim) may not only subject the defender to needless expense, but may prevent any settlement ^{Jan. 14, 1908.} being come to at all. In any view, I should be very averse to relaxing a ^{Paxton v.} rule which has worked well in practice, and in which, as I have indicated, ^{Brown.} there is a good deal of substance. I agree, however, that our modern practice affords a practical remedy, and that by striking out one of the two claims the action thus restricted may be made competent.

¹ M. 11,986.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD PEARSON concurred.

At the close of advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I ought to have added with regard to the old case of the *Feuars of Orkney*¹ that if, as the Lord Ordinary says, the doctrine of convenience is to be taken as the test, you could not have had a case where convenience pointed more directly to a conjoining of the pursuers, for the subject of proof there was really one continuous course of somewhat nimious doings on the part of Stewart and his men.

The Court continued the cause to enable the pursuers to submit their proposed amendments.

The pursuers subsequently lodged a minute of amendment by which they proposed to delete from the instance the names of the first set of pursuers, viz., the tutors and curators, leaving the action to proceed at the instance of the pursuer Herriot. They also proposed to amend the conclusions (and so far as necessary the condescendence and pleas in law) to the effect of enabling the pursuer Herriot to sue for both the sums concluded for in the original action, averring that he had advanced both sums out of his own funds.

ON 14th January 1908 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—

“Recall the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor: Open up the record and allow the pursuers to amend the summons in terms of the minute of amendment: Find the defender entitled to expenses since the date of closing the record, and remit,” &c.

J. GORDON MASON, S.S.C.—KELLY, PATERSON, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS ISABELLA YATES OR M’CALLUM, Pursuer (Appellant).—Trotter. No. 59.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—

Dickson, K.C.—G. G. Grierson.

Jan. 14, 1908.

Reparation—Negligence—Railway—Injury to passenger—Crowd on Station Platform.—A married woman with an infant in her arms was standing with her husband at Waverley Station, Edinburgh, on a Saturday evening in September, waiting for additional carriages to be added to a train which was to leave a quarter of an hour later. Before the carriages were in position, an orderly crowd of passengers collecting behind the woman and pressing forward on the arrival of the carriages, the woman was pushed off the platform upon the carriages and was injured.

M’Callum v.
North British
Railway Co.

In an action for damages raised by the woman against the Railway Com-

¹ M. 11,986.

Jan. 14, 1908. pany, in which the above facts were proved, held that the pursuer's injuries were not due to negligence on the part of the Railway Company, and defenders assolizied.

M'Callum v.
North British
Railway Co.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

IN January 1907 Mrs Isabella Yates or M'Callum, wife of Alexander M'Callum, miner, Broxburn, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, against the North British Railway Company for damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her through the fault of the defenders.

The defenders denied fault, and pleaded, inter alia; — (2) Any injuries sustained by the pursuer not having been occasioned by any fault or negligence of the defenders, or their servants, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which was affirmed by the Court on appeal.

On 22d March 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Millar) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact—(1) That on 1st September 1906 the pursuer, her husband, and three children left Broxburn in the afternoon to proceed to Edinburgh, where they did some shopping; that in the evening they proceeded to the Waverley Station in order to return to Broxburn by the train leaving Edinburgh at 8.38 P.M.; that on arrival at the gate at the end of the platform their tickets were checked by an official stationed there; (2) that the platform, No. 12, from which the Broxburn train started, is a wooden platform, with a concrete margin of 2 feet 9 inches in breadth, and is capable of holding about 2000 persons; that there is a dock on each side for trains, and the Broxburn train was in the dock on the left-hand side of the platform; (3) that on entering the platform and proceeding to the train, the pursuer and her husband found all the third-class carriages filled, but they were told to go in front as more carriages were to be added on; (4) that pursuer went to the front, and waited at the point of the platform where the incoming carriages would likely be stopped; that at this place there was a hoist for goods which contracted the space for passengers; (5) that there were a few passengers already waiting for the carriages, but the arrival of more increased the crowd to about 200 persons; the crowd was orderly, consisting mainly of working people who had been in town shopping with their families; (6) that the pursuer, who had a child in her arms, stood on the wooden part of the platform, within the concrete margin; she was in front of the crowd with no one between her and the place to which the carriages were to be shunted; the platform at this part was well lighted with four powerful electric lamps; (7) that when the carriages were being shunted into the dock, the crowd pressed forward; the pursuer did not attempt to get into the train, but was forced up against the carriages by the pressure from behind, and was thrown down and received severe bruises about the legs and right thigh; (8) that the Company provided two men to check the tickets, two inspectors, porters, and policemen, who were sufficient to regulate any crowd that was on the platform at the time; (9) that there was no neglect of any duty cast on the Railway Company under the circumstances, and the damage that the pursuer sustained was due to the heedlessness of the crowd, and not in consequence of any negligence on the part of the defenders: Finds in law that the defenders, not being guilty of any negligence whereby the pursuer was injured, are not liable in damages to her for any injuries she may have suffered; therefore sustains the second plea in law for the defenders, and assoil-jan. 14, 1908.

zies them from the conclusions of the summons." *

M'Callum v.
North British
Railway Co.

* "NOTE.—There was a little difficulty in connection with the proof in this case, as the Railway Company did not receive immediate notice of the accident, and their servants were not informed of the accident until some time after the date on which it is said to have occurred, with the result that it was with some difficulty that they could recall the precise circumstances in connection with the departure of the train upon this occasion.

"I think, however, it is fairly clearly proved that the pursuer and her husband and three children, one of whom was an infant in arms, went down to the Waverley Station on the 1st September 1906 in order to take the 8.38 P.M. train to Broxburn, and arrived at the station ten minutes or a quarter of an hour before the scheduled time for the train to start. At the entry to the platform there are two sliding gates, one for passengers entering to go to the train on the one side, and the other for passengers going by the train on the other side. On the occasion in question only the gate on the Broxburn train side of the platform was open, and both ticket collectors were there at the time. There is no division of the platform once you enter the gate, and it is open to the passengers going by the one train to cross over to the other side. On entering the platform the pursuer and her husband found all the carriages, six in number, going to Broxburn filled, at least, in so far as the third-class carriages were concerned. They were directed, however, by an official to proceed to the front of the train as more carriages were to be added to the train. They went forward, and stood close to the goods hoist, which occupies a considerable part of the centre of the platform, and which was about a carriage length from the end of the carriages then in the dock. There were a few persons waiting for the carriages at the time she went forward, but a constant stream of incomers added to the number, so that when the carriages came in there was a knot or crowd of about 200 persons there. The pursuer and her husband were standing on the wooden part of the platform, but in front of the crowd, looking towards the dock into which the carriages were to be shunted. In my view, if the pursuer, who was not very strong, and who at the time was carrying a child, wished to be in safety, it was her duty to have taken up a position at the back of the crowd, and then there would have been no chance of such an accident happening. When the carriages came in the crowd pressed forward, and the pursuer was forced by the pressure up against the carriages, and was thrown down, and her right leg slipped between the carriages and the platform, with the result that she was severely bruised. I think it proved that she did not attempt to go into the train, but that the accident happened entirely through the pressure of the crowd. She was at once lifted up, and after sitting for a short time with her back to the hoist, she recovered sufficiently to be able to travel in a compartment of one of two carriages which were added to the three which had already been shunted on to the train. Neither she nor her husband made any complaint to any railway official either at the Waverley Station, or at Broxburn when they arrived.

"In these circumstances the pursuer alleges three grounds of liability as against the Railway Company—(First) That the platform was overcrowded; (Second) that it was insufficiently lighted; and (Third) that there were no officials present to regulate the crowd, and that if there had been, an accident would not have happened." (The Sheriff-substitute, after stating his opinion that the first ground of action had not been proved, and that the second had been disproved, continued)—

"The third ground, and more difficult one, is that the pursuer avers that there were no railway officials present at the time. Undoubtedly, at the gate there were two officials to check the tickets, and, in their immediate neighbourhood, several railway policemen, whose duty it was to regulate

Jan. 14, 1908. The pursuer appealed, and founded on the undernoted authorities.¹
The defenders argued that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment was right in fact and in law.
McCallum v. North British Railway Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that any sufficient ground has been shewn for interfering with the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor here. It is quite certain that it is the duty of the Railway Company to provide as best it can, and in a reasonable way, for the safety of persons assembled on the platform and wishing to get into a train. It is quite certain also that in fulfilling that duty in a reasonable sense they cannot always be able to control the crowd on the platform. They cannot always, in a large and busy station be at every spot where a number of people may congregata. Something must be left in these circumstances to the reasonable discretion of the people who are going to get into the train. I am sorry to say that any crowd. On the platform there was the guard of the train, and in the neighbourhood there were two inspectors, Ogg and Mein, and also a foreman porter, and policemen, whose duty it was to patrol the platform. None of these officials seem to me to recollect the occasion in question very clearly, but I think that is accounted for by the fact that a considerable time elapsed before this matter was brought to their notice, and on the occasion in question there does not seem to have been anything to call their attention to the circumstances, either in the demeanour or size of the crowd or by their observing any accident at this place. The crowd admittedly was of quiet respectable working people who had been in town doing shopping and were returning in the evening. It is not averred that there was any brawling, or fighting, or riotous conduct of any kind. At the same time I think it proved that no one, when the carriages were shunted into the station, called out to the crowd to stand back, but I can scarcely think that, taking a crowd of that kind, the railway officials were bound to assume that their conduct would be anything but quiet and orderly. If a crowd of that character suddenly presses forward and an accident results, I do not think that the Railway Company can be held liable merely because there was no official present to call upon the crowd to stand back. Moreover, the pursuer's evidence is to the effect that even if there had been a call to stand back, the pressure upon those next the carriages was such as to make it impossible for them to obey the call.

"In these circumstances the law applicable to the case rests upon negligence being proved on the part of the Railway Company. They certainly do not insure passengers who enter their premises against accident, and in the event of any accident occurring, before they can be held liable, the pursuer must prove that there had been a neglect of a duty cast upon them under the circumstances, and that that neglect was the cause of the accident which had occurred. The cases I was referred to, so far as the Scotch Courts are concerned, were—(1st) the case of Macgregor v. Glasgow District Subway Company, 3 F. 1131. That was the case of an intending passenger from a station of the Glasgow District Subway, who had been injured through being caught between the station platform and an incoming train. He averred that the trains of the Company consisted of two carriages, each with a single entrance door, that only persons holding tickets were admitted to the platform, that on the day in question, owing to a breakdown, the trains were running at intervals of fifteen minutes instead of the advertised time very often that reasonable and moderate discretion is not exercised. Parti-Jan. 14, 1908. cularly it is not exercised by men: if it were exercised by men there would be no difficulty with women at all. Of course it is very natural that people who have been in Edinburgh all day on an excursion, and who desire to catch the 8.38 train back, should be anxious, and take precautions not to be left behind. A practised traveller would have no difficulty about that, because he would insist on being provided with a seat. Still, it is a natural impulse, which is not sufficiently resisted by some people, to rush at the train if they think there is a crowd who will be able to get in in front of them. Here it is alleged that there was a crowd of two hundred people on the platform. I cannot say that I think that was a great or a dangerous crowd; nor can I say that at the time it was assembled there, which was a very considerable time before the train was to start, it was the absolute duty of the Railway Company necessarily to find officials to be at

¹ Scott's Trustees v. Moss, Nov. 6, 1889, 17 R. 32; Macgregor v. Glasgow District Subway Co., July 19, 1901, 3 F. 1131; Fraser v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 4, 1902, 5 F. 41; Hogan v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 1873, 28 L. T. 271.

McCallum v. North British Railway Co.
Lord Justice-Clerk.

of three minutes, with the result that a larger number of intending passengers than usual came to the station before the train arrived, that on the train entering the station, and while it was still in motion, the crowd concentrated at the point where one of the entrance doors would come to a stop, with the result that the pursuer was pressed against the moving train, and being caught between it and the platform received the injuries on account of which he sued. The pursuer there appealed for jury trial from the Sheriff Court, and parties were heard upon the relevancy, and the Court, with great difficulty, held the action relevant. Lord Young said,—‘I think that it is impossible to say that within the averments here the pursuer could not establish a case of fault against the defenders.’ Lord Trayner said,—‘I have great doubt as to the relevancy of the pursuer’s averments, but I do not dissent.’ Lord Moncreiff says,—‘I say no more than that I think the pursuer is entitled to an issue,’ and the Lord Justice-Clerk,—‘I have had great doubt, but I cannot say that the pursuer’s averments are irrelevant.’ Now, that case seems to me to be much stronger than the present one, and if the Court there had so much doubt, I think their judgment tells against the pursuer’s case here. The second case, that of Fraser v. Caledonian Railway Company, 5 F. 41, was an action of damages for personal injury against a railway company. The pursuer averred that the defenders were in fault in respect that they knowingly, and without taking any steps to prevent it, permitted a greater crowd of passengers, of whom the pursuer was one, to congregate in a station than its platforms could accommodate, and had failed to provide a sufficient staff of servants to cope with the crowd, and that in consequence, by the pressure of the crowd, the pursuer had been carried along and hurled from the platform on to the railroad and injured. The Lord Justice-Clerk says,—‘The pursuer avers that the servants of the Company allowed the station to become so overcrowded as to be dangerous, and took no steps to prevent danger from this cause. The averments are certainly somewhat meagre, but I have come to be of opinion that the case cannot be satisfactorily decided without the facts being first ascertained.’ Lord Trayner says: ‘I think, under the pursuer’s averments, she may be able to establish fault against the defenders, involving liability, and I cannot say, especially looking to the state of the authorities on the subject, that the case as presented is one that cannot be made the subject of inquiry.’ These are the only reported Scotch cases to which I was referred, but there is an unreported case which was decided by the First Division on Saturday, 5th July 1902. I was supplied with copies of the judgment in that case, from which it appears that the pursuer was one of a company of 930 young men, who went down to the station in order to proceed to a football match, and that there were on the

Jan. 14, 1908. that train. These officials were probably just as much wanted at that moment at some other train which had to start earlier. If they were engaged at their ordinary work in examining trains which were leaving, or just about to leave, the station, they could not possibly give the attention which they might have given on an ordinary occasion, to a train which was only being made up and was not to start for some time; the two things would have to be worked out to the best of their ability. But it does not seem to me that this train was neglected. The train was a train of six carriages waiting for passengers, and according to practice, the day being a Saturday, three carriages from a train arriving about eight o'clock were put on to the front of the train, because on Saturdays there would be more people to be carried than on ordinary week-days. When these three carriages were put on that was simply making up the train to what it was to be when it came to start some twenty minutes afterwards. Apparently

M'Callum v.
North British
Railway Co.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

platform seven railway servants to regulate this large crowd, and as the result of the crowd at the station he was pressed up against the train and was injured. The jury had found the defendants liable, and had assessed the damages at £50, but the Court, on a motion for a new trial on the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict, granted the new trial unanimously.

"The cases to which I was referred in England were—(1st) Hogan v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 28 L. T. 271. In this case the female plaintiff was one of a crowd of passengers assembled at the defendants' railway station. The crowd, caused by special excursion traffic, of which the defendants had previous notice, had been allowed to enter the station and to disperse over the platform at will. No precautions were taken to regulate its movements. On the approach of a train the plaintiff was, through pressure caused by the swaying of the crowd, thrust off the platform and hurt. Baron Martin, who presided at the trial, non-suited the plaintiff on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants. On appeal, the Court of Appeal recalled the judgment and held that the case should have been allowed to go to the jury. It was decided that the question of negligence or no negligence was one for the jury, and not for the presiding Judge. But in deciding the case, Mr Justice Keating, at page 273 says: 'I quite agree that it would be monstrous to expect the company to guard against the pressure of an inconsiderate crowd, and that if the accident did arise from the natural impulse of the crowd, then the defendants cannot be held liable, but it was for the jury to judge of the character of the crowd'; and Mr Justice Grove, who went mainly on the ground that there had been an unlocked gate with no attendant at it to prevent the influx of passengers, says: 'I am far from saying that the jury ought to have found for the plaintiff; the only question for us is whether they might have done so.' The other cases in England do not raise the question directly. Sturgess v. Great-Western Railway Company, 56 J. P. 278, was the case of a passenger in a crowd tripping over a box containing signal levers, which projected about two inches above the level of the platform, and the Court held there that, although Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge directed a non-suit, nevertheless the question of negligence ought to have been left to the jury. The case of Welfare v. Brighton Railway Company, L. R., 4 Q. B. 693, was a case of a man being injured by the fall of a plank and a piece of zinc from the roof of the station. There the Judge non-suited the plaintiff, and the Court of Appeal held that there was no evidence to go to the jury. The case of the Metropolitan Railway v. Jackson, L. R., 3 App. Cases, 199, was the case of a man whose thumb was crushed by the door of a carriage being hastily slammed to by a porter as there was a rush made for the train when the three carriages were put on, Jan. 14, 1908. and this lady seems to have been run up against a carriage and was to some extent injured. I am unable to say that I can find in this evidence proof that the Railway Company were at fault in not having prevented that. I think the Sheriff-substitute has considered the case with great care, and has given a very moderate and ample statement of the case. Upon the whole matter I do not see that we would be justified in holding that he was wrong in the decision to which he came, and I think his judgment ought to be affirmed.

*M'Callum v.
North British
Railway Co.*

*Lord Justice-
Clerk.*

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that fault is proved on the part of the defenders. It seems to me that this was no unusual occasion, and they had no reason to anticipate that there would be any great crowd or any unusual danger to passengers; and it is perfectly plain that there was the ordinary and usual number of officials to look after the safety of passengers connected with this particular train. The accident which the pursuer sustained seems to have been a pure accident for which the defenders are in no way responsible.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree. The question is whether fault has been proved against the Railway Company. It appears to me that it is plain upon the evidence that the cause of the accident was the heedlessness and selfishness of the crowd of people, or of individuals composing that crowd, the plaintiff had risen to protest against the influx of passengers after the carriage was crowded. The judgment mainly goes upon the question whether the question of negligence is to be left to the jury, or whether there is a duty upon the Judge to decide whether, in the circumstances, the proof shewed negligence at all, but in the course of his judgment, Lord Blackburn says: 'My Lords, in all cases of damages for a personal injury against railway companies, the plaintiff has to prove, first, that there was, on the part of the defendants, a neglect of that duty cast upon them under the circumstances; and second, that the damage he has sustained was the consequence of that neglect of duty. A third question, whether the plaintiff is himself to blame, comes more properly by way of defence.' The case of Shepherd v. Midland Railway Company, 25 L. T. 879, was the case of ice an inch thick allowed to remain upon a platform with the result that a passenger stepping upon it slipped and fell, and was severely injured, and the Court there held that the defendants were guilty of actionable negligence in allowing the ice to remain upon the platform.

"There is a case in Ireland, Cannon v. Midland Great-Western Railway (Ireland) Company, 1879, 6 L. R. (Irish) 199. That was the case of a harvester pushed off a platform by a sudden inrush of people on the platform already filled by a disorderly crowd. The railway company were found not liable, and it was there decided that a railway company is not bound to provide a staff sufficient to cope with the force and violence of a lawless crowd rushing through a station.

"Looking at all these judgments, it seems to me that no sufficient case has been made out against the present defenders. It can scarcely be said, because there was not an official to call out stand back, when the carriages were shunted into the platform, to a group of persons who were all orderly and quiet at the time, that therefore they are guilty of such negligence as to make them liable for the sudden rush of the crowd towards the carriages. In the whole circumstances, therefore, I am of opinion that the defenders are entitled to be assolized, with expenses."

Jan. 14, 1908. who made a rush for the three empty carriages which were in course of being added to the Bathgate train on the night in question. There was no necessity for such a rush at the time, nor was it to be expected, for some twenty minutes had to elapse before the train was timed to start; and as Lord Ardwall. no complaint was made at the time, it is impossible for the Railway Company to prove by their inspectors where they were at the particular moment of the accident. I agree with the Sheriff that it is proved that there was a sufficient staff for all ordinary purposes. Further, it is, I think, proved that the Railway Company did not allow an unreasonable number of people to get on to this platform; they had taken the very proper precaution of allowing nobody to go on to it except through the gates, where persons were stationed to check the tickets and to prevent too many people getting on to the platform. I accordingly hold that the pursuer has failed to prove that the accident complained of was due to the fault of the defenders.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal, and adhere to the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the said interlocutor; therefore of new sustain the second plea in law for the defenders, assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

BRYSON & GRANT, S.S.C.—JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

THOMAS CONOLLY, Pursuer.—Orr, K.C.—Lippe.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Dickson, K.C.—G. G. Grierson.

Jan. 15, 1908.

Conolly v.
North British
Railway Co.

Expenses—Jury Trial—New Trial—Expenses of first trial.—The pursuer of an action of damages obtained a verdict, which was set aside as being contrary to the evidence, and a new trial was ordered. At the second trial the pursuer again obtained a verdict. The defenders moved for a new trial. The Court refused to allow a new trial, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses "except the expenses of the first trial."

Held that the expenses incurred by the pursuer in resisting the motion to set aside the verdict obtained at the first trial were expenses of the first trial, and consequently that the pursuer was not entitled to these expenses.

Earl of Fife v. Duff, 5 S. 524, followed.

2D DIVISION.

THOMAS CONOLLY, labourer, Springburn, Glasgow, brought an action of damages for personal injury against the North British Railway Company.

On 21st July 1906 a jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £160.

The defenders moved for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside. The Court thereafter set aside the verdict and allowed a new trial.

On 30th May 1907 a second jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £75.

The defenders obtained a rule.

On 20th December 1907 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the rule granted by the previous interlocutor, refuse the said rule, of consent apply the verdict of the jury, and in terms thereof decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £75 sterling: Find him entitled to expenses, except the expenses of the first trial, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and report." Jan. 15, 1908.

Conolly v.
North British
Railway Co.

The Auditor allowed the pursuer the expenses incurred by him in opposing the rule which resulted in the verdict at the first trial being set aside.

The defenders, in a note of objections, objected to the allowance of these expenses, and argued that they were part of the expenses of the first trial, and therefore that they fell within the exception in the interlocutor of 20th December.¹

The pursuer maintained that the Auditor was right.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that these expenses should not be allowed. They are expenses connected with the first trial, and although the word trial expresses generally the idea of going to a verdict, and getting the verdict of a jury, we all know that a verdict has no weight whatever except in so far as it is applied by the Court, the Court having power, if they see fit, not to apply it on certain grounds, they having a discretion to judge whether the jury have gone so far wrong in their verdict, either in fact or in law, that a new trial ought to be granted on the ground that the verdict was either contrary to evidence or contrary to law. I take that to be part of the proceedings of the first trial, and until that has been done nothing effective has been done in the original trial at all. To say that these expenses, which resulted in the pursuer being compelled to enter upon a new trial, are expenses connected with a new trial, seems to me to be out of the question. They are expenses connected with the trial in which the verdict was bad, and had to be set aside, and the pursuer is not allowed the expenses of that trial, and my own opinion, apart from authority, would be that he is not entitled to the expenses incurred by him in defending the verdict obtained in that abortive trial. But I hold that this view is strongly confirmed by the case quoted to us of the Earl of Fife v. Duff.¹

LORD LOW.—I have great doubts in this case, but I think it seems to have been decided in the *Earl of Fife v. Duff*¹ that the expenses of discussing a rule for a new trial are part of the expenses of the trial to which it relates. That being so, I do not think it would be expedient to disturb a decision upon a question of this sort pronounced so long ago. Therefore I agree in the result which your Lordship proposes.

LORD ARDWALL.—I have no doubt about this matter. I am of opinion that the expenses connected with the setting aside of the verdict in the first trial which has been allowed to the pursuer by the Auditor were really part of the expenses of the first trial. The proceedings in connection with the first trial never came to anything; the verdict was set aside and a new trial was granted. When the Court finds a party entitled or not entitled to certain expenses, that is not of necessity confined to the expenses of the specific piece of procedure mentioned in the finding, but includes expenses properly connected with such piece of procedure. When the Court says a party is to be entitled to the expenses of the first trial, or is not to be

¹ Earl of Fife v. Duff, March 3, 1827, 5 S. 524.

Jan. 15, 1908. entitled to the expenses of the first trial, these expenses consist not merely of the expenses of the proceedings before the Judge at the trial, but of everything properly connected with the first trial, including the expenses of the discussion in this Court in obtaining a new trial. That view is entirely in consonance with what was decided in the case of the Earl of Fife,¹ which has been quoted to us. That was a very clear case of this point coming up for decision, because there were in that case two jury trials, which in consequence of the judgment of the House of Lords were held to be absolutely useless, and one of the parties got the expenses of these trials, but no other expenses. Therefore it is a direct decision as to what falls and what does not fall within the expenses of a particular jury trial. On these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the judgment proposed by your Lordship is the right one.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT sustained the objection.

ST CLAIR SWANSON & MANSON, W.S.—JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 61. MARY WILHELMINA HAVERY, Pursuer (Respondent).—R. S. Brown.
 Jan. 15, 1908. ROBERT BROWNLEE, Defender (Appellant).—M' Lennan, K.C.—Ingram.

Havery v.
Brownlee.

Parent and Child—Illegitimate Children—Filiation—Admission by defender of intercourse subsequent to date of conception.—Where the defender in an action of filiation admits an act of connection prior in date to the alleged act on which the pursuer founds very little corroboration of the pursuer's evidence will be required; but where the act admitted by the defender is subsequent in date to the alleged act founded on by the pursuer the corroboration of her evidence must be substantial.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Roxburgh,
 Berwick, and Selkirk.

IN February 1907, Mary Wilhelmina Havery, dressmaker, 25 Paton Street, Galashiels, brought an action of filiation and aliment in the Sheriff Court at Selkirk, against Robert Brownlee, dyer, 2 Huddersfield Street, Galashiels.

The defender lodged defences, in which he denied that he was the father of the pursuer's child.

A proof was allowed and led.

The pursuer deposed that she had known the defender for a number of years, their families having been intimate for a long time; that she and her sister were allowed to dry their washing in a stove-house belonging to the defender's father, and that the defender often helped them there; that on an evening about the middle of March 1906, when she and the defender were alone in the stove-house, he had connection with her there against her will, and that in consequence she gave birth to an illegitimate child on 29th December 1906; and that the defender had had connection with her on other occasions in April, May, and July, when they were out cycling together.

The defender denied that he had had connection with the pursuer in March, but he admitted that he had had connection with her on 26th May and again on 12th July, when they were out cycling.

The import of the rest of the evidence, so far as material to the purposes of the present report, sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk. Jan. 15, 1908.

On 29th April 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact that the pursuer gave birth to a female illegitimate child on 29th December 1906; that she had connection with the defender in March 1906; and that the defender is the father of the said child; and, in law, that he is liable to pay the inlying expenses and aliment sued for: Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the prayer of the petition." Havery v.
Brownlee.

The defender appealed.

The pursuer founded on M'Donald v. Glass.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—These cases are very trying, I must say, but I cannot see that in deciding them we are entitled to go contrary to the rules of evidence under which it is necessary that the pursuer should have some reasonable and substantial corroboration of her evidence before she can be successful. No doubt, in many of these cases the defender in his conscience must know that a decision in his favour would be a wrong decision. With that we have nothing to do. Our business is to do justice by applying the rules of evidence to the evidence before us. In this particular case I look in vain for any reasonable and substantial corroboration of the evidence of the pursuer. It is true that the defender admits that he had connection with the pursuer about two months after the date on which she founds. That is a kind of admission which cuts both ways. In this case I think that it is rather in favour of the defender that he makes such an admission, because it is plain that the pursuer never could have proved the acts of connection which the defender admits, and the admission also goes to explain what took place between the families when the matter of the defender's marriage to the pursuer was mooted. I quite agree that where a defender admits an act of connection before the date on which the pursuer founds she requires very little corroboration to bring home to him the act which she alleges. It is different when the admission refers to a date after the date on which the pursuer founds. In that case she requires to bring forward substantial corroboration of her evidence, and this, I think, the pursuer here has failed to do. There is no evidence of any previous familiarities between the parties, and I have difficulty in holding that the stove-house in which the pursuer alleges the act of connection took place was a suspected place. Mr Brown founded on evidence to the effect that in September the pursuer told her sister about the connection which she alleges in the previous March. I think that that is not competent evidence, for it is evidence as to a statement made, as I gather it was made, outwith the presence of the defender, and later by several months than the date of the alleged occurrence. what had happened between them, the defender, when he was told pursuer's condition, was at first not prepared to deny the paternity, & willing to marry her. It was only on ascertaining that she was advanced in pregnancy that he repudiated the idea of marrying & denied the fact of paternity. On the whole matter I think that there is not any sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's story, and consequently she has failed to prove her case.

¹ Oct. 27, 1883, 11 R. 57.

Jan. 15, 1908. LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion.

Havery v.
Brownlee. LORD ARDWALL.—I am also of the same opinion.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute: "Find that the pursuer gave birth to an illegitimate child on 29th December 1906, and has failed to prove that the defender is the father of that child: Therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

S. F. SUTHERLAND, S.S.C.—J. FERGUSON REEKIE, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 62. JOSEPH CALDER AND OTHERS (Copland's Executors), First Parties.— Munro.

Jan. 16, 1908.

Copland's
Executors v.
Milne.

MARY JANE MILNE AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Munro.

MRS JANE ANNE FALCONER OR MACKENZIE AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Chree.

MRS JESSIE JOHNSTON OR FALCONER AND ANOTHER, Fourth Parties.—
Chree.

JOHN COPLAND, Fifth Party.—Taylor Cameron.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Object of Gift—"Cousins."—The word "cousins" in a testamentary deed means first cousins only, unless there is something in the context of the deed or in the circumstances of the case to shew that the word is used in a different sense.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Subject of Gift—Words importing gift of heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 20.—A testator by holograph will appointed executors, and instructed them after paying his debts to divide the income of "the balance" between his brother and sister equally, and on the death of either to pay the whole income to the survivor; on the death of both "I wish my whole estate realised and equally divided between my cousins on my mother's side."

The testator left about £3300 of moveable property, and also had a personal right to a share (valued at under £100) of a small heritable property.

Held that the heritable property was carried by the will.

2D DIVISION. THOMAS MILNE COPLAND, residing at Seaton of Usan, Montrose, died on 16th October 1905, leaving a holograph will dated 13th April 1904, and two holograph codicils thereto, in the following terms:—

"I, Thomas Milne Copland . . . hereby appoint as my Executors my Brother in Law Joseph Calder, farmer, Seaton of Usan, Montrose along with the Town Chamberlain of Montrose acting in the capacity at the time of my death. After paying all debts due by me at the time of my death I hereby instruct my Executors to divide the income of the balance half yearly between my sister Margaret Copland or Calder wife of the said Joseph Calder, and my brother John Copland residing at Scotston of Usan, Montrose. On the death of either my sister or brother the whole income to be paid to the survivor and on the death of the survivor the whole income to be paid to the said Joseph Calder during his life if he shall survive my sister and brother and on his death or on the death of the survivor of my sister and brother if my said brother in law be dead, I wish my whole estate realised and equally divided between my cousins on my mother's side who shall be alive at the time of my death. Signed by me this Thirteenth day of April Nineteen hundred and four. Written by myself." Then followed the signatures of the testator and two witnesses. Jan. 16, 1908.

Copland's
Executors v.
Milne.

"Codicil No. 1—28th April 1904.—I hereby instruct my Executors to sell at the time of my death sufficient of my investments to pay at once the following legacies to Edie Peach of 11 Bridge Avenue, Hammersmith, Two hundred pounds and to Nellie Goodman, Mogsden, Wallington, Fifty pounds." Signed by the testator and one witness.

"Codicil No. 2.—I hereby appoint as additional Executors my brother John Copland and my sister Mrs Margaret Copland or Calder." Signed by the testator and one witness.

Questions having arisen as to the meaning of the word "cousins" in the residuary clause of the will, and as to whether the will carried heritage, a special case was presented.

The case set forth as follows:—

The testator was survived by his brother and sister mentioned in the will, and by eight first cousins on his mother's side. The testator was also survived by thirteen first cousins once removed on his mother's side being children of two other first cousins, viz., George Johnston and William Falconer, who predeceased the testator. He was also survived by six first cousins twice removed, the issue of Alexander Johnston and James Falconer, two deceased children respectively of George Johnston and William Falconer.

In addition to moveable estate, amounting to about £3300, the deceased had a personal right to a one-third share (valued at under £100) of a small heritable property, a cottage in the parish of St Cyrus, Kincardineshire, the title to which was still in the name of his deceased father and was unrecorded.

The first parties were the executors under the will; the second parties were the eight first cousins of the testator; the third parties were the thirteen first cousins once removed; the fourth parties were Mrs Jessie Johnston or Falconer, widow of James Falconer, and Mrs Ann Winning or Johnston, widow of Alexander Johnston, as representing their respective pupil children, the six first cousins twice removed; and the fifth party was John Copland, the brother and heir-at-law of the testator.

The second parties contended that the expression "my cousins on my mother's side" taken along with the words "who shall be alive at the time of my death" excluded all except first cousins on the mother's side who survived the testator, and consequently, that the second parties were alone entitled to share in the estate. The second parties further contended that the will was habile to carry heritage, and that accordingly the testator's share of the heritable property referred to formed part of the executry estate.

The third and fourth parties contended that they were cousins of the testator on his mother's side within the meaning of the will, and that they were accordingly entitled to share in the estate.

The fifth party maintained that the will did not provide for the succession to the heritable estate, that so far as the heritage was concerned the testator died intestate, and that the fifth party being the heir ab intestato of the deceased, was entitled to the heritable estate.

Jan. 16, 1908.

Copland's
Executors v.
Milne.

The following questions of law were, inter alia, stated :—“(1) Are the second parties alone entitled to the fee of the testator's moveable estate? (5) Are the terms of the testator's will habile to convey his heritage? (6) Is the fifth party, as the testator's heir ab intestato, entitled to the heritable estate?”

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The word “cousins” in a will meant first cousins only, unless there was something in the context of the deed or in the circumstances which shewed that a wider meaning was intended.¹ Here there was nothing in the context; and as for the circumstances it was improbable that the testator intended this comparatively small estate to be divided among all of an indefinite and, as it turned out, numerous class of persons to whom in a loose sense the term cousin was applicable. The dictum in the case of *Caldecott*² on which the third and fourth parties founded had been practically overruled.³ (2) The will carried the heritage. “Whole estate” meant estate both heritable and moveable, and that was sufficient under section 20 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868.⁴ No doubt executors only were appointed, but since the Executors (Scotland) Act, 1900,⁵ the terms “executor” and “trustee” were practically convertible terms.

Argued for the third and fourth parties;—The word “cousins” included first cousins once removed and also first cousins twice removed, and was not confined to full first cousins.⁶ It was to be borne in mind that this was the holograph will of a Scotsman, and it was well known that according to popular usage “cousin” had a much wider application in Scotland than in England. On the question as to whether the will carried heritage, the third and fourth parties adopted the argument for the second parties.

Argued for the fifth party;—The will did not carry heritage. It was an appointment of executors only, and its language as a whole was apt if moveables only were intended to be carried, but was not apt if heritage was intended to be carried.⁷

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first question raised in this case is as to the sense in which the testator used the word “cousins” in his will. Did he by “cousins on my mother's side” mean first cousins only, i.e., children of brothers or sisters of his mother, or did he also mean to include under the term everyone in any of the degrees of relationship to which the term is sometimes applied, e.g., first cousins once or twice removed, or second cousins? I have no doubt whatever that by “cousins” he meant only first ¹ Stoddart v. Nelson, 1855, 6 De G. Macn. & Gord. 68; Stevenson v. Abingdon, 1862, 31 Beav. 305; Burbey v. Burbey, 1862, 9 Jur. (N. S.) 96.

² Caldecott v. Harrison, 1840, 9 Sim. 457.

³ Jarman on Wills, 6th edit., vol. ii., p. 1008. The second parties also cited Drylie's Factor v. Robertson, July 20, 1882, 9 R. 1178; Thompson v. Robinson, 1857, 27 Beav. 486; In re Blower's Trusts, 1871, L. R., 6 Ch. App. 351.

⁴ 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101; Aim's Trustees v. Aim, Dec. 15, 1880, 8 R. 294; M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Luckie, June 28, 1883, 10 R. 1056.

⁵ 63 and 64 Vict. cap. 55, sec. 2.

⁶ Caldecott v. Harrison, 9 Sim. 457; Williams on Executors, 10th edit., vol. i., p. 864.

⁷ Urquhart v. Dewar, June 13, 1879, 6 R. 1026; Grant v. Morren, Feb. 22, 1893, 20 R. 404; Bell v. Bell, July 19, 1906, 14 S. L. T. 244.

cousins. That is the primary and normal use of the word, and the one in Jan. 16, 1908. which it must be presumed a testator used it, if in fact he had first cousins, Copland's and if there is nothing else in his settlement to indicate that he meant to Executors v. use it in a wider and looser sense. Such a wider use will generally be Milne. improbable, for in many cases, as here, the effect would be to multiply the Lord Justice-Clerk. number of recipients of the testator's bounty to a more or less indefinite extent.

The second question is whether the one-third share (valued at £100) of a small cottage in the parish of St Cyrus, Kincardineshire, is carried by the will. I have no doubt whatever that it is. One has only to read the will as a whole to see that the testator intended to deal with his whole estate. When he comes to the provision which deals with the ultimate division of the capital he uses the term "my whole estate," which I think is equivalent to my whole estate, heritable and moveable, and he further directs the estate to be "realised," which seems to me a suitable enough word to describe the turning into money of his share of the cottage. If that was the testator's intention, it ends the matter, for there is no doubt that the will is habile to carry heritage.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. In the English cases which were quoted to us by Mr Munro it was held that when the word "cousins" is used in a will or deed it must be construed as meaning first cousins, unless there is something in the context to shew that it is used in a different sense. These authorities seem to me to be practically conclusive of the present question, because there is no difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland in this matter, and the cases are of high authority, the leading case having been decided by so eminent a Judge as Lord Cranworth.

Without authority I should have come to the same conclusion, not only because I think that the primary meaning of the word "cousins" is limited to first cousins, but because I think there are circumstances here which make it most improbable that the testator used the word to denote more remote relations than cousins-german.

The settlement was executed in April 1904. The testator died in October 1905. At his death he had eight first cousins alive. If first cousins alone are included each beneficiary will receive a very substantial benefit. He had also no fewer than thirteen first cousins once removed and six first cousins twice removed—that is, nineteen cousins more remote than first cousins, so that if all these cousins were included this small estate would be divided among twenty-seven persons, making the benefit to each almost inappreciable. Again, the estate was to be realised and divided equally among the cousins. That is very intelligible if they are all in the same degree of relationship, but it is not so apposite where relations of different degrees are included. Therefore I have no doubt that the construction which I think to be sound in principle is also the construction which carries out the intention of the testator.

On the question as to whether the heritable estate is included, there is more room for difference of opinion. The question is one of intention, because the words of the will are quite sufficient to carry heritage if it was

Jan. 16, 1908. intended that heritage should be carried. The will is very simple. The income of the whole estate is to be divided between the brother and the sister of the testator, and failing them is to be paid to his brother-in-law, and on the termination of the liferents the whole estate is to be realised and divided. There can be no question that the testator intended to dispose of the whole estate which belonged to him at his death. There was no reason why this small heritable estate should be left out. The only circumstance which militates against that view is that the testator appointed the first parties executors but not trustees. There is some force in that consideration, but not, I think, enough to overcome the plain indications of intention to which I have alluded.

Copland's
Executors v.
Milne.

Lord Low.

LORD ARDWALL.—This case raises a question of some interest, because it is the first case in which the term "cousins" has come up for construction in the Courts of Scotland. But there have been quoted to us decisions in the Courts of England which I regard as founded on a correct view of the construction of the term. In conformity with these decisions I am of opinion that the word "cousins" when occurring in a testamentary writing ought to be held to signify "first cousins," unless there is something in the context of the deed or in the circumstances of the case to shew that it was intended to designate more remote relatives. The principle of construing the term "cousins" by reference to the context of the deed is obvious enough. The principle of construction by reference to the circumstances of the case may be illustrated by the case of a testator who has no first cousins, but only more remote cousins, making bequests to his "cousins," when it would properly be held that he meant to designate cousins of such a degree as were actually in existence at the date of the deed. In the present case, as pointed out by my brother Lord Low, it would be out of the question to hold that the testator, who had eight first cousins, intended to divide his small estate among the whole body of his cousins of all degrees of relationship to the number of twenty-seven, with the result that the more remote relatives, by reason of their numbers, would carry off the bulk of the estate.

I accordingly am of opinion that prima facie the word "cousins" must be held to mean "first cousins," and that in the deed at present under consideration there is nothing to displace that meaning.

On the second question I have felt some difficulty, not because the will is not habile to convey heritage, but because I have difficulty in holding that heritable estate was in the contemplation of the testator when he made his will. The difficulty arises because executors only and not trustees are appointed, and because there are no words of conveyance of heritage. But I think it is settled that if a testator's intention is plain it must receive effect notwithstanding technical difficulties. As to intention, when the testator says "I wish my whole estate to be realised and equally divided," I think that the Court are entitled to hold that by the words "my whole estate" the testator meant his whole estate, heritable and moveable. That being so, when he directs that his whole estate shall be realised and divided, I think that may be viewed as a direct injunction to realise the whole estate without exception. The fact that the will contains a direction to realise differentiates the present case from the case of Bell,¹ where there was no Jan. 16, 1908. direction to realise and the trustees had no powers of sale. Here there is a Copland's direction to realise, which applies to the testator's "whole" estate. I think Executors v. Milne. therefore, though with some hesitation, that the will may be held to dispose of the share of the insignificant heritable subject to which the testator had a personal right.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT answered the first and fifth questions in the affirmative and the sixth in the negative.

MACKINTOSH & BOYD, W. S.—HARRY H. MACBEAN, W. S.—
ROXBURGH & HENDERSON, W. S.—Agents.

THE FIFE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Complainers (Reclaimers).—
Hunter, K.C.—R. S. Horne.

No. 63.

JAMES LINDSAY, Respondent.—Watt, K.C.—Wilton.

Jan. 17, 1908.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Second Schedule (8)—Memorandum of Agreement—Suspension of charge.—The employers of a workman who had been injured agreed to pay him 15s. 11d. per week, the statutory maximum, as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the workman received payment of that sum from February 1904 to September 1905. A memorandum of the agreement was recorded under the Act. The workman having partially recovered returned to work, earned wages, and accepted payments first of 7s. 9d. and later of 5s. per week between October and December 1905. On 10th January 1906 he left the service of the employers, and thereafter intimated that he was totally incapacitated. The employers having refused to pay more than 5s. per week of compensation, the workman in March 1906 charged them under the recorded agreement for payment of 15s. 11d. per week from 10th January 1906.

Fife Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Lindsay.

In a suspension the employers averred (1) that the agreement founded on had been superseded by subsequent agreements to accept first 7s. 9d. and then 5s. per week; (2) that the workman was not incapacitated for work; and asked for a proof of these averments.

The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Dundas) refused the suspension, upon the ground that it was contrary to the intention of the Act that such questions should be determined by proof in a suspension; and that the employers could have had a sufficient remedy by adopting proceedings under the Act either to have the payments under the original agreement reviewed, or to have the alleged subsequent agreement recorded.

THE FIFE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, carrying on business at Lumphinnans, in the county of Fife, brought a note of suspension of a Lord Dundas charge given to them, in March 1906, by James Lindsay, miner, Cowdenbeath, in virtue of an extract registered memorandum of agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Execution was sisted on consignment. Thereafter the note was passed, and a record was made up and closed.

The averments and contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Dundas), who, on 2d February 1907, after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the reasons of suspension, finds the charge

Jan. 17, 1908. orderly proceeded, refuses the prayer of the note of suspension, and decerns."*

Fife Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Lindsay.

* "OPINION.—The complainers, the Fife Coal Company, Limited, seek to suspend a charge at the instance of James Lindsay, miner, Cowdenbeath. It appears that, on 4th February 1904, the respondent, while in the course of his employment with the complainers, met with an accident, and claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of his consequent incapacity for work. The parties agreed that the amount should be 15s. 11d. per week, which was the statutory maximum; and this was duly paid from 18th February 1904 to 26th September 1905. A memorandum of this agreement (No. 11 of pro.) was recorded in the special register in July 1905, and in the Sheriff Court books for preservation and execution in February 1906. The complainers go on to aver that, the respondent having partially recovered and returned to work, the parties on or about 23d October 1905 by agreement varied the weekly payment, and entered into a new agreement whereby the compensation was fixed at 7s. 9d. per week as from 26th September 1905; that this agreement superseded the prior recorded agreement; and that it was acted upon by the parties for the period between 26th September and 21st October. The complainers further say that on or about 6th November 1905 the parties by agreement again varied the weekly payment, and entered into a new agreement whereby the compensation was fixed at 5s. per week as from 21st October; that the agreement of 23d October was thereby superseded; and that this latest agreement was acted upon by the parties for the period between 21st October and 9th December 1905. At the latter date, the complainers proposed to reduce the compensation to 4s. 7d. per week; but the respondent declined to agree to this; and on 10th January 1906 he left their employment, and intimated to them that he was then totally incapacitated for any work whatever.

"The complainers admit liability to pay compensation at 5s. per week from 21st October 1905, till that rate shall be varied by agreement or review in terms of the Act. But the respondent has charged them for payment at the rate of 15s. 11d. from and after 10th January 1906, his charge being based upon the original agreement, which is the only one which has been recorded. Hence the present suspension. The parties are at issue upon two matters of fact, viz.: (1) the nature and constitution, if any, of the alleged 'agreements' in October and November 1905, and (2) the alleged incapacity of the respondent as at 10th January 1906.

"The complainers' counsel moved for a proof on these heads. For reasons which I shall state, I think that motion must be refused. It appears to me that the recent case of Davidson, 1907, S. C. 90, has a very material bearing here, and indeed, comes near to ruling,—though it does not absolutely and in terms rule,—the present case. The Court there laid down that a recorded agreement is not displaced as a warrant of charge by a subsequent unrecorded agreement. That pronouncement seems to carry one a long way towards refusing this suspension. But the complainers point to differences in fact which they say are sufficient to distinguish the two cases. In Davidson, the workman charged his employers, in virtue of a recorded agreement, for compensation at a reduced rate, fixed by a subsequent unrecorded agreement which he admitted to have been made by the parties; and it was not therefore decided that a charge would be good though it was for a sum greater than that which the charger had agreed to accept by an unrecorded agreement. But the decision and the dicta in Davidson's case appear to me to neutralise this suggested distinction. Then the complainers argued that the respondent, by having accepted the lesser rates for periods of weeks, is barred from now charging for payment at the higher rate originally agreed upon. But the respondent avers that his acceptance of these lesser rates was not in virtue of agreements to vary, as

The complainers reclaimed. The case was heard on 12th and 13th Jan. 17, 1908. December 1907.

Argued for the complainers and reclaimers;—The workman was barred from charging for the full amount in the recorded agreement by the subsequent agreements, although the latter were not recorded. The original agreement was for the maximum, and was therefore on the footing of total incapacity. By the subsequent agreements he in effect admitted that total incapacity had ceased, and therefore the original agreement was now superseded and not enforceable. The case of *Fife Coal Co., Limited, v. Davidson*¹ was distinguishable. Here the workman was charging for the full amount in the recorded agreement, ignoring the subsequent agreements, whereas there the workman charged only for the amount as modified by the subsequent agreement. If the workman here had charged for 5s. per week the reclaimers would not have objected. If the respondent was paid

*Fife Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Lindsay.*

alleged by the complainers, but merely a matter of voluntary and temporary modification, and without prejudice to his right to demand the full amount originally agreed upon in the event—which he says has occurred—of his becoming once more totally incapacitated. Now, these, as already pointed out, are just the matters of fact upon which the parties are at issue, viz., the alleged agreements and the alleged incapacity. Now, I think that to allow a proof in this Court upon either of these heads would be to run plainly counter to the policy of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which aims at providing summary and inexpensive methods of inquiry, where parties do not agree on matters of fact. It is provided, section 1 (3), that 'if any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act, . . . or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question if not settled by agreement shall, subject to the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the Second Schedule to this Act.' Now, all questions as to the alleged constitution of agreements to vary can, failing agreement, be brought to the sharp and speedy test afforded by Schedule II. (8), by the party interested presenting such agreement to be recorded. Similarly, all questions as to a workman's capacity or the reverse can be speedily determined, failing agreement, by the statutory machinery. The present suspension does not, of course, take the form of 'any proceedings under this Act.' But where the Act provides specific and effective machinery for determining the questions at issue, I do not think that one of the parties is at liberty to have these raised and expiscated in a process which might run its course through the Courts up to the House of Lords.

"The complainers say that hardship will result if the suspension is refused. But the truth, in my opinion, is that the complainers have, or had, the remedy in their own hands; and have themselves to blame, if, by not resorting to it, they are obliged to meet a claim which they could otherwise have defeated. There was nothing, so far as I see, to prevent them from recording the alleged subsequent agreements, if they were genuine, as provided by Schedule II. (8); or from setting afoot the machinery of Schedule I. (12), to have the payment reviewed. The former of these remedies was pointed out by Lord Ardwall in Davidson's case, in the last paragraph of his opinion; and I agree with and adopt his Lordship's observations. I may add that I think it is clear that the complainers, and not, as was suggested in argument, the respondent, are the 'party interested' within the meaning of Schedule II. (8). During the discussion the following cases were referred to:—Colville, 1905, 8 F. 179; Steel, 1902, 5 F. 244; Cavaney, 1903, 5 F. 963; Morton, 1902, 2 K. B. 276; Binning,

¹ 1907, S. C. 90.

Jan. 17, 1908. 15s. 11d. per week he would be paid full compensation after his incapacity had ceased, and, taking into account what he could now earn, he would be getting altogether more than he was earning before the accident. That was wholly contrary to the policy and intention of the Act,¹ and his demand was unconscionable. The common law remedies were open to the employers to prevent the Act being used to work injustice.² They were entitled to have the questions raised by them (a) as to the existence of the later agreements, and (b) as to the workman's alleged incapacity, determined in a suspension. The workman having seen fit to give a charge was not entitled to object to the employers establishing their defence to that charge in the ordinary way. But apart from that, a suspension was in this case the only remedy open to them. They could not have instituted arbitration proceedings for review under section (12) of the First Schedule of the Act, for their position was that the amount payable was fixed by the last of the subsequent agreements. They could not have successfully applied for registration of that agreement under section (8) of the Second Schedule, because it was only verbal, and would have been disputed.³ The proper course for the workman was to have applied for a review of the payment (viz., 5s.) fixed by the last agreement. Under section (12) of the First Schedule it was not necessary that the payment to be reviewed should have been fixed by a decree or recorded agreement. Any weekly payment actually being made might be reviewed.

Argued for the respondent;—The reclaimers were not entitled to suspend a charge under a recorded agreement on the mere allegation that there was a subsequent verbal agreement unrecorded.⁴ A recorded agreement was equivalent to a decree. An agreement to vary a decree could only be proved by writ or oath. An obligation could only be extinguished in the same way as it was contracted.⁵ Here it was not suggested that there was any written agreement to vary the recorded agreement. It was not really alleged that there was any agreement to do more than accept reduced payments for certain particular weeks. Such acceptance might bar the workman from charging for the full amount effeiring to any such week, but it could 1906, 8 F. 407; Blake, 1904, 1 K. B. 503; Beath, 1903, 6 F. 168; Cammick, 1901, 4 F. 198; and Dunlop, 1901, 4 F. 203. I do not think it necessary to analyse or to comment upon these cases—though some of them at least have a material bearing on the questions here raised—further than to say that Blake's case, decided in England, to which the complainers' counsel referred, seems to me to be adverse, and not favourable, to their argument. Upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that the complainers, in resorting to this procedure by way of suspension, have taken a course, which, however ingenious, is not in the circumstances open to them to adopt; and that the suspension must be refused."

¹ Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168; James Nimmo & Co., Limited, v. Fisher, 1907, S. C. 890.

² Hughes v. Thistle Chemical Co., 1907, S. C. 607; Blake v. Midland Railway, L. R., [1904] 1 K. B. 503, per Willa, J., at p. 506, and Kennedy, J., at p. 508.

³ Hughes v. Thistle Chemical Co., 1907, S. C. 607, per Lord Salvesen, at p. 616; Binning v. Easton & Sons, 1906, 8 F. 407.

⁴ Fife Coal Co., Limited, v. Davidson, 1907, S. C. 90; Binning v. Easton & Sons, 8 F. 407, per Lord Kyllachy, at p. 415; Colville & Sons v. Tighe, 1905, 8 F. 179, per Lord Low, at p. 189.

⁵ Dickson on Evidence, Vol. I, sec. 627.

not set aside the original recorded agreement as regards subsequent weeks. The proper course for the employers to have followed would have been to have had the workman examined by a doctor under section (11) of the First Schedule, and to have applied either (a) for review under section (12) of the First Schedule or (b) for the registration of a memorandum of the alleged new agreement under sections (8) and (14) (b) of the Second Schedule.¹ They had failed to avail themselves of these remedies which were open to them under the Act. The questions raised by them were questions which under the Act were appointed to be determined by arbitration under the Act.² They were questions as to the amount and duration of compensation. It would be pessimi exempli and contrary to the whole policy and intention of the Act to allow such questions to be determined by proof in a suspension brought by employers who had neglected to avail themselves of the remedies open to them under the Act. The cases of Beath & Keay v. Ness,³ and James Nimmo & Co., Limited, v. Fisher,⁴ were distinguishable. There it was practically admitted that the incapacity had ceased and the demand of the workman was unconscionable. In *Hughes v. Thistle Chemical Co.*⁵ the action was reluctantly sustained upon allegations of fraud and impetration, and because, in consequence of Binning v. Easton & Sons,⁶ no other remedy was open.

At advising on 17th January 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with the view at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived in this case. There was a recorded agreement entered into between the complainers and the respondent by which his compensation was fixed at 15s. 11d., and it is for that sum that the complainers have received a charge. Their ground of suspension is that the charger agreed at various times to accept, and did accept, a less amount, and this is not disputed. But the only recorded agreement is that for 15s. 11d., and the charger alleges that he is again totally incapacitated, and therefore entitled to enforce the recorded agreement until it is either varied by the recording of another agreement, or by a decision in the tribunal appointed for varying or ending a payment fixed under the statute.

The complainers seek to prove facts in regard to the alleged subsequent agreements, and the present condition of the charger. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has rightly refused to allow such proof. The Act contemplates that such matters shall be disposed of in a summary manner by the statutory tribunal, and when an agreement has been recorded, variation of that agreement is not to be sought in a suspension in the Supreme Court, but in an application under the Act (Schedule II., section 8). If the complainers had grounds for rendering nugatory the power to charge on the recorded agreement, they should have taken the simple steps offered to them

¹ Cammick v. Glasgow Iron and Steel Co., Limited, 1901, 4 F. 198; Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore, 1901, 4 F. 203; Blake v. Midland Railway, L. R., [1904] 1 K. B. 503; Binning v. Easton & Sons, 8 F. 407, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 416.

² Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1 (3), and First Schedule (12); Fielden v. Longden & Sons, L. R., [1902] 1 K. B. 47, per Collins, M. R., at p. 54.

³ 6 F. 168.

⁴ 1907, S. C. 890.

⁵ 1907, S. C. 607.

⁶ 8 F. 407.

Jan. 17, 1908. by the Act, by which, if they were right on the facts, they could have barred the charge of which they now complain. They were plainly the "party interested" in terms of the Schedule.

Fife Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Lindsay.

I am, therefore, for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD LOW.—I have found the question raised in this unfortunate litigation to be attended with some difficulty, but in the end I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

On 4th February 1904 the respondent, while in the employment of the complainers, sustained a fracture of the right ankle, and the compensation payable to him was fixed by agreement at 15s. 11d. per week, being the statutory maximum. A memorandum of the agreement was duly recorded in July 1905. In September 1905 the respondent had sufficiently recovered to be able to do light work. He appears to have been very willing to do any work which he was capable of performing, and the complainers seem to have been equally willing to give him work according to his capacity. The respondent was accordingly regularly employed by the complainers and earned considerable wages between 26th September and 9th December 1905. During that period the respondent agreed to accept, and the complainers agreed to pay, and did pay to him, in name of compensation, one-half of his net loss—that is to say, one-half of the difference between the amount which he was then earning and the amount which he was earning at the time of the accident. Calculated upon that basis the compensation paid to the respondent was 7s. 9d. per week from 26th September to 21st October 1905, and 5s. per week from the latter date until 9th December 1905.

Towards the end of December a difference arose between the respondent (who was represented by his law-agent) and the complainers in regard to the amount of compensation to which the former was entitled. The complainers at first proposed to reduce the amount to 4s. 7d. per week, but they ultimately offered to continue the amount which had been paid up to 9th December, namely, 5s. per week. The respondent, however, although he still intimated his willingness to accept one-half of his net loss, refused these offers—at first upon the ground that he was not able to work continuously even at light employment, and subsequently (in January 1906) upon the ground that the condition of his ankle had again totally incapacitated him. Both of these statements appear to have been supported by medical certificates which the respondent sent to the complainers.

In these circumstances, as the parties could not come to an agreement, the respondent, in March 1906, charged the complainers upon the registered agreement to make payment to him of 15s. 11d. per week from 10th January 1906, that being the date at which he alleges that he again became totally incapacitated.

The complainers seek to have the charge suspended, in the first place, upon the ground that the original agreement—that which was registered—was superseded by the agreements under which the respondent agreed to accept, and did accept, compensation at a reduced rate between 26th September and 9th December 1905. I am of opinion that that ground of suspension cannot be sustained. It is true that during that period the respondent agreed to accept, and did accept, a reduced amount of compensation proportionate to the wages which he was then earning, but there is nothing Jan. 17, 1908. in such an agreement to imply, nor is there anything in the correspondence Fife Coal Co., to suggest, that the respondent ever agreed that in the event of his again Limited, v. becoming totally incapacitated, or of his incapacity increasing, he should not Lindsay. be entitled to full compensation or to a larger amount than he had been Lord Low. receiving between September and December 1905 as the case might be.

The complainers further argued that as the respondent had only right to claim the maximum amount of compensation, if and so long as he was totally incapacitated, the suspension could not be disposed of without inquiry into the facts, seeing that they (the complainers) denied that the respondent had again become totally incapacitated. They also maintained that inquiry was competent because the respondent having chosen to appeal to the common law by giving a charge upon the decree implied in the registered agreement, could not object to any defence which the complainers might have to his claim, whether under the statute or otherwise, being dealt with in a suspension—that being the appropriate common law remedy when a charge for payment is given. I am of opinion that that view cannot be sustained. The Act makes it plain that such questions as are raised in this case (namely, in regard to the amount or duration of compensation) must be settled by arbitration under the statute, and not by way of action in the Courts of law. The complainers had a remedy open to them under the statute, because when in the end of 1905 or the beginning of 1906 it became apparent that the amount to be paid to the respondent could not be settled by agreement, they might have applied for review of the weekly payments. The complainers argued that it was for the respondent to make such an application if he was not satisfied with their offer to continue payment at the rate which he had accepted between the 21st of October and the 9th of December 1905. I think that it would have been quite competent for the respondent to institute proceedings under this Act, but I do not think that he was bound to do so. He was, in my opinion, entitled to take his stand upon the recorded agreement, which, for the reasons which I have given, I cannot regard as having been superseded.

No doubt the result of refusing the suspension will, I imagine, almost certainly be that the complainers will be compelled to pay to the respondent a great deal more than the amount which, if everything had been done in terms of the statute, he would have been entitled to demand. But that is a result which, I am afraid, the Court is powerless to prevent, because the question is not one of common law or of equity, but of statutory enactments. The statute has armed the respondent with a decree against the complainers for payment to him of a certain amount weekly, and the complainers have not adopted the statutory procedure by which their liability to pay that amount might have been ended or restricted. I therefore agree with your Lordship that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be affirmed.

LORD ARDWALL.—The complainers in this case ask that a charge following upon a memorandum duly registered in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline, under the provisions of section 8 of the Second Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, should be suspended. Such a memorandum is declared by the same section, taken along with the interpretation clause, 14

Jan. 17, 1908, (a) of the same schedule, to be enforceable as a Sheriff Court decree. There is nothing incompetent in raising such a suspension, and a suspension of a charge on a registered memorandum was granted in the case of Nimmo & Fife Coal Co., Limited, v. Lindsay.¹ But such a suspension ought not readily to be entertained, Lord Ardwall. and to justify its being granted it ought to be shewn that without such suspension the complainer would suffer some manifest injustice, and further, that the end to be attained by such suspension could not be attained by proceedings under the said Act.

The facts in the present case are as follows:—On 4th February 1904 the respondent, while in the course of his employment, met with an accident and claimed compensation. The parties agreed that the amount should be 15s. 11d. a week, which was the statutory maximum, and that amount was paid from 18th February 1904 till 26th September 1905. A memorandum of this agreement was recorded in terms of the Act in the Special Register of the Sheriff Court of Fife, at Dunfermline. The complainers aver that the respondent having partially recovered and returned to work, the parties, on 23d October 1905, by agreement, varied the weekly payment to 7s. 9d. per week as from 26th September 1905, and that this agreement superseded the recorded agreement, and was acted on by the parties for the period between 26th September 1905 and 21st October. They further say that another agreement to vary was entered into on 6th November 1905, whereby the compensation was fixed at 5s. a week as from 21st October, and that this latest agreement was acted on for the period between 21st October and 9th December 1905. At that date the complainers proposed to reduce the compensation to 4s. 7d. a week, but the respondent declined to agree to this, and on 10th January 1906 he left their employment and intimated that he was totally incapacitated for any work whatever.

The complainers admit liability to pay compensation at the rate of 5s. a week from the 21st October 1905 till that rate shall be varied by agreement or review in terms of the Act. The respondent has charged them for payment at the rate of 15s. 11d. a week from and after 10th January 1906, in terms of the only registered agreement. The respondent took no steps of any kind between the cessation of payments on 9th December 1905 and the date of the charge on 8th March 1906. Accordingly, the complainers had plenty of time, if they so desired, either to record their alleged new agreement or to apply to the Sheriff for a variation of the rate of compensation set forth in the only recorded agreement. It cannot therefore be said that this suspension is rendered necessary by reason of any hurried action on the part of the respondent. The two grounds on which suspension is asked are—First, that the respondent had entered into an agreement in November 1905 to accept 5s. a week of compensation, and second, that on 10th January 1906 he was not suffering from such incapacity as to entitle him to receive 15s. 11d. a week, being the amount fixed by the registered memorandum of agreement. The complainers' counsel asks for a proof of these two grounds. I entirely agree with what the Lord Ordinary says in his opinion, "that to allow a proof in this Court upon either of these heads would be to run plainly counter to the policy of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which aims at providing summary and inexpensive methods of inquiry where parties do not agree on matters of fact." This being so, the next question is whether the complainers might have had the inquiries made and the remedies they seek granted by taking steps under the said Act. I have no doubt that they could.

¹ 1907, S. C. 890.

Jan. 17, 1908.
 Wye Coal Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Lindsay.

Lord Ardwall.

In the first place, in respect that they alleged that there was a new agreement they might have applied to have the memorandum of that agreement registered, and if that had been done it would then have lain upon the respondent if he wished an increase of weekly compensation to have applied to the Sheriff. If, on the other hand, the respondent had succeeded in convincing the Sheriff-Clerk or Sheriff that there was really no such agreement, or if the Sheriff-Clerk or Sheriff took the course suggested by Lord Salvesen in the case of Hughes,¹ and declined to order the memorandum to be recorded in respect that there was a bona fide dispute between the parties, then the course would have been clearly open to the complainers to apply for a diminution of the weekly payments under section 12 of Schedule 1 of the Act, which the Sheriff would have then heard, and would have decided the question in terms of the Act. At one point in the course of the argument for the complainers the crux of the case seemed to be this, which of the two parties—the respondent or the complainers—ought to have applied to the Sheriff in the circumstances which existed at January 10th, 1906? It seems to me that the complainers were the proper parties to apply, because if the respondent had taken up the position (which he has now taken up) that he had entered into no new agreement in October or November 1905, the way was open to them at once to apply to the Sheriff for review of the compensation payable under the only recorded agreement.

